
DETENTION AND CORRECTIONS CASELAW CATALOG

26th Edition
2015-2016

Volume Two: Sections 8-14

Rod C. Miller
Donald J. Walter

Research and Review:

Joseph Heltzel
Chris Dickey
Richard Drennon
Kyle McCarty

CRS, Inc.

A Non-Profit Organization

925 Johnson Drive Gettysburg, PA 17325
(717) 338-9100
Fax (717) 718-6178
www.correction.org
rod@correction.org

Copyright 2017

Table of Contents

DETENTION AND CORRECTIONS CASELAW CATALOG

VOLUME 1

How to Use the Catalog

Index and Topic Finder

Table of Cases

1. Access to Courts
2. Administration

3. Administrative Segregation
4. Assessment of Costs
5. Attorney Fees
6. Bail
7. Civil Rights

VOLUME 2

8. Classification and Separation
9. Conditions of Confinement
10. Cruel and Unusual Punishment
11. Discipline

12. Exercise and Recreation
13. Ex-Offenders
14. Failure to Protect

VOLUME 3

15. Facilities
16. False Imprisonment/Arrest
17. Female Prisoners
18. Food
19. Free Speech, Expression, Assoc.
20. Good Time

21. Grievance Procedures, Prisoner
22. Habeas Corpus
23. Hygiene-Prisoner Personal
24. Immunity
25. Intake and Admissions
26. Juveniles

VOLUME 4

27. Liability
28. Mail
29. Medical Care

30. Mental Problems (Prisoner)
31. Personnel

VOLUME 5

32. Pretrial Detention
33. Privacy
34. Programs-Prisoner
35. Property-Prisoner Personal

36. Release
37. Religion
38. Rules & Regulations-Prisoner

VOLUME 6

39. Safety and Security
40. Sanitation
41. Searches
42. Services-Prisoner
43. Sentence
44. Standards

45. Supervision
46. Training
47. Transfers
48. Use of Force
49. Visiting
50. Work- Prisoner

SECTION 8: CLASSIFICATION AND SEPARATION

Detention and Corrections Caselaw Catalog All Rights Reserved
CRS Inc, 925 Johnson Dr., Gettysburg PA 17325 (717) 338-9100 www.correction.org/

The following pages present summaries of court decisions which address this topic area. These summaries provide readers with highlights of each case, but are not intended to be a substitute for the review of the full case. The cases do not represent all court decisions which address this topic area, but rather offer a sampling of relevant holdings.

The decisions summarized below were current as of the date indicated on the title page of this edition of the Catalog. Prior to publication, the citation for each case was verified, and the case was researched in Shepard's Citations to determine if it had been altered upon appeal (reversed or modified). The Catalog is updated annually. An annual supplement provides replacement pages for cases in the prior edition which have changed, and adds new cases. Readers are encouraged to consult the Topic Index to identify related topics of interest. The text in the section entitled "How to Use The Catalog" at the beginning of the Catalog provides an overview which may also be helpful to some readers.

The case summaries which follow are organized by year, with the earliest case presented first. Within each year, cases are organized alphabetically by the name of the plaintiff. The left margin offers a quick reference, highlighting the type of court involved and identifying appropriate subtopics addressed by each case.

1964

U.S. District Court
PRETRIAL
DETAINEES
Tyler v. Harris, 226 F.Supp. 852 (W.D. Mo. 1964). Unconvicted persons can be kept with convicted persons in federal medical centers, but they may not be subjected to involuntary servitude. (Medical Center For Federal Prisoners, Springfield, Missouri)

1966

U.S. District Court
MENTALLY ILL
Johnston v. Ciccone, 260 F.Supp. 553 (W.D. Mo. 1966). Pretrial confinement with convicted persons in the U.S. Medical Center for Federal Prisoners is not unconstitutional for persons found to be mentally ill. (United States Medical Center for Federal Prisoners)

1968

U.S. Supreme Court
RACIAL DISCRIMINATION
Lee v. Washington, 390 U.S. 333 (1968)(Per Curiam). Plaintiffs sought declaratory and injunctive relief against racial segregation in state, county, and city jails of Alabama. The U.S. District Court for the Middle District of Alabama held that to the extent that the statutes in question required segregation of races in prisons and jails, they were in violation of the fourteenth amendment, and established a schedule for desegregation. The state appealed directly to the U.S. Supreme Court. (Affirmed.) J.J. BLACK, HARLAN, & STEWART CONCURRING: [P]rison authorities have the right, acting in good faith and in particularized circumstances, to take into account racial tensions in maintaining security, discipline, and good order in prisons and jails. We are unwilling to assume that state or local prison authorities might mistakenly regard such an explicit pronouncement as evincing any dilution of this Court's firm commitment to the fourteenth amendment's prohibition of racial discrimination. 390 U.S. at 334. (Alabama State, County, and City Jails)

U.S. District Court
RACIAL
DISCRIMINATION
Wilson v. Kelley, 294 F.Supp. 1005 (N.D. Ga. 1968), aff'd, 393 U.S. 266 (1968). State statutes requiring the segregation of races in county jails are unconstitutional, and although prison authorities may take racial tensions into account in maintaining order and security, such consideration should be made after a danger to security, discipline, and good order has become apparent, and not before. (Board of Corrections, Georgia)

1970

U.S. District Court
ISOLATION
Davis v. Lindsay, 321 F.Supp. 1134 (S.D. N.Y. 1970). It is not proper for court to abstain from adjudicating detainee's claim for relief. The Commissioner of Department of Corrections is not liable in suit by city detainee seeking release from isolation on basis of general authority over jails. Constitutionality of administrative segregation must be measured by its reasonableness and effect, not the motivation of the actors. (City Jail, New York)

U.S. District Court
RACIAL DISCRIMINATION
TRUSTY
Holt v. Sarver, 309 F.Supp. 362 (E.D. Ark. 1970). State prisoners challenged conditions and practices in the state prison system. The district court held that conditions and practices in the Arkansas penitentiary system, including a trusty system whereby trusties ran the prison, open barracks system, conditions in isolation cells, and absence of a meaningful rehabilitation program, were such that confinement of persons in the system amounted to cruel and unusual punishment prohibited by eighth and fourteenth amendments.

To the extent that unconstitutional racial discrimination was being practiced in state prison system, such discrimination was to be eliminated. The fourteenth amendment prohibits racial discrimination within prisons, and the prohibition extends to racial segregation of inmates.

Elimination of a trusty system under which trustees had unsupervised power over other inmates was essential to the establishment of prison system meeting constitutional standards. (Arkansas Prison System)

1971

U.S. District Court
ISOLATION

Conklin v. Hancock, 334 F.Supp. 1119 (D. N.H. 1971). Inmate in isolation should have all privileges of other inmates except those that involve mixing with the general population. Attorney for inmate in isolation must be allowed to confer privately with inmate and other inmates who may be witnesses in his behalf. Outgoing mail of security risk, except mail to public officials and attorney of record may be read to determine whether escape plans are being made. Incoming "legal" mail is to be delivered promptly and unopened. Other incoming mail may be inspected for contraband and read to extent necessary to foil escape plans or censor pornography or inflammatory writing. (New Hampshire State Prison, Concord, New Hampshire)

U.S. District Court
CLASSIFICATION

Jones v. Wittenberg, 330 F.Supp. 707 (N.D. Oh. 1971), aff'd, 456 F.2d 854 (6th Cir. 1972). Court orders a classification system to be implemented on admission to the jail. (Lucas County Jail, Ohio)

1972

U.S. District Court
JUVENILES

Baker v. Hamilton, 345 F.Supp. 345 (W.D. Ky. 1972). Placement of juveniles (pretrial and sentenced) in an adult facility without a hearing and without separating them from adults is unconstitutional. (Jefferson County Jail, Kentucky)

U.S. Appeals Court
DUE PROCESS

Christman v. Skinner, 468 F.2d 723 (2d Cir. 1972). Putting detainee in "isolation for three days did not constitute punishment, but only maintenance of order and discipline," thus no minimal due process was necessary. (Monroe County Jail, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
CLASSIFICATION

Gray v. Creamer, 465 F.2d 179 (3rd Cir. 1972). State prison inmates instituted a civil rights action claiming that censorship of mail, confiscation of personal belongings, transfer from one section of prison to another without formal hearing, placement in solitary confinement or administrative segregation, and shutting down of a weekly news letter which was produced through cooperative efforts of "outsiders" and inmates were a violation of their constitutional rights as inmates. Although the district court dismissed the case, holding that the plaintiffs did not present issues for which relief could be granted, the appeals court reversed the lower court decision. (Western Penitentiary, Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania)

1973

U.S. District Court
JUVENILE

Collins v. Schoonfield, 363 F.Supp. 1152 (D. Md. 1973). Segregation of juvenile to protect him from assault is not unconstitutional. (Baltimore City Jail, Maryland)

U.S. District Court

Goldsby v. Carnes, 365 F.Supp. 395 (W.D. Mo. 1973). Inmates in isolation shall receive showers as frequently as other inmates. Isolation may not extend beyond fourteen days, unless voluntary or certified in writing by a medical doctor as medically necessary. (Jackson County Jail, Kansas City, Missouri)

1974

U.S. District Court
HOMOSEXUALS
ISOLATION

Berch v. Stahl, 373 F.Supp. 412 (W.D. N.C. 1974). Known homosexuals may be placed nonpunitively in solitary confinement but may not be denied regular prison privileges and amenities. Mentally disturbed inmates may be placed nonpunitively in solitary confinement but may not be denied regular prison privileges and amenities. Solitary confinement is not per se cruel and unusual, but it becomes so if the inmate is denied clothing. Segregation of inmates by race is unconstitutional. (Mecklenburg County Jail, North Carolina)

1975

U.S. District Court
PRETRIAL DETAINEE
SPECIAL NEEDS

Alberti v. Sheriff of Harris Co., 406 F.Supp. 649 (S.D. Tex. 1975). No pretrial detainee shall be housed in the same cell or cellblock with any person who has been convicted and sentenced. Alcoholic and drug-dependent inmates shall be housed in an incarcerative environment specifically designed and equipped for the treatment of withdrawal problems. (Harris County Jail, Texas)

U.S. District Court
DUE PROCESS
MENTALLY ILL

Craig v. Hocker, 405 F.Supp 656 (D. Nev., 1975). Prisoners brought action against the warden and others challenging various aspects of prison administration and the discipline of prisoners. The district court held: (1) that prisoners who were subject to disciplinary proceedings were entitled to certain due process rights; (2) that the classification process could not be equated with disciplinary proceedings for the purposes of due process; (3) that prisoners were entitled to access to courts and to the availability of certain legal material; (4) that prisoners were not being denied medical care and treatment; (5) that certain aspects of punitive segregation cells constituted cruel and unusual punishment; (6) that statutes providing for prison confinement of mentally ill persons for security reasons were unconstitutional; and (7) that the prisoners were not entitled to damages. (Nevada State Prison)

U.S. Appeals Court
CLASSIFICATION
CRITERIA

Kelley v. Brewer, 525 F.2d 394 (8th Cir. 1975). Classification criteria must be rational and reasonable rather than arbitrary and capricious. (State Penitentiary, Fort Madison, Iowa)

U.S. Appeals Court
HOMOSEXUALS

McCray v. Sullivan, 509 F.2d 1332 (5th Cir. 1975), cert. denied, 423 U.S. 859. Homosexuals segregated as a suspect class is questionable. (Alabama State Penitentiary)

U.S. District Court
CLASSIFICATION

Rhem v. Malcolm, 396 F.Supp. 1195 (S.D. N.Y. 1975), aff'd, 527 F.2d 1041 (2nd Cir. 1975). Institution allowed to lock in inmates, consistent with least restrictive alternative theory, during following times: 1) Post-breakfast lock-in to provide services for inmates going to court. 2) Lock-in of one side of cell block while other side is eating. 3) Night time lock-in. Using proper classification procedures, the institution may impose a more restrictive lock-in schedule for inmates determined to be security risks. Limitation of right to contact visits must be justified by a system of classification which excludes only those inmates requiring maximum security. (Manhattan House of Detention, New York)

1976

U.S. District Court
PRETRIAL
DETAINEES

Barnes v. Government of the Virgin Islands, 415 F.Supp. 1218 (D. V.I. 1976). Detainees are to be separated from convicted inmates in separate buildings if physically possible. (Golden Grove Adult Correctional Facility, Virgin Islands)

U.S. District Court
CLASSIFICATION

Doe v. Swinson, 20 CrL 2272 (E.D. Vir. 1976). Sloppy classification is liable. Sheriff is found liable for repeated beatings of prisoner. (Fairfax County Jail, Virginia)

U.S. Supreme Court
DUE PROCESS
TRANSFER

Meachum v. Fano, 427 U.S. 215 (1976), reh'g denied, 429 U.S. 873 (1976). Fano and other sentenced inmates confined in the Massachusetts Correctional Institute at Norfolk brought this 42 U.S.C. Section 1983 action against Meachum, the prison superintendent, the State Commissioner of Corrections, and the Acting Deputy for Classification and Treatment, alleging that by being transferred to a less favorable institution without an adequate fact-finding hearing, the inmates are being denied liberty without due process of law. The inmates sought injunctive and declaratory relief, as well as damages.

The U.S. District Court, interpreting Wolff v. McDonnell, 418 U.S. 539 (1974) granted relief, and a divided First Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed. The prison official's petition for writ of certiorari was granted.

HELD: Absent a state law or practice conditioning such transfers on proof of serious misconduct or the occurrence of other events, the due process clause of the fourteenth amendment does not entitle a state prisoner to a hearing when he is transferred to a prison where the conditions are substantially less favorable to the prisoner. 427 U.S. at 216.

REASONING: a. [G]iven a valid conviction, the criminal defendant has been constitutionally deprived of his liberty to the extent that the state may confine him and subject him to the rules of its prison system so long as the conditions of confinement do not otherwise violate the Constitution. 427 U.S. at 224.

b. The Constitution does not require that the state have more than one prison for convicted felons; nor does it guarantee that the convicted inmate will be placed in any particular prison if, as is likely, the state had more than one correctional institution. The initial decision to assign the convict to a particular institution is not subject to audit under the due process clause, although the degree of confinement in one prison may be quite different from that in another. 427 U.S. at 224.

c. Confinement in any of the state's institutions is within the normal limits or range of custody which the conviction has authorized the state to impose. That life in one prison is much more disagreeable than in another does not in itself signify that a fourteenth amendment liberty interest is implicated when a prisoner is transferred to the institution with more severe rules. 427 U.S. at 225.

d. [T]o hold... that any substantial deprivation imposed by prison authorities triggers the procedural protections of the due process clause would subject to judicial review a wide spectrum of discretionary actions that traditionally have been the business of prison administrators rather than of the federal courts. 427 U.S. at 225.

e. Whatever expectation the prisoner may have in remaining at a particular prison so long as he behaves himself, it is too ephemeral and insubstantial to trigger procedural due process protections as long as prison officials have discretion to transfer him for whatever reason, or for no reason at all. 427 U.S. at 228.

NOTE: This case was distinguished from Wolff in that in Wolff a state created right-good time credits-involved a liberty interest necessitating due process protection. In this case, no such state-created right was present. Thus, the Wolff due process procedures are not applicable. (Massachusetts Correctional Institute, Norfolk)

U.S. District Court
PRETRIAL
DETAINEES

Mitchell v. Untreiner, 421 F.Supp. 886 (N.D. Fla. 1976). No pretrial detainee may be housed in the same cell with a convicted person. (Escambia County Jail, Pensacola, Florida)

U.S. District Court
PRETRIAL
DETAINEES

Moore v. Janing, 427 F.Supp. 567 (D. Neb. 1976). Housing of convicts and detainees together contributes to finding of unconstitutionality. Detainees may not be subjected to restrictions unrelated to securing appearance at trial and maintaining internal order and security. (Douglas County Jail, Nebraska)

U.S. District Court
DUE PROCESS

Wright v. Enomoto, 462 F.Supp. 397 (N.D. Calif. 1976), aff'd, 434 U.S. 1052 (1977). A classification of a prisoner from the general population to administrative segregation requires procedural due process if the conditions of administrative segregation are substantially more "onerous" than those in the general population. (California State Prisons- San Quentin, Folsom, Soledad, Tracy)

1977

U.S. District Court
PRETRIAL
DETAINEES
JUVENILES
SPECIAL NEEDS

Ahrens v. Thomas, 434 F.Supp. 873 (W.D. Mo. 1977), aff'd, 570 F.2d 288. Screening officer shall inquire as to detainee's need for psychological or counseling care and shall report to the correctional staff. So far as practicable, pretrial detainees shall not be housed in the same cell with convicted persons. Juveniles may not be housed in the jail for longer than it takes to arrange to transfer them. There shall be a special housing unit for detainees who need it for psychiatric, psychological or other medical reasons. (Platte County Jail, Missouri)

U.S. District Court
PRETRIAL
DETAINEES

Anderson v. Redman, 429 F.Supp. 1105 (D. Del. 1977). Overcrowding is found to have caused a breakdown in prison classification system. Pretrial detainees are exempted from population limit based on "classification capacity" because detainees are not classified. However, design capacity is never to be exceeded. (Delaware Correctional Center)

U.S. District Court
CLASSIFICATION

Forts v. Malcolm, 426 F.Supp. 464 (S.D. N.Y. 1977). Summary judgment is granted requiring that every visit be a contact visit except where a security risk is revealed through an established classification system. (New York City Correctional Institute for Women)

U.S. Appeals Court
CLASSIFICATION

French v. Heyne, 547 F.2d 994 (7th Cir. 1977). Restriction on inmate money raising to finance educational programs must have a rational basis. Though not constitutionally required, classification must have a rational basis for providing vocational educational programs to long-term inmates but not to short-term inmates or inmates with degrees. Prior classification was not found sufficient. (Indiana State Reformatory)

U.S. District Court
CLASSIFICATION
JUVENILES

Goldsby v. Carnes, 429 F.Supp. 370 (W.D. Mo. 1977). Inmates shall be classified according to age and other factors. Juveniles will be housed in living areas separate from adults. (Jackson County Jail, Kansas City, Missouri)

U.S. District Court
CLASSIFICATION
CRITERIA

Laaman v. Helgemoe, 437 F.Supp. 269 (D. N.H. 1977). Reasonable, rational classification system is constitutionally required. (New Hampshire State Prison)

1978

U.S. Appeals Court
DUE PROCESS

Altizer v. Paderick, 569 F.2d 812 (4th Cir. 1978), cert. denied, 435 U.S. 1009 (1977). Inmates have no due process right to any particular job in an institution. No procedural due process is needed to transfer inmate from one job to another. (Virginia State Prison)

U.S. District Court
DUE PROCESS

Bono v. Saxbe, 450 F.Supp. 934 (E.D. Ill., 1978). Prisoners confined in the control unit of the Marion Federal Penitentiary brought an action challenging the conditions of their confinement. The district court held that: (1) prisoners did not have a fundamental liberty interest in remaining in the general prison population but did have an interest protected by due process as a result of the prison's own rules; (2) placement of prisoners in the control unit, which was done for preventative and not punitive reasons, could not be based on the crime for which the prisoner was convicted or on the possibility of escape since every inmate in the Marion institution was a potential candidate for escape; (3) prisoners placed in the control unit were entitled to written notice of hearing, written reason, impartial decision making, and immediate and later periodic review; (4) prisoners were entitled to be told what affirmative actions they could take to expedite their release from the control unit, and (5) conditions of confinement in the control unit were not cruel and unusual punishment except for the use of closed-front cells. (Federal Penitentiary, Marion, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
PROTECTIVE CUSTODY
DUE PROCESS

M.C.I. Concord Advisory Bd. v. Hall, 447 F.Supp. 398 (D. Mass, 1978). In a civil rights action brought to challenge conditions of confinement at a state correctional institution, the district court held that: (1) plaintiff prisoners sustained the burden of proving that incarceration of inmates in protective custody cells, in awaiting action cells and in institutional holding cells violated eighth amendment standards, but (2) plaintiffs failed to sustain their burden of proving that double celling in one area and use of a hospital wardroom for a dormitory violated eighth amendment standards. Injunctive relief was granted in part.

An eighth amendment proscription against cruel and unusual punishment is flexible, drawing its meaning from evolving standards of decency that mark the progress of maturing society, and penal measures are to be evaluated against broad and idealistic concepts of dignity, civilized standards, humanity and decency. An equal protection challenge to a policy under which inmates undergoing classification and placement at state institutions were single-celled in contrast to double celling during classification at one institution involved neither suspect classification nor fundamental interest, and a heavy burden rested with plaintiff prisoners to demonstrate that no rational justification existed for separate classification programs.

Nothing in the constitution requires prison officials to treat all inmate groups alike where differentiation may avoid institutional disruption or violence.

Actions of prison officials in separating newly admitted inmates and protective custody prisoners from the general prison population are subject to a basic due process requirement that such distinctions be rational rather than arbitrary or capricious, but, on record, the method of classifying inmates within this particular institution was not shown to be arbitrary or capricious.

Prisoners failed to sustain burden of proof that dormitory use of a hospital wardroom violated constitutional rights of inmates who slept therein and failed to show that use of the wardroom infringed on constitutional rights of inmates to adequate medical care. (M.C.I. Concord, Mass.)

U.S. District Court
RACIAL
DISCRIMINATION

Mickens v. Winston, 462 F.Supp. 910 (E.D. Vir. 1978), aff'd, 609 F. 508. Racial segregation as a device to relieve tension and prevent incidents among inmates may be permissible as a temporary measure under extreme circumstances. It cannot be justified as a general practice. (Richmond City Jail, Virginia)

1979

U.S. District Court
DUE PROCESS

Bartholomew v. Reed, 477 F.Supp. 223 (D. Ore. 1979). Administrative transfer of a prisoner to segregation requires some due process. Procedures in effect which require a post-transfer hearing were sufficient to satisfy due process and are appropriately less stringent than procedures governing disciplinary confinement. (Oregon Correctional Institute, State Penitentiary, and Women's Correctional Center)

U.S. District Court
SEGREGATION

Brown v. Neagle, 486 F.Supp. 364 (S.D. W.V. 1979). Placement in administrative detention as an escape risk on the basis of escapes from other institutions by acquaintances of the plaintiff is irrational. Return to general population and credit for the good time which would have been earned in general population is ordered. The plaintiff is to be treated as any other inmate. (Federal Correctional Institution, Alderson, West Virginia)

U.S. District Court
CLASSIFICATION
CRITERIA
SEPARATION

Doe v. Lally, 467 F.Supp. 1339 (D. Md., 1979). Inmates of a state diagnostic center brought a civil rights action seeking injunctive and declaratory relief. The district court held that: (1) where an original, individual plaintiff in inmates' civil rights class action was a proper representative of the class at the time of certification, intervenor plaintiff's subsequent escape from the correctional center did not require the decertification of class action; (2) because the plan submitted by prison officials failed to devise a model for classifying inmates on the basis of their age, length of sentence, nature of crime, and past offenses so as to avoid sending inmates to the state penitentiary in the first place if they were readily identifiable as inmates who belonged in prison camps, prison officials would be directed to consult with recognized experts to devise a more efficient classification procedure; and (3) state would be directed to implement its proposed procedures to prevent mixing between inmates of diagnostic center and inmates of the state penitentiary and to complete those measures within 60 days. (Maryland Reception, Diagnostic and Classification Center)

U.S. Appeals Court
RACIAL DISCRIMINATION
CLASSIFICATION

Jones v. Diamond, 594 F.2d 997 (5th Cir. 1979), cert. denied, 102 S.Ct. 27 (1980). In this opinion, the U.S. Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals reviewed Mississippi District Court Judge William Cox's ruling on what the Fifth Circuit termed a "challenge to nearly every conceivable facet of the Jackson County Jail at Pascagoula, Mississippi." The court first noted that the conditions at the Jackson County Jail were not "uncivilized" or "barbaric and inhumane", as the court had found rulings on the conditions of other jails. A peculiar aspect of this case was that convicted felons were being held in the jail while the state penitentiary was being brought up to constitutional standards. Consequently, there were convicted felons, convicted misdemeanants and pretrial detainees in the jail.

Accordingly, the court, in reviewing the conditions at the jail, applied different standards depending on whether the inmate was pretrial detainee or a convicted felon or misdemeanant. The court then reviewed the history of corrections in the State of Mississippi and specifically in Jackson County. It noted that Jackson County officials had spent a considerable amount of money and instituted several new programs in the last ten years. In addition, at the time of this opinion, the county was in the process of erecting a new jail. After noting these facts, the court made rulings in the following areas.

DISCRIMINATION. The appellate court upheld the lower court's ruling that the cells at the Jackson County Jail were not segregated. Two bull pens at the jail, however, were ruled to be unconstitutionally segregated. In response to the plaintiff's interrogatories, the jail officials had produced documents showing that the large bull pen was "white" and the small bull pen was "colored." The jail officials argued that they were not responsible for the segregation because each new inmate was given the freedom to choose which bullpen he wished to occupy. The court held that this was not enough, stating: "In the inherently coercive setting of a jail, it is evident to us that the withdrawal of decision making by the public officials for only part of the jail (here, the bull pens) amounts to impermissible racial segregation of prisoners."

CLASSIFICATION. The court noted that the Constitution does not require that a classification plan be put into effect, although a court may order such a plan to protect inmates from homosexual attacks, violence and contagious diseases. The court ruled that the policies in existence under the Mississippi Code were adequate to protect the inmate. (Jackson County Jail)

U.S. Appeals Court
CLASSIFICATION

McGruder v. Phelps, 608 F.2d 1023 (5th Cir. 1979). An inmate does not have a constitutional right to any particular classification. However, the state must meet the provisions of a previous settlement incorporated into an order which requires ninety day review of segregation classification. (State Penitentiary, Angola, Louisiana)

1980

State Supreme Court
SUICIDE

Attorney General v. Sheriff of Worcester County, 413 N.E.2d 722 (Mass. 1980). The Massachusetts Supreme Court ordered the Worcester County Jail to comply with Public Health regulations concerning sinks, toilets and beds. The jail contained seven isolation cells which did not have a toilet, sink or raised bed. After a public health official inspected these cells and found them to be in violation of health regulations, jail officials stated that they intended to correct the violations in six of the cells but would keep the seventh as it is for confinement of potentially suicidal inmates. The court determined that county jails are subject to health department inspections and that isolation units are not to be excluded from the scope of health regulations. The court then ruled that the evidence with respect to the danger of suicide fell short of requiring an exception to the regulations. The court stated that indestructible toilet and sink units are available and that such units could not be used by an inmate to injure himself or others. The court then ordered jail officials to install such units to achieve compliance with health code regulations. (Worcester County Jail)

U.S. Appeals Court
DUE PROCESS

Bills v. Henderson, 631 F.2d 1287 (6th Cir. 1980). While the mere change of status from general population to administrative segregation does not implicate a protected liberty interest, the state regulations defining the use of administrative segregation and limiting it to individuals who create safety problems were they to remain in the general population does create a protected liberty interest. Because the decision here is made on the entire record of the inmate rather than the most recent incident, the notice of intent to change status, which due process requires, must indicate not merely the most recent incident, but the entire basis for the decision. A Wolff type hearing is to be conducted. Further, the statement of the basis for the general decision must go beyond the most recent event and review the general record and make findings thereon. (Brushy Mountain State Penitentiary, Tennessee)

U.S. Appeals Court
CLASSIFICATION

Bono v. Saxbe, 620 F.2d 609 (7th Cir. 1980). While the institutional administration can change the conditions of confinement for administrative reasons as they see fit, they cannot incarcerate individuals under conditions which are violative of the eighth amendment regardless of whether the purpose is administrative or punitive. (Marion Federal Prison, Illinois)

- U.S. District Court
DUE PROCESS
- Bukhari v. Hutto, 487 F.Supp. 1162 (E.D. Vir. 1980). While placement in segregation based upon the political beliefs of an individual would violate the first amendment, placement in segregation of an individual who is a member of an organization advocating escape, who although a model prisoner, has already escaped once, and whose closest associates have recently escaped from other institutions is a reasonable security measure. Such placement in segregation does not require a Wolff type hearing, either before or after, but the individual does have a due process base right to have any erroneous information in the file which is considered in making the decision. (Virginia Correctional Center for Women, Goodland)
- U.S. District Court
PRETRIAL
DETAINEES
- Campbell v. Bergeron, 486 F.Supp. 1246 (M.D. La. 1980), aff'd, 654 F.2d 719 (5th Cir., 1981). Jail inmates have a right of personal safety when incarcerated. However, there is nothing inherent in a failure to separate sentenced and pretrial inmates which violates this right. (West Baton Rouge Parish Jail, Louisiana)
- U.S. District Court
LENGTH OF
SEGREGATION
- Chapman v. Pickett, 491 F.Supp. 967 (C.D. Ill. 1980). The district court determined that the length of confinement does not have any effect on the question whether confinement in segregation violates the eighth amendment; reversed on appeal. (Federal Penitentiary, Leavenworth, Kansas)
- U.S. Appeals Court
DUE PROCESS
- Cummings v. Roberts, 628 F.2d 1065 (8th Cir. 1980). The transfer of an inmate to segregation for nonpunitive reasons does not require procedural due process. (St. Louis City Jail)
- U.S. District Court
CLASSIFICATION
- Garrett v. United States, 501 F.Supp. 337 (N.D. Ga. 1980). An ex-inmate of Atlanta Federal Penitentiary sues for injuries inflicted upon him while he was incarcerated. The district court held that where the prisoner who assaulted the plaintiff prisoner arrived at the federal penitentiary in Atlanta accompanied by a file showing that he had committed assault upon a correctional officer on three separate occasions, had assaulted another inmate, had murdered an inmate and threatened correctional officers, as well as engaged in fighting and possession of dangerous weapons, the government was negligent in failing to anticipate that he might harm another prisoner and in failing to provide closer supervision of him than was provided. He had been placed in a large area housing 500 to 600 prisoners in multi-tiered cells, manned by two to three guards.
- The court found that this negligence was proximate cause of prisoner's injuries so that he would be entitled to damages for loss of earnings, pain he suffered after the incident, and anxiety and mental distress. The legal standard for proximate cause requires the injuries to have been a foreseeable result to the alleged negligence; however, "foreseeability" does not require the anticipation of a particular injury to a particular person but only that anticipation of a general type or category of harm which in ordinary experience might be expected to flow from a particular type of negligence.
- Failure of the institutional staff to take the individual's prior record of attacks on inmates and guards into account when classifying him, which caused the individual to be placed in general population where he was able to attack plaintiff, was negligence giving rise to liability under the Federal Tort Claims Act. $5040 was awarded. (Federal Penitentiary, Atlanta)
- U.S. District Court
SEGREGATION
- Griffin v. Smith, 493 F.Supp. 129 (W.D. N.Y. 1980). An allegation that inmates in the Special Housing Unit are limited to one visit with a counselor per week fails to state a claim upon which relief can be granted. Allegations that mail directed from the inmates to the superintendent of the institution is lost or destroyed state a claim upon which relief can be granted. Allegations regarding the lack of access to the regular visiting room and to the visiting room vending machines for visitors to inmates in the Special Housing Unit fail to state a claim upon which relief can be granted. Allegations of limiting the number of personal books in the Special Housing Unit to five, or a poorly shelved library and an almost total lack of non-English books do not state a claim upon which relief can be granted. (Attica Correctional Facility, New York)
- U.S. District Court
CLASSIFICATION
CRITERIA
- Hluchan v. Fauver, 482 F.Supp. 1155 (D. N.J. 1980). In October 1979, the district court for New Jersey declared unconstitutional a state standard which denied eligibility for minimum custody status to inmates who had been convicted of more than one "sex offense." Guidelines were set forth in the opinion to help in revising the standard. Within the time allotted, the defendants submitted proposed revisions to the standard. The court first stated that the definition of "sex offense" by reference to specific section of the New Jersey Criminal Code was entirely proper. Furthermore, the court agreed with the categories from which the offenses included in the standard were selected: (1) minors; (2) violence or the threat of violence; or (3) the sale of prohibited sexual goods and services in the course of a business for profit.
- The court stated that the standard failed, however, because of the inclusion of certain phrases in the definition of "sex offense." One section, which provided for the hiring out or employing of minors for mendicant or immoral purposes, the court found to be irrational. This section referred to the disposing "of the child for any mendicant or slandering business." The court pointed out that "mendicant" is defined as "practicing beggary" or "begging" and that wandering business is not necessarily concerned with sex or immorality. The court stated that if such terms were applied to the definition of "sex offenders," the classification would violate the equal protection clause of the fourteenth amendment. The court then discussed other sections of the proposed standard which listed criminal conduct constituting a "sex offense." The court found it impossible to determine the meanings of these paragraphs. The court also stated that defining sexual offenses by reference to specific sections of the New Jersey code would render the standard violative of the equal protection clause since the New Jersey code differs in structure from other state codes. The court thus found the proposed standard to be unconstitutional, but granted the commissioner thirty days to make revisions. (New Jersey Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
CLASSIFICATION

Morris v. Travisono, 499 F.Supp. 149 (D. R.I. 1980). The court held that: (1) prior consent judgment establishing regulations governing disciplinary, classification, and mail procedures at state prisons would not be vacated, either on basis of reversal or prior judgment upon which the consent judgment was allegedly based or on basis of claimed changes in factual circumstances; (2) evidence established that violations of such regulations occurred in the officials' failure to devise treatment and rehabilitation plan for inmate, in officials' failure to provide the prisoner with certain privileges due an inmate classified in category in which the prisoner was classified, and the officials' employment of inappropriate criteria in continuing to classify the prisoner in such category; and (3) prison officials' failure to enumerate more specific criteria than that contained in the prior consent judgment in order to evaluate the prisoner's classification status did not deny the prisoner due process of law. The use of segregation, per se, does not violate the eighth amendment even where the period of segregation for a particular inmate extends into years. (Adult Correctional Institution, Rhode Island)

U.S. Appeals Court
CLASSIFICATION

Withers v. Levine, 615 F.2d 158 (4th Cir. 1980), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 849 (1979). The lack of a classification system which results in placements which promotes inmate on inmate assaults was more than simple negligence and therefore, assaults resulting from such a system stated a claim upon which relief could be granted under U.S.C. Section 1983. (House of Corrections, Maryland)

1981

U.S. Appeals Court
PRETRIAL
DETAINEE
DUE PROCESS

Villanueva v. George, 659 F.2d 851 (1981). A majority of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit, sitting en banc, ruled that the allegations of a pretrial detainee raised a legitimate factual issue as to the constitutionality of the conditions to which he was subjected during his pretrial confinement. The court found, therefore, that the trial judge should have presented the case to the jury rather than directed the verdict against the plaintiff. The circuit court found that the jury might have concluded that the conditions of confinement were punitive in nature. Since the due process clause prohibits the punishment of persons prior to a judgment of conviction, plaintiff Robert Villanueva would have to persuade the jury that punitive conditions existed during his pretrial detention. According to the decision:

The question of whether there is sufficient evidence of the defendants' punitive intent is one for the jury. Moreover, the jury may 'infer that the purpose was punishment from the fact that the condition either bore no reasonable relation to a legitimate goal or exceeded what was necessary for attaining such a goal...' Putnam v. Gerloff, 639 F.2d 415 at 420 (8th Cir. 1981). See also Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. at 539.

There is evidence in this record from which the jury could have reasonably concluded that Villanueva's conditions of confinement were unnecessarily excessive and bore no reasonable relation to a legitimate governmental interest...We emphasize that our decision is not based solely on the fact that Villanueva was confined in a cell measuring six feet by six feet, see Rhodes v. Chapman, 29 CrL 3061 (1981). It is rather based upon the totality of the circumstances, including cell size, time spent in the cell, lack of opportunity for exercise or recreation, general sanitary conditions, and the fact that the appellant's past behavior demonstrated an ability to be confined under less restrictive conditions without incident.

In dicta the court suggests that the classification procedure which resulted in the plaintiff's being placed in segregation while awaiting trial was valid. The procedure took into account the nature of the crime charged and particularly whether the crime was violent or aggressive, the prisoner's desire to remain in a particular classification, the psychological state of the individual and other similar factors. (St. Louis County Adult Correctional Facility, Missouri)

1982

U.S. District Court
PRETRIAL DETAINEE
SEGREGATION

Boudin v. Thomas, 543 F.Supp. 686 (S.D. N.Y. 1982). Administrative detention terminated and contact visits restored by Court. A pretrial detainee sought a writ of habeas corpus challenging her confinement in administrative segregation. The United States District Court held that administrative detention was to be immediately suspended and contact visits between the petitioner and approved visitors were to be initiated, where the detainee had not committed any act or engaged in any conduct threatening herself, staff or institutional security and was not shown to be an escape risk. The defendants presented only vague assertions in attempts to demonstrate the risks posed by contact visits with her infant son. (Metropolitan Correctional Center, New York)

U.S. District Court
CLASSIFICATION

Dillon v. Director, Dept. of Corrections, 552 F.Supp. 30 (W.D. Vir. 1982). Director of state corrections agency not liable for negligent acts in local jails. Although he had a statutory duty to implement standards and goals for local correctional facilities, the court found that the Director of the Virginia Department of Corrections was not liable for isolated acts of negligence that occurred in local jails. The court held that since he had no direct control over city jail employees, he could not be held vicariously liable for their negligent acts.

The plaintiff had alleged that he was the victim of a sexual assault by an adult and two juveniles while incarcerated in the juvenile section of the Roanoke City Jail as a result of various officials' negligence. He was also suing the City of Roanoke, the sheriff, and several jail personnel. The director was dismissed from the suit. (Roanoke City Jail, Virginia)

U.S. District Court
CLASSIFICATION

Grubbs v. Bradley, 552 F.Supp. 1052 (M.D. Tenn. 1982). A classification system may be required. While there is no constitutional right to a classification system, where the absence of such a system substantially contributes to violence in the institution, such a system may be required. Here, the court notes that the classification system is virtually meaningless since cell and work and even institutional assignments are not really made on the basis of other than available space. The court finds that inmates do not have a right to participate in the classification decision since that is a matter of administrative discretion. Prisoners brought a class action suit against the conditions of confinement in certain Tennessee adult prison facilities, alleging unconstitutional conditions. The district court held certain conditions and practices amounted to cruel and unusual punishment. Inmates have no constitutional claim to any particular security classification, but if proof shows a sufficient connection between an improper classification system and the violation of a constitutionally protected right, such as the right to be free from excessive violence, there may be just cause for court intervention. (Tennessee Correctional System)

1983

U.S. Appeals Court
PRETRIAL
DETAINEES
DUE PROCESS

Drayton v. Robinson, 719 F.2d 1214 (3rd Cir. 1983). Appeals court orders the same protections for pretrial detainees as provided to sentenced offenders. Pennsylvania prison officials housed pretrial detainees, at the request of local officials, in state facilities with convicted offenders. At times, detainees were placed in administrative segregation without applying the same policies and procedures used for convicted offenders prior to placement.

The Third Circuit Court of Appeals disagreed with this practice, stating that "...to accept appellants' interpretation of the regulations would create an anomalous situation where inmates who were charged, tried, convicted and sentenced would have greater constitutional protection from segregated confinement than inmates who are merely being held awaiting trial, or convicted but unsentenced."

The court ruled that detainees had as much of a protectable interest in remaining out of administrative segregation as all other inmates at the facility and were entitled to the same protections. (Pennsylvania Bureau of Corrections)

U.S. Supreme Court
CLASSIFICATION
TRANSFER
DUE PROCESS

Olim v. Wakinekona, 461 U.S. 238 (1983). Petitioners were members of a prison "Program Committee" who investigated a breakdown in discipline and the failure of certain programs within the maximum control unit of the Hawaii State Prison outside Honolulu and singled out the respondent and another inmate as troublemakers. After a hearing, the respondent having been notified thereof and having retained counsel to represent him, the same committee recommended that the respondent's classification as a maximum security risk be continued and that he be transferred to a prison on the mainland.

The administrator of the prison accepted the Committee's recommendation, and the respondent was transferred to a California state prison; he then filed suit against the petitioners in federal district court, alleging that he had been denied procedural due process because the Committee that recommended his transfer consisted of the same persons who had initiated the hearing, contrary to a Hawaii prison regulation, and because the Committee was biased against him.

The district court dismissed the complaint, holding that the Hawaii prison regulations governing prison transfers did not create a substantive liberty interest protected by the due process clause of the fourteenth amendment. The court of appeals disagreed and reversed.

The United States Supreme Court held: 1. An interstate prison transfer does not deprive an inmate of any liberty interest protected by the due process clause in and of itself. Just as an inmate has no justifiable expectation that he will be incarcerated in any particular prison within a state so as to implicate the due process clause directly when an intrastate prison transfer is made, Meachum v. Fano, 427 U.S. 215; Montanye v. Haymes, 427 U.S. 236, he has no justifiable expectation that he will be incarcerated in any particular state. Statutes and interstate agreements recognize that, from time to time, it is necessary to transfer inmates to prisons in other states. Confinement in another state is within the normal limits or range of custody which the conviction has authorized the transferring state to impose. Even when, as here, the transfer involves long distances and an ocean crossing, the confinement remains within constitutional limits. Pp. 244-248.

2. Nor do Hawaii's prison regulations create a constitutionally protected liberty interest. Although a state creates a protected liberty interest by placing substantive limitations on official discretion, Hawaii's prison regulations place no substantive limitations on the prison administrator's discretion to transfer an inmate. For that matter, the regulations prescribe no substantive standards to guide the Program Committee whose task is to advise the administrator. Thus no significance attaches to the fact that the prison regulations require a particular kind of hearing before the administrator can exercise his unfettered discretion. Pp. 248-251. 664 F.2d 708, reversed. (Hawaii State Prison)

U.S. Appeals Court
PRETRIAL DETAINEE
FAILURE TO PROTECT

Stokes v. Delcambre, 710 F.2d 1120 (5th Cir. 1983). Award of $380,000 to a college student is upheld by circuit court. In a civil rights suit, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit has upheld a lower court's decision to award $380,000 in compensatory and punitive damages against a Louisiana sheriff and his deputy. The twenty-one year old plaintiff was arrested with three other occupants of a truck after a beer bottle was thrown at a pedestrian. While housed in the dayroom of the local jail, the plaintiff was beaten and forced to engage in sexual acts by two inmates. His yells and screams for help were ignored by jail staff.

The circuit court affirmed the jury award of $205,000 in punitive damages against the sheriff, $105,000 in punitive damages against the deputy, and $70,000 in compensatory damages against both defendants. The court concurred that jailers owe a constitutional duty to prisoners to provide them protection from injury, that the evidence indicated an indifference to the safety of prisoners, that due to the indifference a "good faith" defense was not warranted, and that punitive damages were appropriate because the actions of the defendants were malicious, wanton and oppressive. (Vermillion Parish Jail, Louisiana)

U.S. Appeals Court
CLASSIFICATION

Wilkerson v. Maggio, 703 F.2d 909 (5th Cir. 1983). Inmate's conduct justifies keeping him in maximum security. It was not unreasonable or arbitrary to consider an inmate a security risk since his past prison conduct had warranted the Reclassification Board's decision to keep him in maximum security, the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals has ruled. The inmate's record showed that the inmate had participated in riots, that he attacked and assaulted correctional officers, and that he was convicted for the murder of another inmate. Although the inmate was not permitted any outdoor exercise for five years, he was allowed daily, one hour exercise outside his cell in any manner he desired. As such, no violation of the eighth amendment's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment had occurred. (State Penitentiary, Angola, Louisiana)

1984

U.S. District Court
AIDS
SEPARATION

Cordero v. Coughlin, 607 F.Supp. 9 (S.D. N.Y. 1984). Court upholds practice of segregating prisoners with AIDS. Noting that fellow prisoners ostracize those diagnosed with the disease, and the uncertainty in the medical community concerning its cause and transmission, a federal court upheld the practice of segregating AIDS victims from the general population. (Department of Corrections, New York State)

U.S. District Court
CLASSIFICATION

Monmouth County Correctional Institution Inmates v. Lanzaro, 595 F.Supp. 1417 (D. N.J. 1984). Federal court sets cap on New Jersey county jail population and orders relief for prisoners. After an extensive review of the conditions at the Monmouth County jail the U.S. District Court for the District of New Jersey has concluded that both pretrial and sentenced inmates are being denied constitutional rights.

The court placed a cap on the population of the jail and ordered relief in the areas of physical conditions, bedding, recreation, medical care, classification and visiting. (Monmouth County Correctional Institution, New Jersey)

1985

U.S. District Court
CLASSIFICATION
CRITERIA

Freeman v. Fuller, 623 F.Supp. 1224 (D.C. Fla. 1985). A federal court dismissed an inmate's claim that he suffered mental cruelty by being placed in a cell with those he considered dangerous. The court stated that "decisions regarding classification of prisoners are not usually susceptible to attack through a civil rights claim in federal court unless the circumstances are exceptional." Other procedures established by state and federal prisons provide avenues for grievances. See Young v. Wainwright, 449 F.2d 338 (5th Cir. 1971); and Brooks v. Wainwright, 439 F.Supp. 1335 (M.D. Fla. 1977). (Dade County Jail, Florida)

U.S. District Court
DUE PROCESS

Marshall v. Kozakiewicz, 601 F.Supp. 1549 (1985). A state prison inmate who was briefly housed in a county jail during a post-conviction proceeding brought action against jail officials challenging their custodial classification of him during his stay there. After a United States magistrate entered judgment in favor of county jail officials and against the inmate, the inmate appealed. The district court held that: (1) the Pennsylvania scheme for classifying prisoners at county jails accords county jail officials broad discretion in classification of prisoners, and, therefore, does not create a protectable fourteenth amendment liberty interest, and (2) the county jail memorandum governing high risk security prisoners, as merely a descriptive rather than a substantive predicate, did not create a protectable fourteenth amendment liberty interest. (Allegheny County Jail, Pennsylvania)

1986

U.S. Appeals Court
DUE PROCESS

Beard v. Livesay, 798 F.2d 874 (6th Cir. 1986). A prison inmate brought an action challenging his reclassification without a hearing from minimum security to medium security as violating his liberty interest and his security status. The United States District Court granted summary judgment to the inmate, and the prison officials appealed. The court of appeals held that: (1) Tennessee regulations (requiring elaborate procedures for security reclassification of prison inmates and imposing limitations that the inmate must merit reduction or enhancement of security designation) create a protectable liberty interest; (2) the inmate was not entitled to have his transfer records expunged; and (3) the inmate's reclassification from minimum to medium security would be expunged from record. Prison officials may create liberty interests protected by due process clause by policy statements, regulations, or other official promulgations. Inmates, however, must have a legitimate claim of entitlement to interest, not merely a unilateral expectation. (Bledsoe County, Tennessee Regional Correctional Facility)

U.S. Appeals Court
JUVENILES

H.C. by Hewett v. Jarrard, 786 F.2d 1080 (11th Cir. 1986). A juvenile, who had been confined at a juvenile detention center pending a trial on delinquency charges, brought action for imposition of isolation without notice or hearing, excessive length and conditions of isolation, unjustified and excessive force applied to him by superintendent of the center, and denial of medical care. The United States District Court awarded nominal damages on claims that isolation without notice and hearing and conditions of isolation violated due process and determined that the juvenile had not been deliberately deprived of medical attention, and that battery of the juvenile by the superintendent did not rise to a constitutional violation.

The juvenile appealed. The court of appeals held that: (1) the superintendent's battery of the juvenile violated the juvenile's liberty interests protected by the fourteenth amendment; (2) the superintendent was liable both personally and in his capacity as the center's superintendent for denying the juvenile medical care; (3) compensatory damages should have been awarded to the juvenile for imposition of isolation without procedural due process, for being a period beyond the maximum period set out in relevant regulations, and for his humiliation and dejection sustained as a result of such isolation; and (4) the superintendent's conduct warranted the award of punitive damages. The due process clause forbids punishment of pretrial juvenile detainees; the conditions of a pretrial juvenile detainee incarceration affect interests protected by the fourteenth amendment rather than the eighth amendment.

The superintendent of the juvenile detention center shoved the juvenile and slammed him against a wall and a metal bunk of the isolation cell after the juvenile laughed at a prank of another detainee and protested imposition of isolation of that detainee. This violated liberty interests protected by the fourteenth amendment, where the juvenile had not threatened to harm any property, employees, or other detainees at the center. The juvenile's injuries required medical treatment, and the superintendent's act was one of a series intended to punish the juvenile rather than maintain discipline at the center.

In determining whether the injuries sustained by the juvenile from the conduct of the superintendent of the juvenile detention center violated the juvenile's liberty interests protected by the fourteenth amendment, the fact that the juvenile did not suffer broken bones and permanent disfigurement did not require dismissal of the juvenile's injuries as negligible.

A three-day refusal to provide medical attention to the juvenile detained at the juvenile detention center pending trial on delinquency charges was a reckless disregard of the juvenile's medical needs.

Instead of an award of nominal damages of one dollar, the juvenile, who had been a pretrial detainee at the juvenile detention center, should have been awarded compensatory damages for imposition of isolation without procedural due process, for being a period beyond the maximum period set out in regulations of the Florida Department of Health and Rehabilitative Services, and for his humiliation and dejection sustained as a result of such isolation, where the juvenile was isolated for several days, shackled and handcuffed to a metal bunk for part of that time, and deprived of virtually every physical or emotional stimulus. (Volusia Regional Juvenile Detention Center, Florida)

U.S. Appeals Court
CLASSIFICATION
CRITERIA

Hendking v. Smith, 781 F.2d 850 (11th Cir. 1986). Appeals court upholds classification practices which deny sex offenders participation in certain programs. A class action suit challenged prison rules which denied certain privileges to inmates with histories of violent sex offenses, alleging a violation of equal protection guarantees. The plaintiff argued that sex offenders are no different from other criminals and should be entitled to the same opportunities and privileges during incarceration. The appeals court disagreed with the plaintiff, stating "...it seems clear as a matter of general knowledge that it would not be appropriate to allow sex offenders the opportunity to leave the prison on passes permitting them to mingle with the general public..." The court found that the prison classification system was neither arbitrary nor capricious. (Alabama Prison System)

U.S. District Court

Inmates of Occoquan v. Barry, 650 F.Supp. 619 (D.D.C. 1986). A class of inmates confined at state medium security facilities brought a federal civil rights action seeking declaratory and injunctive relief for deprivation under color of state law of fifth and eighth amendment rights. Overcrowding and systemically deficient conditions at state medium security institutions constituted cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the eighth amendment justifying equitable relief of imposition of cap on a number of inmates at each facility and requirement of periodic reports indicating what steps were being taken to address deficiencies.

The classification of inmates is essential for the prison security. One critical function of classification is the efficient identification of violent, aggressive inmates and those in need of psychiatric care, so that they can be separated from the rest of the population. See, e.g., Palmigiano v. Garrahy, 443 F.Supp. 956 (D.R.I.1977). The classification system at Occoquan appears to be dangerously overtaxed by the crush of inmates in need of classification. (Lorton Correctional Complex, District of Columbia)

U.S. District Court
TRANSFER

Jeffries v. Reed, 631 F.Supp. 1212 (E.D. Wash. 1986). A death row inmate challenged the constitutionality of his transfer to the intensive management unit of the prison and also challenged the conditions of his incarceration in that unit. On cross motions for summary judgment, the district court held that: (1) the transfer of an inmate to a unit on the grounds that he inherently imposed a security risk in light of his sentence did not deny the inmate due process; (2) inspection of the inmate's legal mail by staff of the unit did not violate the inmate's rights of free speech or equal protection; (3) digital rectal search which the inmate underwent prior to being transferred to the unit and strip and visual body-cavity searches he underwent each time he left his cell did not constitute unreasonable searches and seizures; (4) denial of contact with other inmates did not violate the first, sixth, or fourteenth amendments; and (5) the telephone schedule, permitting the inmate to place a collect call to his attorney at least three times per week between the hours of 8:00 a.m. and 4:00 p.m. did not deny the inmate adequate access to counsel and the courts. (Intensive Management Unit, State Prison, Washington)

State Court
TRANSFER
DUE PROCESS

Jenkins v. Fauver, 530 A.2d 790 (N.J. Super. A.D. 1986). According to a state court, inmates do not have a protectable interest arising from a due process clause along in residing in a particular environment. Inmates who, prior to reclassification, had been assigned to "full minimum" custodial status, filed a lawsuit claiming they were denied due process when they were transferred from a minimum security camp to the main prison and had their custodial classification changed to "full minimum, inside only" or "gang minimum." The action was taken in response to a series of escapes of inmates convicted of violent crimes. However, the appeals court, 528 A.2d 563, ruled against the "nonindividualized reclassification" of prison camp inmates with prior homicide convictions. (Rahway State Prison, New Jersey)

U.S. Appeals Court

Johnston v. Lucas, 786 F.2d 1254 (5th Cir. 1986). Prison officials released from liability for prisoner stabbing by appeals court in light of recent Supreme Court rulings. A federal district court awarded a prisoner monetary damages from guards and prison officials for improperly placing him with another prisoner who had known animosity toward him. The appeals court noted that the eighth amendment affords prisoners protection against injury at the hands of another prisoner, but that the Supreme Court had recently stated that "the protections of the Due Process Clause, whether procedural or substantive, are not just triggered by lack of due care by prison officials." Davidson v. Cannon, 106 S.Ct. 668 (1986). While each official bore responsibility for exposing the prisoner to danger, the court found it arguable that their default could be considered an abuse of power and an eighth amendment deprivation. As stated in Whitley v. Albers, 106 S.Ct. 1078 (1986), the deliberate indifference standard articulated in Estelle v. Gamble is appropriate in this case. The appeals court concluded that none of the defendants could be shown to be liable because none of them was guilty of conscious indifference to the danger of or infliction of unnecessary pain. (Parchman State Penitentiary, Mississippi)

U.S. District Court
TRANSFER
DUE PROCESS

Paoli v. Lally, 636 F.Supp. 1252 (D.Md. 1986). The actions of Maryland's Commissioner of Corrections in transferring a prisoner from a minimum security facility to a maximum security institution and in denying minimum security classification did not violate the provisions of Maryland statutes or regulations and did not contravene liberty interests, if any, established by them in favor of persons such as the prisoner. The prisoner suffered from a physiological defect, a testosterone level approximately twice that of a normal male, which gave rise to his criminal behavior. It was an appropriate concern of the commissioner that the prisoner posed a danger to others if he should escape from minimum security and failed to continue to receive regularly scheduled Depo-Provera injections. (Maryland Penitentiary)

U.S. District Court
AIDS
SEPARATION

Powell v. Department of Corrections, State of Okl., 647 F.Supp. 968 (N.D.Okla. 1986). A state prisoner who had tested positive for the AIDS virus brought a Section 1983 action against the Oklahoma Department of Corrections alleging violation of his constitutional rights in his segregation from the general prison population. The prisoner also sought writ of mandamus raising similar issues. The district court held that: (1) conditions of the prisoner's confinement were not violative of his constitutional rights; (2) the prisoner was not denied his right to worship; (3) the prisoner was not denied equal protection of law; and (4) the prisoner was not denied his constitutional right of access to courts. A prisoner does not have a federal constitutional right to be placed in the general prison population. The conditions of a prisoner's confinement after he tested positive for the AIDS virus, in which the prisoner was segregated from the general prison population but provided limited access to all prison programs and services and allowed to exercise, were not violative of the prisoner's constitutional rights. The prisoner was not denied his right to worship by being prohibited from attending group worship services where prohibition was intended for the health of the prisoners and to protect the prisoner from threatened harm, and where the prisoner had regular access to the prison chaplain. (Department of Corrections, Oklahoma)

U.S. Appeals Court
PRETRIAL
DETAINEES

Reece v. Gragg, 650 F.Supp. 1297 (10th Cir. 1986). A pretrial detainee representing a class of all present and future pretrial detainees and sentenced inmates held in the county jail brought action seeking injunctive relief to require that operation of the jail under present conditions cease. The district court held that: (1) the current operation and condition of the county jail violated the due process clause of the fifth and fourteenth amendments and the eighth amendment's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment, and (2) due to unconstitutional conditions at the jail, an injunction was warranted, but would be stayed under conditions outlined by court. To the extent that the county jail is unable to segregate pretrial detainees and sentenced inmates, the higher standard applicable under the due process clause, rather than the eighth amendment, must be met by the entire facility. (Sedgwick County Jail, Kansas)

U.S. Appeals Court
CLASSIFICATION
CRITERIA

Shelby County Jail Inmates v. Westlake, 798 F.2d 1085 (7th Cir. 1986). Conditions of the Shelby County Jail in Indiana did not violate the constitutional rights of inmates, says a U.S. Appeals Court. Inmates at the Shelby County Jail (SCJ) filed a suit alleging that the totality of conditions and practices at SCJ violated their constitutional rights. The inmates claimed the jail's twenty footcandles of illumination did not meet minimum standards. The county's expert, however, took readings in the courtroom which revealed eighteen footcandles at the judge's bench. The inmates complained that they did not have any meaningful opportunity for outdoor exercise or activities. The county testified the inmates were allowed to play cards and board games, read books, ride exercise bikes, and were provided with American Medical Association booklets on indoor exercise. The inmates contended that SCJ's classification system failed to adequately segregate pretrial and convicted prisoners, males and females, and juveniles and adults. The county rebutted. The inmates also alleged that inmates with emotional and medical problems were not segregated from the general population. The county testified otherwise, maintaining that incoming inmates were screened, and serious medical and emotional conditions were sent to the county hospital or mental health center. The appeals court determined that the county presented sufficient evidence to support a finding that none of the conditions amounted to constitutional violations. (Shelby County Jail, Indiana)

U.S. Appeals Court
DUE PROCESS

Stokes v. Fair, 795 F.2d 235 (1st Cir. 1986). A Massachusetts prison inmate challenged the imposition of "awaiting action status" detention regulations alleging noncompliance with due process. The district court entered a summary judgment in favor of the inmate, and the correction official appealed. The court of appeals held that "awaiting action status" detention regulations created a liberty interest entitling the inmate to procedural due process in initiation and continuance of awaiting action status detention. Regulations authorizing placement of a prison inmate in "awaiting action status" pending other procedures and specifying conditions under which inmates may be reclassified to higher custody status created liberty interest entitling inmates to procedural due process in initiation and continuance of awaiting action status detention through use of unmistakably mandatory language and substantive predicates for such change in status. (Department of Corrections, Massachusetts)

U.S. District Court
SUICIDE
FAILURE TO PROTECT

Strandell v. Jackson County, Ill., 634 F.Supp. 824 (S.D.Ill. 1986). The parents of a pretrial detainee who committed suicide brought a civil rights action against the county and the prison officials. The district court held that: (1) the parents stated a claim that the detainee was deprived of due process right to be free from punishment; (2) the parents stated cause of action under Illinois statutes and regulations; (3) the county was not immune from liability; (4) the county sheriff, jailor and superintendent were not immune from liability; (5) parents could not recover punitive damages or prejudgment interest; and (6) the district court would retain pendent jurisdiction over state law claims. Mandatory language of Illinois county jail standards providing that detainee shall be assigned to suitable quarters, that emotionally disturbed detainee shall be kept under constant supervision, and that suspected disturbed detainee shall be immediately examined by a physician creates a protected liberty interest and an expectation of certain minimal standards and treatment. The parents stated a civil rights cause of action under the fourth and fourteenth amendments by alleging that prison officials violated the detainee's liberty interest and expectation of certain minimal standards for the physical condition of the jail facility, as established by Illinois regulations, and an expectation of treatment that protects safety, health, and well-being of pretrial detainees.

No protected liberty interest could be premised on state jail standards relating to the physical condition of the jail, with respect to action based on the suicide of a pretrial detainee while confined in the county jail, where state jail standards did not require the county jail which had been built in 1926 to comply with standards regarding physical conditions until January 1986, and the death occurred in March 1984. The fact that the individual inmate could not, under state law, demand compliance with state jail standards, did not establish that inmates had no claim of entitlement to have those standards followed, where state Department of Corrections was given right to enforce compliance with state jail standards. (Jackson County Jail, Illinois)

U.S. District Court

Strickland v. Dyer, 628 F.Supp. 180 (E.D.Ark. 1986). An inmate brought an action challenging his reclassification by a prison disciplinary committee. On the defendants' motion to dismiss, the district court held that an Arkansas statute governing classification of inmates did not protect the inmate's right to any particular classification, so that reduction of the inmate's classification for violation of a prison rule did not violate the inmate's due process rights. (Department of Corrections, Arkansas)

1987

U.S. District Court
DUE PROCESS

Bruscino v. Carlson, 654 F.Supp. 609 (S.D. Ill. 1987). Action was brought by federal inmates complaining of use of excessive force, performance of rectal searches, amount of time they had to spend in their cell, transfer procedures and various other conditions that had existed at prison since "lockdown" began. On objections to magistrate's report and recommendation, the district court held that: (1) restraining control unit inmates during legal visits did not violate their right of access to the courts; (2) rectal searches at the prison did not constitute unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain within the meaning of the eighth amendment; (3) restraining federal inmates to beds for prolonged periods without checking them every thirty minutes violated federal regulations but because incidents were isolated, there was no policy or practice of abuse and thus no constitutional violation requiring injunctive relief; (4) "out of cell time" granted federal prisoners for exercise and recreation did not violate the eighth amendment where the inmates in disciplinary segregation and protective custody were allowed five hours exercise per week outside their cells, and the prisoners in control unit were permitted seven hours exercise per week, and general population inmates received eleven hours of exercise per week; and (5) inmates had no right to a due process hearing before placement at and/or transfer to a maximum security federal prison. Although control unit inmates at the prison were given a hearing before placement in that unit, there were distinct differences between conditions of confinement for general population and control unit. (Marion Penitentiary, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEGREGATION

Bailey v. Shillinger, 828 F.2d 651 (10th Cir. 1987). After his voluntary transfer to a prison in another state, a Wyoming state prisoner who was serving a sentence for first degree murder murdered another prisoner and was returned to the Wyoming State Prison. The warden assigned him to a maximum security unit without a formal hearing. The prisoner filed a civil rights lawsuit against the warden, alleging his due process rights had been violated. He also charged that he was subjected to cruel and unusual punishment by being deprived of exercise and fresh air. The appeals court concluded that, because of the danger the inmate presented to other inmates and staff, the court concluded the warden was correct in assigning the inmate to maximum security. As to the cruel and unusual treatment charge, the court concluded that the one hour per day of exercise and fresh air was "restrictive" but did not violate the Eighth Amendment. (Wyoming State Prison)

U.S. Appeals Court
DUE PROCESS
SEGREGATION

Bolden v. Alston, 810 F.2d 353 (2nd Cir. 1987), cert. denied, 108 S.Ct. 229. A prisoner alleged that his right to due process was violated when the same officer acted as both investigative officer and hearing officer at the prisoner's disciplinary proceeding. The appeals court ruled that the level of procedural protection due a prison inmate involved in disciplinary proceedings differs according to the purpose of confinement. Because the prisoner was confined pending disposition of a misconduct charge, his confinement following adjustment committee proceeding needed only to satisfy a lesser due process standard set out in Helms--that is, some notice of charges against him and an opportunity to present his views to the prison official charged with deciding whether to transfer him to administrative segregation. (Lincoln Correctional Facility)

U.S. Appeals Court
DISCIPLINE
CORRESPONDENCE

Brooks v. Andolina, 826 F.2d 1266 (3rd Cir. 1987). A federal appeals court ruled that (1) it is unlawful to place an inmate in segregation simply because he wrote a letter complaining of a female employee's search of a visitor, (2) prison officials' refusal to permit an inmate to call any witnesses at a disciplinary proceeding violated the inmate's procedural due process rights, and (3) the inmate was not entitled to lost wages. An inmate complained in a letter to the NAACP that a female correctional officer searched his visitor in a seductive manner. He was issued a misconduct report for disrespect toward a staff member, and after a hearing, was sentenced to 30 days punitive segregation. The Third Circuit Court of Appeals noted that the Supreme Court has clearly ruled that prison officials may not censor inmate correspondence to eliminate unflattering or unwelcome opinions, (Procunier v. Martinez, 416 U.S. 396). Further, prison officials cannot punish inmates for statements made in letters to outsiders, even if the inmate could be punished if he made the statements orally to a prison employee. The court continued that if regulations concerning censoring are in existence, they must be for the purpose of security, order, or rehabilitation. Because prison officials cannot censor unflattering statements in letters to outsiders, they cannot punish an inmate for the contents of such letters; therefore, the action taken against Brooks for writing the letter violated his constitutional rights. Prison officials' refusal to permit an inmate to call any witnesses at a disciplinary proceeding violated the inmate's procedural due process rights. The officials failed to show that permitting an inmate to call witnesses would have been unduly hazardous to the institutional safety or correctional goals, and to the extent that refusal by prison officials to permit the inmate to call witnesses at a disciplinary proceeding was based on the inmate's failure to comply with the rule requiring prehearing identification of witnesses. The refusal was clearly arbitrary and capricious in that the rule was a new rule to which the inmate had no access and with which the inmate had no opportunity to comply. The inmate, who was sentenced in a disciplinary proceeding to 30 days punitive segregation in violation of his First and Fourteenth Amendment rights, was not entitled to damages for lost wages in his Section 1983 action against prison officials; even though the inmate testified that he lost wages as a result of the unwarranted transfer to punitive segregation, the inmate failed to offer any evidence as to what those wages were. (State Correctional Institute at Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania)

State Appeals Court
PRETRIAL
DETAINEES
SEPARATION
FAILURE TO PROTECT

DeBow v. City of East St. Louis, 510 N.E.2d 895 (Ill. App. 1987), cert. denied, 116 Il2d 552. A detainee was injured during his confinement in a city lockup. He was arrested for illegal transportation of alcohol and he was placed in the same cell with a man arrested for aggravated assault. The plaintiff was later found unconscious on the floor of the cell with a severe head injury. Blood was found on one of the boots that were in the possession of the other occupant of the cell. The injured detainee sued the city and its police chief alleging that pre-trial detainees were inadequately supervised, that officers failed to monitor their conduct and failed to segregate violent detainees from other detainees. The inmate suffered permanent brain injury from the assault and a jury initially awarded $3.4 million in damages. On appeal, the court upheld this award, noting that "specific intent" to deprive the detainee of his rights was not required. The state appeals court found that the plaintiff had established that the defendants had received numerous notices of noncompliance with minimum jail safety standards, including a warning that detainees were being inadequately supervised. Hourly visual checks of detainees were not being conducted and no one understood it to be their official duty to conduct such routine checks. According to the court, it is sufficient that the defendants acted recklessly by disregarding detainee safety. This disregard can be demonstrated either by both deliberate acts or by the failure to act. Since the repeated notices of noncompliance with safety standards provided notice of unsafe conditions, the appeals court agreed that the jury could conclude that the failure to act to correct the situation was reckless. (City of East St. Louis, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
AIDS

Dinger v. City of New Albany, 662 F.Supp. 929 (S.D. Ind. 1987). A civil rights action was filed against the city and a police officer by three inmates. They claimed that they were exposed to AIDS while confined, violating their Eighth Amendment right against cruel and unusual punishment. They requested that all inmates be given AIDS screening tests and all homosexual inmates be segregated. The court said that exposing inmates to a communicable disease may violate their constitutional rights, but that the problem of protecting inmates against AIDS is "best left to the legislature and prison administrators." (City of New Albany, Indiana)

U.S. District Court
DUE PROCESS

Hechavarria v. Quick, 670 F.Supp. 456 (D.R.I. 1987). A Rhode Island regulation providing that an inmate shall receive timely written notice when a downgrading of his classification is being considered, and a regulation providing that no misconduct shall be considered by the classification board unless the disciplinary board has made a finding unfavorable to the inmate, do not create a liberty interest in a particular prison classification. The regulations are purely procedural in nature, and do not state that an inmate has a vested right to a particular prison status. (Rhode Island Adult Correctional Institution)

U.S. Appeals Court
DUE PROCESS

Hernandez v. Johnston, 833 F.2d 1316 (9th Cir. 1987). A prisoner challenged state prison officials alleging that certain statements in his prison file were false and deprived him of liberty without due process. The inmate argued that the statements that classified him as a "violent offender" and stated that he needed a "structured setting" were incorrect since the burglary offense for which he was incarcerated was nonviolent. The inmate felt that, without due process findings, the court should "put a stop to the prison policy of using pseudo-legalistic, psychological, etc., terms against prisoners." The appeals court ruled that even if a state Criminal Records Privacy Act created a liberty interest in accurate prison record information, it applied to criminal history record information, not opinions or evaluations. The court also held that the prisoner had no state or federal constitutional right to a particular classification status. Finally, neither a due process clause nor Washington law creates a liberty interest in prison education or rehabilitation classes. (McNeil Island Corrections Center)

U.S. District Court
CLASSIFICATION
CRITERIA

Jones v. Hodge, 662 F.Supp. 254 (E.D.N.C. 1987). A North Carolina inmate did not have a constitutionally protected interest in a more desirable custody classification. The federal district court would not recognize a liberty interest in a prisoner's custody classification unless state law or prison regulations used explicitly mandatory language in requiring that administrators use specific substantive procedures in setting or modifying the inmate's classification. (North Carolina)

U.S. District Court
AIDS
ISOLATION

Judd v. Packard, 669 F.Supp. 741 (D.Md. 1987). After noticing that an inmate suffered from various illnesses and weight loss, prison officials put him in medical isolation on three separate occasions for testing, diagnostic and treatment purposes, including testing for exposure to AIDS. After testing positive for the HTLV-III antibody present in those exposed to AIDS, the inmate filed a federal lawsuit claiming that each placing of him in isolation was an act of discrimination on the basis of a handicap, i.e., a positive HTLV-III test, and consequently, a violation of his civil rights. The federal district court found that there was no claim under the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, 29 U.S.C. Sec. 794, because the inmate had not alleged any "nexus" between the allegedly discriminatory conduct of the defendant prison officials and a specific program receiving federal funding. The court also that, even assuming that testing positive for HTLV-III constituted a handicap, discrimination against handicapped individuals "is not invidious discrimination, and thus, it is not subject to strict or heightened judicial scrutiny." Therefore, the court found that the correct test to be applied was whether the prison's actions had a legitimate purpose and whether it was rational to believe that the treatment afforded the individual would promote that purpose. (Mayo Correctional Institution, Maryland)

U.S. District Court
AIDS
SEGREGATION

McDuffie v. Rikers Island Medical Department, 668 F.Supp. 328 (S.D.N.Y. 1987). A federal district court ruled against a prisoner who filed a civil rights suit against prison officials, alleging that misdiagnosis of an AIDS-related ailment resulted in his placement in segregated housing for five months. The court found that the prisoner's allegations failed to establish a claim of deliberate indifference to serious medical needs. The diagnosis was made in 1982, prior to the development of a test for the AIDS virus, and was on the basis of two skin biopsies which were consistent with Kaposi's Sarcoma, which is a form of cancer common to AIDS patients. The court concluded that the diagnosis was not grossly negligent when the prisoner was later determined not to have AIDS. The court further ruled that the prisoner's allegations failed to establish a claim of deliberate indifference to serious medical needs--the prisoner did not allege that he suffered any physical harm due to the misdiagnosis or that medical officials deliberately ignored his serious medical needs, and there was no indication of gross negligence in the initial AIDS diagnosis. (Downstate Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
SEPARATION
FAILURE TO PROTECT PRETRIAL
DETAINEES

Ryan v. Burlington County, 674 F.Supp. 464 (D.N.J. 1987), cert. denied, 109 S.Ct. 1745. A pretrial detainee rendered quadriplegic by his cellmate, a state prisoner who had been awaiting transfer to a state run facility as a parole violator for 58 days alleged deprivation of a constitutional right in an action against various state and county defendants. The federal district court ruled that pretrial detainees had a constitutional right to be housed separately from known dangerous convicted inmates who posed a threat to their personal security unless physical facilities did not permit their separation and that the detainee could prove a constitutional violation if he could prove at trial that classification was feasible at the county jail. Affirmed 860 F.2d 1199. (Burlington County Jail, New Jersey)

State Appeals Court
JUVENILES

State Ex. Rel. M.L.N. v. Greiner, 360 S.E.2d 554 (W.Va. 1987). Prisoners filed petitions challenging their confinement in correctional center. A state appeals court held that juveniles between the ages of 18 and 20 who remained under jurisdiction of juvenile court may not be incarcerated within sight or sound of adult prisoners. Juveniles who remain under continuing juvenile court jurisdiction even after their 18th birthday must be afforded the same commitment and rehabilitation rights as delinquent juveniles under the age of 18 who are under the juvenile court jurisdiction. Due process requires that nature of custody of juvenile bear relation to rehabilitative purpose. (Wood County Correctional Center)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEGREGATION

Tyler v. Black, 811 F.2d 424 (8th Cir. 1987), cert. denied, 109 S.Ct. 1760. On appeal, a federal court held that: (1) the mass transfer of inmate to a segregation unit during a period of prison unrest did not violate due process, but (2) double celling of inmates in small cells with solid "boxcar" type doors was cruel and unusual punishment in violation of Eighth Amendment. The mass transfer of inmates to a segregation unit during a period of prison unrest did not violate due process, where inmates were given post transfer hearings, the warden perceived move as a necessary emergency security measure, no punitive purpose was involved, and the transfers were purely temporary administrative segregations. However, double celling of inmates in segregation unit in small cells with solid "boxcar" type doors was cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the eighth amendment. Inmates with history of assaultive behavior were placed in closed cells for up to 23 hours a day for a period of several months. (Missouri State Penitentiary, Special Management Facility)

State Court
DUE PROCESS

White v. Fauver, 530 A.2d 37 (N.J. Super. A.D. 1987). An inmate at a prison appealed the final decision of the Department of Corrections affirming a classification committee's decision to reduce his custody status. The Superior Court held that: (1) the inmate had no constitutionally protected liberty interest in his reduced custody status in prison, and (2) an inmate whose custody status was increased, not as result of any activity on his part between reduction of status and increase, but rather as a result of a change in approach, motivated by escape of another prisoner, received all due process to which he was entitled. A change in inmate's security classification within prison must be for cause and not arbitrary. (Adult Diagnostic & Treatment Center, New Jersey)

1988

U.S. District Court
AIDS

Baez v. Rapping, 680 F.Supp. 112 (S.D.N.Y. 1988). An inmate charged that he was segregated and discriminated against after he tested positive for the AIDS virus. According to the inmate, he was denied access to courts, the law library, church and recreational activities after medical authorities issued advice to staff to avoid his body fluids. The district court held that the medical director and his staff were entitled to qualified immunity against the lawsuit. The claim against the warden was allowed to proceed. The warden claimed the detainee was in segregation because of his "deviant behavior," not because of his medical condition. There was no evidence given to the court that the inmate had been given any notice of the reason for his segregation or a chance to be heard. Therefore, there was a question of fact as to whether or not he had been deprived of his rights without due process. Although an earlier decision by the court had upheld the authority of the jail to segregate inmates with AIDS, the court found in this case that the inmate had a right to know of AIDS was the reason for his segregation. The court allowed the claim for punitive damages to proceed, since the prisoner's charges were that he "may be the victim of malicious and discriminatory treatment" because of his condition. (Westchester County Jail, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
PROTECTIVE
CUSTODY

David K. v. Lane, 839 F.2d 1265 (7th Cir. 1988). White inmates at Illinois' Pontiac Correctional Center sued officials on the grounds that their failure to aggressively halt gang influence violated their right to equal protection. Inmates in protective custody are confined more hours each day and have less job opportunities. While 2 percent of the total inmate population is white, 40 percent of the white population is in protective custody compared to 9 percent of the black population and 13 percent of the hispanic population. The plaintiffs alleged that the proportion of white inmates in protective custody stems from officials' failure to discipline non-violent displays of gang membership. But the appeals court ruled that, even though a policy of punishing gang "activity," but not displays of "gang membership" results in an inordinately high number of white inmates needing protective custody, prison officials aren't guilty of discrimination. In ruling against the white inmates, the court found that they had presented no evidence that "a racially-based discriminatory purpose...has shaped the Pontiac administration's gang activity policy." However, even while finding that prison officials were not guilty of unlawful discrimination, the court criticized their policy suggesting that display of gang insignia or letting inmates control prison job assignments should not be permitted. The court ruled the prison officials to "take a firmer control and seek to ultimately eliminate gang affiliation by such reasonable methods as it may develop." The court also rejected the inmates' claim that Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 was violated. Title VI, 42 U.S.C. Sec. 2000d, prohibits discrimination in the use of federal funds. While the prison receives federal funds for forecasting models, there was no evidence that these funds directly benefited or related to the implementation of gang regulations and protective custody procedures. [Subsequent federal legislation may alter future courts' analysis of similar situations.] (Illinois' Pontiac Correctional Center)

State Appeals Court
FAILURE TO PROTECT JUVENILES

Dept. of Health & Rehab. Serv. v. Whaley, 531 So.2d 723 (Fla.App. 4 Dist. 1988). A juvenile detainee was awarded $100,000 in damages and his father was awarded $5,575 in damages, for injuries sustained as a result of an alleged sexual assault by a fellow detainee in a juvenile detention intake facility. The white, 14-year-old, 98 pound youth, was arrested for burglary and placed in a holding cell with two older black youths, 15 and 16 years old, weighing 160 and 195 pounds respectively. The other two youths were charged with burglary and armed robbery. While one had a history of several violent crimes charged (most of which had been dismissed), there was no past history of sexual assault. The two allegedly forced him to perform fellatio on one of them. Following the youth's release, he received psychiatric treatment for "post-traumatic stress syndrome", but no medical treatment for any physical injury was required. The appeals court upheld the jury verdict, noting that there was a duty to protect an alleged juvenile delinquent in custody from potential harm by third persons where the risk of such harm is foreseeable. The court rejected an argument that sovereign immunity applied in this instance, noting that insurance for just such liability existed. (Juvenile Detention Intake Facility, West Palm Beach, Florida)

U.S. District Court
AIDS
TRANSFER
SEPARATION

Doe v. Coughlin, 697 F.Supp. 1234 (N.D.N.Y. 1988). An inmate brought an action on behalf of a class of inmates confined in correctional facility in New York seeking preliminary injunction prohibiting further implementation of a program involving the involuntary transfer of inmates who tested positive for Human Immunodeficiency Virus to a separate dormitory. The district court granted the request, finding that the inmate was entitled to a preliminary injunction. The inmate, who had tested positive for the Human Immunodeficiency Virus, had a standing to maintain a cause of action challenging, on the right to privacy grounds, the involuntary transfer of all inmates who tested positive for HIV to a special dormitory, even though the inmate had not yet been transferred, where the Department of Correctional Services officials unambiguously maintained they intended to go forward with their program of placing all positive testing inmates in a special dormitory, and such placement would effectively reveal the inmate's medical conditions to third parties without his consent. There were approximately 400 known cases where inmates had tested positive for the HIV virus, and questions of law concerning the right of privacy and the reasonableness of the transfer program were common to all proposed class members. Claims and defenses of each member arose from the same course of conduct, and maintaining the anonymity of the class members established an additional reason for certification. Although improving and expediting the medical care for such inmates was a desirable and highly commendable objective, the involuntary segregation of the inmates violated the inmates' constitutional rights to privacy, and the same objectives could be provided in a program designed to allow the inmates a choice of whether they wished to be housed in a separate dormitory. The court noted that there are "few matters" of a more personal nature, and there are "few decisions" over which a person could have a "greater desire to exercise control," than the manner in which he reveals a diagnosis of positive exposure to AIDS to others, including other inmates and family members. (New York State Department of Correctional Services)

U.S. Appeals Court
SUICIDE
SPECIAL NEEDS
PRETRIAL
DETAINEES

Estate of Cartwright v. City of Concord, Cal., 856 F.2d 1437 (9th Cir. 1988). A mother of a pretrial detainee who committed suicide by hanging himself in a city jail brought a Section 1983 action against the city and city employees for alleged violation of constitutional rights. The United States District Court entered judgment for the defendants following a bench trial, and the mother appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the city jail employees did not violate the constitutional rights of the pretrial detainee in failing to prevent him from committing suicide. Although the jailers overheard him speaking of suicide, none of the detainee's other statements gave them reason to believe that he needed preventive care. The jailers took reasonable steps to safeguard him by taking away all his possessions except "soft clothing," and placed him in a cell with another detainee. He was also checked periodically. (Concord City Jail, Concord, California)

U.S. Appeals Court
MENTALLY ILL
FAILURE TO PROTECT

Gardner v. Cato, 841 F.2d 105 (5th Cir. 1988). An inmate filed a civil rights lawsuit against the county jail and its personnel, after he had without notice or warning, gotten a dark liquid thrown in his face by his mentally unstable cellmate. The court found that placement of the prisoner in a cell with a mentally unstable inmate who had access to cleaning chemicals at best raised an issue of negligence by the defendants, a claim not seen as a violation of the Fourteenth Amendment in a civil rights action. Because he was given extensive medical treatment, the court found that it was "frivolous" to claim that the defendants displayed a deliberate indifference or disregard for the inmate's medical needs. (Guadalupe County Jail)

U.S. Appeals Court
DUE PROCESS
SEPARATION

Gladson v. Rice, 862 F.2d 711 (8th Cir. 1988). A prisoner brought a Section 1983 action to challenge his temporary confinement, in a county jail, apart from the general inmate population during his ten-day transfer from a state penitentiary in connection with post-conviction proceedings on his behalf. The U.S. District Court granted summary judgment in favor of the county sheriff and members of the jail staff, and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed the lower court decision, finding that the prisoner's due process rights were not violated by the confinement. Prison officials received information from the penitentiary personnel that the prisoner was considered an escape risk who had a potential for violence, and there was no appreciable difference between the prisoner's basic status and living conditions in the penitentiary and those in the jail to which he was temporarily assigned. The court also found that the prisoner's constitutional guarantee against cruel and unusual punishment was not violated by the county prison's denial to him of unlimited access to certain amenities and privileges such as radio, television, telephone, showers, visitors, exercise, and cigarettes. The jail officials evaluated the prisoner's potential threat to the jail security in light of the information received from the correctional officials at the state penitentiary, and they provided the prisoner with a substantial equivalent of his penitentiary living arrangement. (Polk County Jail, Iowa)

U.S. Appeals Court
AIDS
FAILURE TO PROTECT

Glick v. Henderson, 855 F.2d 536 (8th Cir. 1988). A civil rights suit was dismissed by a federal trial court alleging failure and refusal of various prison officials to protect inmates from exposure to AIDS, and the dismissal was upheld by the appeals court. The plaintiffs in this case claimed that at least five inmates in the facility have tested positive for the virus which causes AIDS. The inmates also argued that the prison neither tested inmates and personnel for exposure to the AIDS virus nor segregated all those who did test positive. The inmates felt that the combination of these factors, along with the existence of practicing homosexuals within the facility, placed them in immediate danger of contracting AIDS because of the daily interactions which take place among inmates and jail officials. Medical authorities testified that the inmates' complaint was based on "unsubstantiated fears and ignorance," which included allegations that they face a risk of contracting AIDS by: (1) coming into contact with the sweat of other inmates during work detail; (2) being subjected to bites from mosquitoes which have bitten other inmates; (3) being sneezed on by known homosexuals; (4) having food prepared by officials who are not tested for AIDS; and/or (5) the regular transfer of prisoners from cell to cell throughout the facility. The court found that these means are too remote to provide the proper basis for a grievance. These, along with other significant risks, which are not comprehended by medical science as creating a genuine concern for transmission of AIDS, were insufficient to entitle court intervention. (Arkansas Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
FAILURE TO PROTECT

Harris by and Through Harris v. Maynard, 843 F.2d 414 (10th Cir. 1988). Prison officials were not immune from liability under 42 U.S.C.A. Section 1983 for a deceased inmate's unexplained and violent murder in the prison facility. Wanton or obdurate disregard of or deliberate indifference to a prisoner's right to life as a condition of confinement was a substantive constitutional deprivation. Material issues of fact existed as to whether state correctional officials evidenced deliberate indifference in connection with an inmate's unexplained death. Summary judgment was precluded. The inmate's mother had made phone calls to prison officials expressing her son's need for protection from other inmates. The order requiring separation of the inmate from fellow inmates was not enforced, and the inmate's mother had been denied access to the deceased inmate's personal effects, including threatening letters from the other inmate. (McAlester, Oklahoma Prison)

U.S. District Court
AIDS
PRETRIAL
DETAINEES

Moenius v. Stevens, 688 F.Supp. 1054 (D. Maryland, 1988). An arrestee filed suit in state and federal court, alleging that the jailor's discretionary decision to place him in a detention cell bearing a sign entitled "AIDS cell" intentionally and maliciously inflicted emotional distress. The arrestee sought compensatory and punitive damages from the mayor and city council as well as the jailor. According to the police sergeant, the idea of putting the sign on the cell was conceived because some prisoners were under the impression that they wouldn't be searched for drugs if they told turnkeys that they were infested with AIDS. By putting a sign on the cell the jail personnel were hoping that the arrested person would see it and admit that they really didn't have AIDS, and to go ahead and search them. The court held that these facts showed "at most" a "half-baked idea of unknown origin which terminated at the first inquiry by supervising officials in the police department." The federal court granted summary judgment for the mayor, city council and the jailor. State claims that arose out of the incident were allowed to proceed to trial. (Baltimore City Police Department, Maryland)

U.S. Appeals Court
AIDS

Muhammand v. Carlson, 845 F.2d 175 (8th Cir. 1988), cert. denied, 109 S.Ct. 1346. An inmate alleged that he was deprived of a constitutionally protected liberty interest when he was transferred to, and confined in, a restricted AIDS unit. The appeals court ruled that the prison regulations for identifying, treating, and isolating prisoners carrying the AIDS virus did not give the inmate a reasonable expectation that he would not be transferred to the AIDS unit without a chance to challenge his medical classification and the regulations governing administrative detention did not apply to medical determinations. The court found that the true purpose of the transfer was for diagnostic, treatment and security purposes, and although the inmate was stigmatized by his classification in confinement in restricted unit for inmates carrying AIDS virus, that stigma arose primarily from public fear of, and misunderstanding about, disease, not from prison medical officials' misconduct and, therefore, stigma did not amount to infringement of inmate's constitutionally protected liberty interest. (United States Medical Center for Federal Prisoners in Springfield, Missouri)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEPARATION
FAILURE TO PROTECT CLASSIFICATION
CRITERIA

Walsh v. Mellas, 837 F.2d 789 (7th Cir. 1988), cert. denied, 108 S.Ct. 2832. A federal appeals court found that a state prison's classification and assignment procedures are unconstitutional insofar as they do not even require a review of an inmate's file before assigning him a cell or work partner. A prisoner filed suit after he was assaulted by his cellmate. The court found that in spite of prison officials' awareness of the general risk of gang-related violence against individuals targeted by gangs within the prison, they failed to institute procedures and safeguards in an attempt to determine whether an inmate to be housed with a gang member is targeted by that gang. (Stateville Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
TRUSTY

Whittington v. Lynaugh, 842 F.2d 818 (5th Cir. 1988), cert. denied, 109 S.Ct. 108. An inmate's civil rights complaint alleging that prison officials discriminated against him by not raising him to a trusty level that would have enabled him to have some time outdoors was frivolous. According to the court, the case was a classic one of an inmate making wholly unsupported allegations of a minor discrimination against him in his prison status, and then tying up the courts for three years. The inmate had no factual support for his protest. Ordering $15 to be withdrawn from a prisoner's prison account to reimburse the court for court costs incurred in the prisoner's frivolous Section 1983 action, which was based on the claim that he was not being moved up the trusty ladder as fast as he felt he was entitled to and was unsupported by facts, was a proper sanction under Rule 11. (Texas Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEGREGATION
DUE PROCESS

Williams v. Armontrout, 852 F.2d 377 (8th Cir. 1988), cert. denied, 109 S.Ct. 564. An inmate filed a pro se complaint, alleging that his due process rights were violated when he was not returned to the general prison population after confinement in administrative segregation. A federal appeals court held that prison regulations governing procedures to be used in determining whether to reclassify prisoner did not create a liberty interest. Department of Corrections regulations governing procedures to be used in determining whether prisoner placed in administrative segregation should be returned to general prison population did not create constitutionally protected liberty interest; regulations did not contain any substantive criteria to be used in deciding whether to reclassify prisoner, but merely established procedures to be utilized. (Missouri State Penitentiary)

State Appeals Court
CLASSIFICATION
CRITERIA
DUE PROCESS

Wolfe v. State, 759 P.2d 950 (Idaho App. 1988). An inmate sought a writ of habeas corpus challenging his classification in prison. The district court affirmed the decision of the Magistrate dismissing the petition, and the inmate appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the inmate's due process rights were not violated when the classification committee considered hearsay materials in the presentence report in making its classification determination. The prison classification committee did not act arbitrarily when it ascribed risk points for classification purposes to an inmate who had been charged with escape. The court rejected an argument that the committee improperly assessed "points" upon the escape charge which had not been tried and proven. "We cannot say that a committee acts arbitrarily when it ascribes a risk to an inmate who has been charged with escape." The court noted that the committee acted only after the inmate had been given notice, a hearing, the right to present his side of the story and the opportunity to present witnesses on his behalf. (Idaho State Correctional Institution)

1989

U.S. Appeals Court POLICY/PROCEDURE
DUE PROCESS

Abernathy v. Perry, 869 F.2d 1146 (8th Cir. 1989). A prisoner brought a Section 1983 suit claiming his due process rights were violated when he was placed on investigative status for 35 days. The U.S. District Court dismissed the action and the prisoner appealed. The Court of Appeals held that, although the prison policy gave the prisoner a liberty interest in remaining in the general population, his due process rights were not violated when he apparently failed to receive some of the five-day extension notices necessary to extend his restrictive confinement to 35 days, affirming the lower court decision. (Tucker Maximum Security Unit, Dept. of Corr., Arkansas)

U.S. District Court
DUE PROCESS
TRANSFER

Baptist v. Lane, 708 F.Supp. 920 (N.D. Ill. 1989). The U.S. District Court ruled that inmates' due process rights were not violated when they were transferred from a minimum security farm at a correctional center back into general population of the maximum security unit. According to the court, no state prisoner has an inherent due process right either to serve his sentence in a particular prison or section of prison or to receive a particular security classification. The state regulation governing inmate transfers effectively allows prison officials to reassign inmates for any reason. Therefore, inmates did not have a justifiable expectation of remaining on the farm to support a due process challenge to their transfer. Their due process claims were frivolous, and they were not entitled to file a civil rights action in forma pauperis. (Stateville Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
CLASSIFICATION
CRITERIA
TRANSFER

Baraldini v. Thornburgh, 884 F.2d 615 (D.C. Cir. 1989). A federal district court's determination that female inmates' first amendment rights were being violated was appealed by the defendants. Reversing and remanding the decision of the lower court, the appeals court found that there was sufficient merit to the placement of the inmates in the Federal Bureau of Prisons' highest security confinement institution for women. It was shown that the female inmates had associated with gangs and had access to dangerous weapons. They had helped in prison escapes, and had personally taken part in violent and criminal activities of those groups before their federal incarceration. It was also determined by the court that placement of inmates in the stated institution "solely" because of their "subversive statements and thoughts" was clearly erroneous. While inmates have a constitutional right to hold violent or revolutionary views and to maintain memberships in revolutionary organizations, prison administrators are not required to ignore those views and memberships when assessing dangers of their escapes from custody with outside help from those who hold like views and/or memberships. (Federal Correctional Institution, Lexington, Kentucky)

U.S. Appeals Court
CLASSIFICATION
CRITERIA
TRANSFER

Barfield v. Brierton, 883 F.2d 923 (11th Cir. 1989). A state prisoner brought a civil rights action against state corrections officials, alleging a violation of his constitutional rights through his transfer to an adult prison facility in violation of his liberty interest as a youthful offender. The prisoner appealed after the district court granted summary judgment for correctional officials. The court of appeals reversed the lower court and remanded the case. The court stated that the prisoner had raised genuine issues of material fact regarding the existence of liberty interest in him as a youthful offender, and whether the transfer violated his liberty interest as a youthful offender. (Florida State Prison)

U.S. District Court
AIDS

Bird v. Figel, 725 F.Supp. 406 (N.D. Ind. 1989). After a civil rights plaintiff was awarded compensatory and civil damages arising out of his incarceration in the county lockup facility, the defendant sheriff and deputy sheriffs moved for judgment notwithstanding the verdict or, in alternative, a new trial. The district court found that the evidence supported the jury award and the instruction on punitive damages was proper. There was testimony that, during the plaintiff's two incarcerations, he was stripped and given only a white suicide gown to wear. He was placed in a cell with nothing in it but a steel bed frame, he was told to drink from the toilet, he was ridiculed for being gay and for having AIDS syndrome, and he was denied access to the telephone and other amenities. The plaintiff alleged that the conditions of his confinement, pursuant to the sheriff's suicide watch policy, were unconstitutionally restrictive. He also alleged that correctional officers intentionally or recklessly violated his constitutional rights during one period of confinement. As to the allegations pertaining to the correctional officers, the plaintiff specifically alleged that they denied him water and told him to drink out of the toilet, denied him access to the telephone, denied him all personal hygiene effects, denied him visitation, denied him writing materials and postage, made unauthorized disclosures of the fact that he suffers from AIDS-related complex and were deliberately indifferent to his medical needs.

The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff with an award of $600 compensatory damages against all three defendants for one period of incarceration, $1000 punitive damages against two correctional officers for first period of incarceration and $200 compensatory damages against another correctional officer on the second period of incarceration. (Allen County Lockup Facility, Indiana)

U.S. District Court
DUE PROCESS

Bonner v. Arizona Dept. of Corrections, 714 F.Supp. 420 (D. Ariz. 1989). A deaf inmate brought an action against a state correctional facility alleging deprivation of his rights under a statute prohibiting discrimination against handicapped persons by programs receiving federal financial assistance. The U.S. District Court granted summary judgment for the state, and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part and remanded the case. On remand, the District Court found that the Civil Rights Restoration Act, which defined the term "program or activity" in the Handicapped Act to include all operations of a department or agency receiving federal funds was entitled to retroactive effect.

Although selection to an honor dorm at the prison is highly discretionary, once the privilege is conferred, the inmate has specific due process rights governing his removal from the honor dorm. Where procedural guidelines governing the inmate's removal from the honor dorm used language of unmistakable mandatory character, there is a requirement that certain procedures "shall," "will," or "must" be employed. The court found that the inmate had a state-created constitutionally protected liberty interest in not being removed from the privilege of living in an "honor dorm" without due process. Due process required prison officials, because of the fact that a liberty interest was involved, to inform the prisoner of the charges against him and allow him to present his views. (Arizona State Prison)

U.S. District Court
PRETRIAL
DETAINEE

Charron v. Medium Sec. Inst., 730 F.Supp. 987 (E.D. Mo. 1989). A former pretrial detainee brought a civil rights action against the city and staff members of a city workhouse, alleging various constitutional violations which occurred in connection with his refusal to work in the kitchen of the workhouse, and the medical treatment that was afforded him for a workhouse injury. The U.S. District Court found that as a pretrial detainee, the plaintiff has no claim under the eighth amendment for cruel and unusual punishment, arising from his being placed in segregation for refusing to work in the workhouse kitchen, however the placement in segregation did amount to punishment in violation of his due process rights. According to the court, pretrial detainees do not stand on the same footing as convicted inmates. If pretrial detainees are subjected to restrictions and privations other than those inherent in their confinement itself or which are justified by compelling necessities of jail administration, their rights are violated under the due process and equal protection clauses of the fourteenth amendment. Placing the detainee in segregation was not reasonably related to a legitimate goal or purpose inasmuch as he did not pose a threat to security. The court found that he was entitled to nominal damages, since he suffered no actual harm as a result of his segregation for six days; thus, the plaintiff was awarded the sum of $600 in damages for the six days in punitive segregation at $100 per day. It was also stated that nothing in the Constitution requires that pretrial detainees be allowed contact visits when prison administrators had determined that such visits will jeopardize the security of the facility.

The court also found that the members of the workhouse staff were not entitled to qualified immunity from the civil rights claim; the law clearly established that the unnecessary imposition of security confinement on a pretrial detainee violated the detainee's rights to due process. (Medium Security Institution, Missouri)

U.S. District Court
PROTECTIVE CUSTODY

Crozier v. Shillinger, 710 F.Supp. 760 (D. Wyo. 1989). Protective custody inmates brought an action to challenge the suspension of certain opportunities and benefits that were afforded to the general prison population. The defendants moved for a summary judgment. The District Court found that giving certain benefits and opportunities to the general prison population without giving those opportunities and benefits to protective custody inmates was not cruel and unusual punishment. According to the court, a prisoner has no absolute constitutional right to visitation. Cancelling some visits for protective custody inmates due to conflicting visits to prisoners in the general population was constitutional. Giving the protective custody inmates fewer benefits and opportunities than the general prison population was not cruel and unusual punishment and did not violate the fourteenth amendment. The suspension of certain benefits and opportunities represented accommodation with institutional interest in providing adequate protection to protective custody inmates. (Wyoming State Penitentiary)

U.S. Appeals Court
SUICIDE
JUVENILES

Edwards v. Gilbert, 867 F.2d 1271 (11th Cir. 1989). A Section 1983 action was brought by an estate on behalf of a juvenile who committed suicide while in jail. The U.S. District Court denied the officials' motion for summary judgment in regard to counts against them in their individual capacities, and appeal was taken. The appeals court found that the conduct by jail officials in leaving a seemingly sleeping juvenile inmate, who had never threatened or attempted suicide and who had never been considered a suicide risk, in a secure cell for 45 minutes with another sleeping juvenile did not constitute deliberate indifference to the inmate's safety from self-harm. The individual officers were entitled to immunity from a civil rights action against them arising out of the inmate's suicide. The prisoner, who was awaiting sentencing, was not deprived of procedural due process under the fourteenth amendment by the placement in a particular cell or by the jailer's failure to observe him for an interval of more than 15 minutes. There was no contention that the actions of the jailers would have been proper if some sort of hearing had preceded the events surrounding the prisoner's suicide. Statutes and regulations governing the daily operations of county jails did not give the prisoner a right to an administrative hearing.

Jail officials did not demonstrate a deliberate indifference to the prisoner's safety from self-harm by the fact that the prisoner requested an appointment with the jail psychologist but that there was no record that he had seen one. Given the fact that it was not unusual for inmates to request to see a jail psychologist, the prisoner's request did not put jailers on notice that he was a potential suicide risk. It was also stated by the court that the failure of the jailers to adhere to state laws and regulations on the housing of juveniles in adult jails did not demonstrate a deliberate indifference toward the prisoner's safety from self-harm. In addition, standing alone, the violation of state laws and regulations requiring the sight and sound separation of juvenile and adult prisoners was not the basis for establishing a constitutional violation. (Okaloosa County Jail, Florida)

U.S. Appeals Court
DUE PROCESS
SEGREGATION

Gittens v. Lefevre, 891 F.2d 38 (2nd Cir. 1989). An inmate brought a civil rights action against prison officials, alleging that the officials denied him an opportunity to make a statement challenging his administrative "keeplock" until the disciplinary hearing. The U.S. District Court dismissed the complaint, and the inmate appealed. The appeals court found that prison regulations governing administrative "keeplock" did not meet minimal due process standards, but the prison officials' reliance on those regulations in prohibiting the inmate from making a statement was reasonable, entitling the officials to qualified immunity in the inmate's civil rights action. According to the court, the state prison officials have a broad administrative and discretionary authority to remove the inmate from the general prison population for the purpose of ensuring the safety and security of the prison. Pending an investigation into an alleged disciplinary violation, such confinement is considered administrative and is not restricted by the fourteenth amendment, unless state law has created a liberty interest in remaining free from the restraints imposed. (Clinton Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
MENTALLY ILL
PROTECTIVE CUSTODY
PUNITIVE
SEGREGATION
SEPARATION

Inmates of Occoquan v. Barry, 717 F.Supp. 854 (D.D.C. 1989). Inmates confined at a state prison brought a civil rights action seeking declaratory and injunctive relief. The judgment for the inmates, 650 F.Supp. 619, was vacated and remanded, 844 F.2d 828. Upon remand, the district court found that the prison conditions violated the inmates' eighth amendment rights, even though the District of Columbia had implemented a number of new procedures. The housekeeping manual was not followed, fire inspection was lacking, new evacuation plans had not been posted and proper training had not occurred. Sick call had been increased to five days from three days but had not cured other chronic problems. New procedures for medical problems, and new procedures for medical records transfers and follow-up had either not been implemented or had failed to work. The court also found that the housing of "protective custody" inmates in a block with punitive segregation inmates violated the protective custody inmates' eighth amendment rights, and inmates with mental health problems could not be housed with punitive segregation inmates. Officials at the medium security federal prison were prohibited from exceeding the current population at the facility pending renovation, and they were required to submit a written report on their proposals for correcting the constitutional violations in areas of sanitation, bathroom facilities, fire safety, health care, and staffing. The court of appeals also found error with the court's "continuous resort to the standards articulated by professional agencies in evaluating the constitutionality of the conditions at Occoquan." (District of Columbia's Occoquan Facility, Lorton Correctional Complex)

U.S. District Court
FAILURE TO PROTECT PRETRIAL
DETAINEES
SEPARATION

Ryan v. Burlington County, N.J., 708 F.Supp. 623 (D. N.J. 1989). A pretrial detainee who was rendered quadriplegic as a result of an attack by a county jail inmate brought a civil rights action against the county board of chosen freeholders, and various jail personnel. On the defendants' motion for summary judgment, the district court granted the motion in part and denied the motion in part. It found that the warden and the jail captain who advised and assisted the warden were not entitled to qualified immunity, but the corrections officers were entitled to qualified immunity. Members of the county board of chosen freeholders were not entitled to absolute legislative immunity because the board knew that the county jail was overcrowded, and the board also was aware that no inmate classification system separating known dangerous inmates from others was in place at the jail. Moreover, the board could not reasonably have believed that its refusal to supply the county jail with additional security personnel was lawful.

The warden of the county jail was not entitled to qualified immunity from the pretrial detainee's civil rights claim, insofar as it was based on overcrowding. The jury could conclude that the warden neglected to attempt available solutions to overcrowding at the jail. The court also stated that the warden and the jail captain who advised and assisted the warden in setting procedures governing daily administration were not entitled to qualified immunity from the pretrial detainee's civil rights claim arising from the inmate assault, insofar as it was based on the failure to institute a classification system separating pretrial detainees from dangerous inmates. Neither official took any action whatsoever in an attempt to establish such a system of classification. Sergeants in the county jail were entitled to qualified immunity, insofar as it was based on overcrowding and the failure to institute a classification system separating pretrial detainees from dangerous inmates, in view of their lack of authority to remedy overcrowding or to institute a classification system. (Burlington County Jail, New Jersey)

1990

U.S. District Court
SEGREGATION
TRANSFER

Brown v. Cunningham, 730 F.Supp. 612 (D. Del. 1990). An inmate filed a civil rights action alleging his constitutional rights were violated when he was transferred from general population to administrative segregation without being given a notice of opportunity to argue against the transfer. The district court found that the transfer of the inmate did not implicate any liberty interest and the case was dismissed. Neither the prison code of penal discipline nor the administrative regulations contained language concerning administrative segregation but, rather, vested discretion in the Delaware Department of Corrections to determine the inmate's classification and, thus, did not create a liberty interest in the inmate's right to be free from administrative segregation. (Delaware Correctional Center)

U.S. District Court
AIDS

Deutsch v. Federal Bureau of Prisons, 737 F.Supp. 261 (S.D.N.Y. 1990). A prisoner filed a pro se action claiming that his constitutional rights under the eighth amendment were violated by being assigned to a cellmate who tested positive to HIV antibodies. The district court found that the prisoner failed to present the court with sufficient facts to allow inference that the decision to house him with the cellmate was a deliberate indifference to the prisoner's medical needs. The prisoner did not have a clearly established constitutional right to be informed of whether the assigned cellmate tested positive for HIV antibodies. The court also found that the federal prison officials were shielded from the prisoner's eighth amendment claim as a result of immunity under the Federal Tort Claims Act. The prisoner failed to allege any facts to support the finding that prison officials were either specifically aware that the cellmate might violate prison rules and engage in high-risk behavior or that they condoned or allowed the violation of these rules, and, thus no basis existed for concluding that prison officials violated the prisoner's clearly established constitutional rights.

It was noted by the court that behavior resulting in a high risk of transmission of AIDS, such as sexual behavior between inmates, was prohibited. The prison's policy included a provision for removing inmates testing positive from the general population when there is "reliable evidence that their conduct may pose a health risk to other inmates." (Federal Correctional Institute, Otisville, New York)

U.S. District Court
AIDS

Farmer v. Moritsugu, 742 F.Supp. 525 (W.D. Wis. 1990). A prisoner who had tested positive for HIV brought an action alleging violation of his equal protection rights by prison officials' decision to prevent him from working in food services. The district court found that the decision to prevent the prisoner from working in food service after he tested positive for HIV was rationally related to legitimate security and order in the penal institution so the prisoner's equal protection rights were not violated. (Federal Correctional Institution, Oxford, Wisconsin)

U.S. Appeals Court
CLASSIFICATION
TRANSFER

Gomez v. Grossheim, 901 F.2d 686 (8th Cir. 1990). A state inmate brought a civil rights action against prison officials alleging that he was transferred from a medical classification center back to a minimum security institution and ultimately to the maximum security unit in retaliation for his refusal to keep a follow-up medical appointment. The U.S. District Court granted summary judgment for the prison officials and the inmate appealed. The appeals court found that evidence did not support the inmate's contention because each transfer was based on understandable prison policy rules and procedures and because further evaluation could not be pursued at the medical classification center. (Riverview Release Center, Newton, Iowa; Iowa Medical Classification Center, Oakdale, Iowa)

U.S. District Court
AIDS
SEGREGATION

Harris v. Thigpen, 727 F.Supp. 1564 (M.D. Ala. 1990), modified, 941 F.2d 1495. Inmates in the Alabama prison system, who were administratively segregated as Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome (AIDS) carriers, brought action against prison officials alleging that Alabama's testing of inmates for AIDS upon induction into, and before discharge from, the penal system violated the Constitution. The district court denied the relief requested and found that testing did not constitute an unreasonable search or seizure and did not violate the inmates' privacy rights.

According to the court, Alabama's testing of inmates for Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome (AIDS) upon induction into, and before discharge from, the state penal system did not constitute either an unreasonable search and seizure or a violation of the inmates' right to privacy. The regulations were reasonably related to prime considerations of penal confinement, safety and security, and there was no alternative method to protect the safety of other inmates and custodian officers and the security of the institution from the spread of disease.

The preponderance of evidence showed no violation of any rights of inmates who were AIDS carriers to medical or psychological or psychiatric care and no deliberate indifference to any serious medical or psychological need in the Alabama prison system. The prison system was not required to make available every drug or treatment that was being hailed as a possible cure for a disease considering the expense of the cure and the fact that Alabama was in a poor financial position to provide treatment. Inmates, who were diagnosed as AIDS carriers, were not "otherwise qualified handicapped individuals" under the Rehabilitation Act and reasonable accommodations would not make inmates otherwise qualified since after reasonable accommodations, significant risk of transmission of the disease would still exist; therefore, conditions and practices to which seropositive prisoners were subjected did not constitute discrimination against them as handicapped individuals in violation of the Rehabilitation Act. On appeal the case was remanded for further consideration. (Alabama Prison)

U.S. Appeals Court
SUICIDE
SEGREGATION

Lewis v. Parish of Terrebonne, 894 F.2d 142 (5th Cir. 1990). The widow and children of an inmate who committed suicide while placed in solitary confinement brought a civil rights action against the warden of the jail, the parish and other defendants. The U.S. District Court entered a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs, but awarded only punitive damages, and both sides appealed. The appeals court found that the finding that the warden had been deliberately indifferent to the inmate's serious medical needs was sufficiently supported by evidence. The exclusion of evidence of the defendants' liability insurance was not an abuse of discretion, notwithstanding that the plaintiffs had made a punitive damages claim; but the action would be remanded to a district judge for determination as to damages suffered by the inmate immediately prior to death. A punitive damages award was sufficiently supported by evidence of the warden's callous indifference to the inmate's serious medical needs, in failing to deprive him of death dealing instrumentalities and placing him in solitary confinement even though he knew or should have known of the inmate's suicidal tendencies. (Terrebonne Parish Jail, Houma, Louisiana)

U.S. District Court
PROTECTIVE CUSTODY

Madden v. Kemna, 739 F.Supp. 1358 (W.D. Mo. 1990). Consolidated cases were brought by twenty-five prisoners from Colorado who had been transferred to Western Missouri Correctional Center from their home state, pursuant to a contract for imprisonment there. They asserted that they were being held in a protective custody segregation unit, as requested by them, but without being afforded the same general privileges provided to the inmates in the general prison population as generally mandated by Missouri prison regulations. The district court found that the Missouri prison violated the protected liberty interest of the Colorado prisoners by treating the prisoners substantially different from Colorado prisoners; the Colorado prisoners were in the Missouri prison pursuant to a contract, the prison's own regulation required the substantial equality of prisoners and created a liberty interest, and the prison failed to show any security needs for affording Colorado prisoners fewer privileges than Missouri prisoners. The prison was ordered to comply with its own regulation requiring substantial equality of privileges among the prisoners. (Western Missouri Correctional Center, Cameron)

U.S. Appeals Court
CLASSIFICATION
DUE PROCESS
SEGREGATION

McCord v. Maggio, 910 F.2d 1248 (5th Cir. 1990). An inmate at the state penitentiary brought a civil rights action for prison officials' alleged violation of his eighth amendment rights in connection with conditions of confinement and with his classification for imprisonment in a single cell. The U.S. District Court entered a judgment in favor of the defendants, and the inmate appealed. The appeals court, affirming in part, reversing and remanding in part, found that the civil rights claim arising from the conditions of the inmate's confinement, including his alleged placement in an unlighted, windowless cell into which water and human sewage was allegedly allowed to seep, would be remanded to a magistrate for additional findings of fact, but the inmate was not denied procedural due process by his initial and ongoing confinement in a closed cell, where a lockdown review board had considered the inmate's entire record, including the need to protect him from reprisals or harm from other inmates, in ordering assignment, and where the inmate's classification was reviewed every 90 days at a reclassification board hearing of which the inmate was given prior notice. (Louisiana State Penitentiary)

U.S. District Court
AIDS
SEPARATION

Portee v. Tollison, 753 F.Supp. 184 (D.S.C. 1990), affirmed, 929 F.2d 694. State prisoners filed a civil rights action against the South Carolina Department of Corrections and individual defendants, claiming that a prison policy did not adequately protect them from the risk of the Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome (AIDS) virus. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The U.S. District Court found that the Department of Corrections practices and policies governing the admission of prisoners and handling of prisoners with AIDS did not violate the Eighth Amendment prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment. The court found that prisoners who "follow the rules" are "not in significant danger" of contracting AIDS, and the decisions to not test all inmates and to integrate HIV-carriers into the general population were therefore not "deliberate indifference" to other inmates' serious medical needs. (Central Correctional Institution, Columbia, South Carolina)

U.S. Appeals Court
PRETRIAL
DETAINEES
FAILURE TO PROTECT

Redman v. County of San Diego, 896 F.2d 362 (9th Cir. 1990). A pretrial detainee who was raped during confinement brought a Section 1983 action against the sheriff, the supervisor of the detention facility, the second in command at the facility, the shift supervisor, the station deputy, and the county. The U.S. District Court directed a verdict in favor of the defendants, and the detainee appealed. The court of appeals affirmed the lower court decision and found that the jail officials were not deliberately indifferent to the detainee's due process right to personal security. Transferring the 18-year-old pretrial detainee from the "young and tender" unit to a cell with a homosexual and investigating an alleged rape of the detainee by questioning him in front of the cellmate and other inmates was not "deliberate indifference" to the detainee's due process right to personal security, even though the jail officials knew that the cellmate had a history of trying to coerce others into sexual favors. The knowledge about the cellmate and the detainee's profile merely gave jailors a suspicion of a possible attack. (San Diego County's South Bay Detention Facility, California)

U.S. Appeals Court
DUE PROCESS
SEGREGATION

Russ v. Young, 895 F.2d 1149 (7th Cir. 1990). A prisoner brought a Section 1983 action alleging that prison administrators had violated his due process rights in transferring him to a temporary lockup status. The U.S. District Court dismissed the defendants from the lawsuit, and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed the decision, finding that the inmate did not have a federal liberty interest in remaining in the general prison population. There is no constitutional right from the due process clause, in itself, to a particular placement within a single institution. A state regulation pertaining to the temporary lockup of inmates did not place substantive limits on official discretion sufficient to establish the prisoner's liberty interest in staying out of temporary lockup, even though the regulation offered prison officials guidelines as to when a prisoner might be placed in temporary lockup confinement. The regulation employed discretionary rather than mandatory language. (Waupun Correctional Institution, Wisconsin)

U.S. District Court
DUE PROCESS
SOLITARY CONFINEMENT DISCIPLINARY PROCEDURES

Scott v. Coughlin, 727 F.Supp. 806 (W.D.N.Y. 1990). An inmate filed a pro se civil rights petition alleging that prison officials improperly confined him to "keeplock" for a total of 14 days. On the inmate's motion for summary judgment on the issue of improper confinement, the district court found that the officials' placement of an inmate in "keeplock" without issuing a misbehavior report or conducting a disciplinary hearing violated the inmate's due process rights, and the officials were not entitled to qualified immunity for failure to file a misbehavior report at any point during the inmate's stay in keeplock, which clearly defied well-delineated boundaries of official discretion. The inmate was inexcusably denied an opportunity to be heard for an "indefinite period of time," particularly absent an allegation of any circumstances justifying postponement. (Southport Correctional Facility and Elmira Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
CLASSIFICATION

Siddiqi v. Lane, 748 F.Supp. 637 (N.D. Ill. 1990). An inmate brought a Section 1983 action alleging a violation of equal protection. On the defendants' motion to dismiss, the district court found that the inmate, who attempted an escape, was not denied equal protection by his subsequent security classification as a high escape risk, absent a showing of intentional or purposeful discrimination in his security classification. (Illinois State Prison System)

U.S. District Court
CLASSIFICATION
DUE PROCESS
SEGREGATION

Thomas v. Zelez, 731 F.Supp. 1462 (D.Kan. 1990). An inmate brought a civil rights action alleging his constitutional rights were violated by the reduction in his custody level during an investigation at the correctional facility. On the defendants' motion for summary judgment, the district court found that the inmate, identified as a leader in a white supremacist group, received the full benefit of due process rights when he was moved from a medium security to a maximum security area in response to the investigation into supremacist harassment of black inmates. According to the court there is no constitutional requirement that prisons provide activities for segregated inmates. Any defects in the custody reduction board proceedings were cured when the decision of that body was nullified and all permanent records were removed from the inmate's file; and the inmate, who was dishonorably discharged from the U.S. Army, stated no equal protection claim in connection with the rejection of his request for administrative relief from segregation under the provision of the Uniform Code of Military Justice which was only available to members of the armed forces. (United States Disciplinary Barracks, Fort Leavenworth, Kansas)

U.S. District Court
AIDS
FAILURE TO PROTECT

Welch v. Sheriff, Lubbock County, Tex., 734 F.Supp. 765 (N.D.Tex. 1990). An inmate brought a civil rights action against jail personnel for allegedly placing him in the same cell as an inmate who had tested positive for Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome (AIDS) in an alleged violation of constitutional rights. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court, granting the motion, found that the jail authorities did not violate the inmate's constitutional rights simply by placing him in the same cell as an inmate who had tested positive for AIDS, absent any allegation or proof of sexual contact among the inmates or other activities that could pose serious risk of transmission of AIDS, such as sharing of needles for intravenous drug use. Further, in this instance, the other inmate's positive AIDS test turned out to be a "false positive" and later tests designed to confirm it showed that he did not, in fact, have AIDS. (Lubbock County Jail, Texas)

U.S. District Court
AIDS
SPECIAL NEEDS
TRANSFER

Wilson v. Franceschi, 735 F.Supp. 395 (M.D. Fla. 1990). An inmate brought a pro se action under Section 1983 against the physician at a correctional institution and the correctional institution's chief classification specialist, arising from the alleged denial of medical care. The district court found that the physician was qualifiedly immune from the suit in connection with the inmate's claim that the delay in receiving the drug zidovudine (AZT) for the treatment of the inmate's early acquired immune deficiency syndrome (AIDS)-related complex (ARC) symptoms constituted cruel and unusual punishment. At the time, the efficacy of treating early ARC patients with AZT was not known. The chief classification specialist at the correctional institution was not responsible for medical transfers and, thus, was immune from action by the inmate alleging that the delay in transferring him to a facility for the treatment of his early acquired immune deficiency syndrome (AIDS)-related complex symptoms constituted cruel and unusual punishment under the eighth amendment. The inmate's itching does not constitute a "serious medical need" such that the failure to treat it constitutes cruel and unusual punishment within the meaning of the eighth amendment. (Florida Department of Corrections)

1991

U.S. District Court
CLASSIFICATION
DUE PROCESS

Beardsley v. Moore, 765 F.Supp. 560 (E.D. Mo. 1991). A state prisoner brought a civil rights suit against state prison officials, alleging deprivation of his liberty interest regarding his classification within the prison. The district court found that the prisoner did not have a liberty interest in being classified among the general prison population, so as to assert a due process violation in connection with restrictive classifications imposed upon him, and the due process rights of the prisoner were not violated by placement in a more restrictive classification based on five minor violations. While the Inmate Rule Book provided for reduction of status only after accumulating six or more minor violations, the Rule Book did not provide policies or procedures regarding classification but rather appeared to govern the lifestyle of inmates while incarcerated. (Missouri State Penitentiary)

U.S. District Court
AIDS

Casey v. Lewis, 773 F.Supp. 1365 (D. Ariz. 1991), reversed, 4 F.3d 1516. A class action suit was brought by prisoners challenging certain prison policies. The district court found that a policy prohibiting assignment of prisoners to food services who test HIV positive violated the Rehabilitation Act. The district court found that although a significant risk of transmission of the AIDS virus could justify exclusion of the infected person from a job for which he or she is otherwise qualified, based on reasonable medical judgments, there is no significant risk of transmitting the HIV disease except through: (1) intimate sexual contact with an infected person; (2) invasive exposure to contaminated blood or certain other bodily fluids; or (3) perinatal exposure. HIV-positive prisoners are "handicapped" within the meaning of Section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act. As such, officials must make an individual determination that each HIV-positive prisoner presents a significant risk of transmitting the virus if he or she worked in food services. The appeals court vacated the decision, finding that the plaintiffs lacked standing. (Arizona Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
SPECIAL NEEDS

Crosby v. Reynolds, 763 F.Supp. 666 (D. Me. 1991). A female prisoner at a county jail brought a Section 1983 action against jail officials for allegedly violating her privacy rights by placing her in the same cell as a transsexual male prisoner. On the defendants' motion for summary judgment, the district court found that correctional officials were entitled to qualified immunity on the inmate's claims. Expert medical opinion informed the jail officials that housing the transsexual inmate in the female population best satisfied the inmate's unique psychological needs and there was no risk to the female inmates. The officials were notified that the inmate, who had received hormonal treatments and developed breasts, but had not yet undergone a sex change operation, would not be safe, physically or psychologically if placed with male inmates. According to the court, reasonable officials in their shoes would not understand that what they did violated the constitutional rights of the plaintiff, therefore, the defendants were entitled to qualified immunity on the plaintiff's charge that her constitutional right to privacy was invaded. (Penobscot County Jail, Maine)

U.S. Appeals Court
SUICIDE

Dobson v. Magnusson, 923 F.2d 229 (1st Cir. 1991). The estate of a prisoner brought a suit against an officer of a state prison for damages resulting from the prisoner's suicide. The U.S. District Court entered summary judgment in favor of the defendant, and the estate appealed. The appeals court found that the prison officer's failure to put a suicide watch on the prisoner when the prisoner returned from a disciplinary board hearing where he was ordered to serve time in segregation was not deliberate indifference where the officer was given no history of suicidal tendencies on the part of the prisoner. Moreover, any failure on the officer's part to order the watch became res inter alios in light of fact that the prisoner was already on a watch because of the possibility of self-injury, not because of any perceived threat of suicide. The passage of 45 minutes between the correction officer's successive checks on the prisoner, who had been placed on a 15-minute watch because of the possibility of self-injury, did not amount to deliberate indifference. A psychologist, whose notes the officer had read, expressly rejected the threat of suicide. (Maine State Prison)

U.S. Appeals Court
CLASSIFICATION
TRANSFER

Grayson v. Rison, 945 F.2d 1064 (9th Cir. 1991). A former federal prisoner brought an action against three prison officials, seeking damages for an allegedly unlawful transfer between prison facilities. The U.S. District Court granted summary judgment for the officials based on a finding of qualified immunity, and the former prisoner appealed. The court of appeals found that the transfer of the prisoner from a less restrictive section to a more restrictive section did not deny the prisoner due process, and the federal prisoner was not entitled to notice and a hearing. Placement was a direct result of the prisoner's holdover status, and the federal prisoner, transferred to the institution for civil depositions, was not entitled to memorandum and formal review otherwise required. The transfer did not deny the prisoner due process, although the transfer from one section to another was made without procedural safeguards. When prison officials have a legitimate administrative authority, such as discretion to move inmates from prison to prison or from cell to cell, the due process clause imposes few restrictions on the use of that authority, regardless of what motives are claimed to exist for the transfer. (Terminal Island Federal Correctional Institution, California)

U.S. District Court
SEPARATION

Harding v. Jones, 768 F.Supp. 275 (E.D. Mo. 1991). A prisoner brought a Section 1983 action against the superintendent of a prison, two guards, and a former caseworker. The district court found that prison officials did not violate the Eighth Amendment rights of the prisoner by allowing him and an inmate with whom he had a dispute to remain in the general prison population; although the prisoner was informed of the availability of protective custody, the prisoner explicitly rejected it. This made his decision to remain in the general prison population voluntary. (Moberly Correctional Center, Missouri)

U.S. Appeals Court
AIDS

Harris v. Thigpen, 941 F.2d 1495 (11th Cir. 1991). Inmates who had tested positive for the Human Immunodeficiency Virus (HIV) brought a civil rights action challenging various policies and procedures of the Alabama Department of Corrections. Non-HIV general population inmates intervened as defendants and the case was consolidated with similar actions pending in various federal courts. The U.S. District Court denied relief and the inmates appealed. The court of appeals found that, assuming that prisoners who had tested positive for HIV enjoyed a constitutionally protected privacy interest in preventing non-consensual disclosure of their HIV-positive diagnoses, such disclosure, as a result of the Alabama DOC policy of uniformly segregating HIV-positive inmates from the general prison population, did not violate such prisoners' privacy rights as any such right was outweighed by legitimate penological interests of the DOC. (Alabama Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
DUE PROCESS
TRANSFER
CLASSIFICATION
CRITERIA

Klein v. Pyle, 767 F.Supp. 215 (D. Colo. 1991). A pro se inmate brought a Section 1983 action against prison officials alleging a violation of due process and equal protection rights. The prison officials moved to dismiss for failure to state a claim. The district court found that, absent a state-created interest, neither a change in a prisoner's security classification nor a prisoner's transfer from one prison to another implicates a liberty interest within the meaning of the due process clause. However, it was improper to dismiss the prisoner's civil rights complaint based on the prisoner's placement in a segregation unit of the medium security facility before correctional officials had answered the prisoner's allegations that the segregation served no valid administrative purpose and the record failed to disclose whether the prisoner was placed in segregation for administrative or supervisory reasons. In addition, the prisoner stated a cause of action based on denial of equal protection by alleging that his case manager told him that several prisoners with similar sentences were housed in the medium security prison, where, under the Colorado Department of Corrections regulation the prisoners received a notice of the segregation and a hearing but the prisoner had received neither. Under the department regulation, prisoners and their case managers were also allowed to participate in the reclassification process but the prisoner and his case manager had not been allowed to do so. (Colorado Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
AIDS
SEGREGATION

Nolley v. County of Erie, 776 F.Supp. 715 (W.D.N.Y. 1991). A former inmate infected with human immuno-deficiency virus (HIV) brought an action against a correctional facility and various facility administrators, alleging constitutional and statutory violations in connection with her treatment. The district court found that the segregation of the inmate disclosed confidential HIV-related information about her to nonmedical staff in violation of New York Public Health Law in addition to a violation of her Constitutional right to privacy. The segregation policy was not rationally related to protection of the general inmate population from accidental exposure to the virus, particularly in light of the fact that many unknown HIV carriers were likely to be integrated into the general population at any time. The district court found that the segregation of the inmate in a ward housing suicidal and psychologically unstable inmates did not violate the Eighth Amendment. The inmate was housed with inmates who graphically described their horrible crimes, were suicidal, who demonstrated severe psychiatric problems, and who were in a state of perpetual trauma, and while the conditions in the ward were severe, they were not sufficiently traumatic. (Eric County Holding Center, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court DISCIPLINARY PROCEDURES
DUE PROCESS
SEGREGATION

Pardo v. Hosier, 946 F.2d 1278 (7th Cir. 1991). Inmates filed suits alleging that they had been denied due process in disciplinary proceedings. After the cases were consolidated, the U.S. District Court granted motions for summary judgment in part and denied motions in part. The district court entered judgment on a jury verdict awarding an inmate nominal damages, and appeals were taken. The court of appeals found that state law did not create a liberty interest in a prisoner remaining in the general prison population, so as to sustain a claim that his placement in a segregated area of the prison violated his due process rights. Procedures set forth in regulations were guidelines and did not mandate a particular outcome if the procedures were followed, or require release from administrative segregation if procedures were not followed. In addition, another prisoner did not have a protected liberty interest under state law, protected by the process clause, violated by his placement in administrative segregation pending a hearing on a charge against him; as the regulation providing for such placement, while using mandatory language to establish pertinent criteria for determining whether segregation should be imposed, left the ultimate resolution to the discretion of prison officials. (Pontiac Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
HOMOSEXUALS

Purvis v. Ponte, 929 F.2d 822 (1st Cir. 1991). A pro se inmate brought an action against prison officials alleging a violation of the Eighth Amendment based on alleged deliberate indifference to the need for protection from inmate threats and assaults. The U.S. District Court dismissed the complaint as frivolous, and the inmate appealed. The court of appeals found that the inmate failed to state an Eighth Amendment claim. The prison inmate's allegations that cellmates had exhibited unspecified general "hostility" toward homosexuals, had assaulted a corrections officer, had refused to live with blacks, or exhibited bizarre behavior were not, standing alone, sufficient to establish that the inmate was subject to an unreasonable risk of harm in violation of the Eighth Amendment. (Old Colony Corrections Center, Massachusetts)

U.S. Appeals Court
AIDS

Robbins v. Clarke, 946 F.2d 1331 (8th Cir. 1991). A prisoner brought a Section 1983 action alleging conspiracy to conceal the identity of prisoners testing positive for human immunodeficiency virus (HIV), cause of AIDS (Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome), failure to take precautions to protect healthy prisoners from exposure to HIV, and failure to take precautions to protect uninfected prisoners from exposure to hepatitis and tuberculosis. The U.S. District Court dismissed the complaint, and the prisoner appealed. The court of appeals found that the district court decision that prison conditions, including the presence of HIV-positive prisoners in the general prison population, was not cruel and unusual punishment collaterally estopped litigation of the issue that the Eighth Amendment was violated by involuntary and unprotected exposure to prisoners testing positive for HIV, and cause of AIDS as the issues were the same. Furthermore, the district court decision that evidence failed to show higher levels of infectious and contagious diseases among inmates collaterally estopped litigation of the claim that the prisoners' rights were violated by the failure to make an effort to protect them from exposure to hepatitis and tuberculosis. (Medium Security Unit, Nebraska State Penitentiary)

U.S. District Court
CLASSIFICATION

Siddiqi v. Lane, 763 F.Supp. 284 (N.D. Ill. 1991). A state inmate filed a pro se, in forma pauperis Section 1983 complaint in connection with upgrading of and failure to reduce his security classification. The U.S. District Court dismissed the complaint sua sponte as frivolous, ruling that the inmate had no cause of action under Section 1983 in connection with upgrading of or failure to reduce his security classification, despite the contention that the classification decisions were motivated by the inmate's political and religious beliefs and legal activities. Under state law, the inmate had no liberty interest in his security classification, and thus no action pertaining to classification could be maintained under Section 1983. (Pontiac Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
CLASSIFICATION
RACIAL DISCRIMINATION
TRANSFER

Stuck v. Aikens, 760 F.Supp. 740 (N.D. Ind. 1991). An inmate sued prison officials, claiming that his transfer to a prison with greater security and restrictions violated his constitutional rights. The officials moved for summary judgment. The district court found that the inmate had no protectable interest in his security classification while in confinement. In addition, the inmate failed to state a claim of invidious discrimination under Sections 1985 and 1986 and the Thirteenth Amendment with respect to his transfer to a prison with greater security and restrictions, as he did not claim to be a member of a racially protected group, and his status as an inmate was not a substitute for evidence of such a class membership. It was also found that the transfer did not violate his right under the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments to be free from cruel and unusual punishment. (Indiana State Prison)

U.S. Appeals Court
GUIDELINES REDUCTION

U.S. v. Gonzalez, 945 F.2d 525 (2nd Cir. 1991). A defendant was convicted of importing cocaine and the court departed downward from a minimum term proscribed by the sentencing guidelines. As a result, the government appealed. The court of appeals found that the trial court's conclusion that the defendant's overall appearance and demeanor made him unusually vulnerable to physical attack warranting a downward departure from the sentencing guidelines was not clearly erroneous. The defendant was extremely small and feminine looking and had an appearance of a 14 or 15-year-old making him unusually susceptible to prison abuse, even though the defendant was neither gay nor bisexual. (Federal Bureau of Prisons)

U.S. District Court
PROTECTIVE CUSTODY

Banks v. Fauver, 801 F.Supp. 1422 (D. N.J. 1992). An inmate who was placed in involuntary protective confinement brought an action against prison officials alleging violation of due process. On the officials' motion to dismiss, the district court found that the prison officials' reliance on an anonymous caller's tip to support the involuntary protective confinement of the inmate did not deny the inmate due process. The claims of the anonymous informant that the inmate was in danger if left in the general population were corroborated by information that the inmate was involved in drug trafficking, which might be thought to expose him to the risk of violence from other inmates. In addition, the inmate received notification of the charges against him and was afforded the opportunity to introduce evidence on his behalf. (Northern State Prison, New Jersey)

U.S. Appeals Court
PROTECTIVE CUSTODY

Falls v. Nesbitt, 966 F.2d 375 (8th Cir. 1992). An inmate brought a suit against a prison official for damages for injuries sustained when he was stabbed by a fellow inmate. The U.S. District Court awarded the inmate damages in the amount of $250 and enjoined the official from housing protective custody inmates with general population inmates. The prison official appealed. The appeals court reversed the decision, finding that while the prison official may have been negligent in placing the inmate in protective custody in a cell with an inmate from the general prison population, the prison official was not deliberately indifferent to the inmate's rights. (Cummins Unit of the Arkansas Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
SEPARATION
TRANSFER
LENGTH OF SEGREGATION

Garcia v. Burns, 787 F.Supp. 948 (D. Nev. 1992). An inmate brought a civil rights action alleging that prison officials violated his constitutional rights when he was held in segregated housing for more than two weeks after being classified to general population immediately after his transfer to the correctional center. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court found that holding the prisoner in administrative segregation for more than two weeks did not violate the prisoner's due process rights. The correctional center had legitimate non-punitive reasons for keeping new transferees in a designated cell until beds were available in the general population, and the prisoner had received a classification hearing shortly after his arrival. (Northern Nevada Corr. Center)

U.S. Appeals Court
CLASSIFICATION
SEPARATION
FAILURE TO PROTECT

James v. Milwaukee County, 956 F.2d 696 (7th Cir. 1992). An inmate who was assaulted by another inmate brought a Section 1983 action against a county and prison official alleging a violation of the Eighth Amendment. The U.S. District Court entered judgment for the county and prison official, and the inmate appealed. The court of appeals found that the county's inmate classification system was not cruel and unusual punishment under the Eighth Amendment; there was no evidence the defendants were on notice of an impending risk of harm to the inmate as a consequence of housing parole violators together with probation violators. (Milwaukee County House of Correction, Wisconsin)

U.S. District Court
CLASSIFICATION
CRITERIA

Jensen v. Gunter, 807 F.Supp. 1463 (D.Neb. 1992). Nebraska inmates brought class actions under a federal civil rights statute, alleging that the practice of double celling violated the Eighth Amendment, and that the penitentiary's policy relating to the inmate liability for contraband in a double cell violated the Fourteenth Amendment's due process clause. The court found that random placement of new inmates in double cells under volatile conditions that existed in the penitentiary's main housing units was not a reasonable response to the persuasive risk of harm to those inmates, and therefore such placement violated the Eighth Amendment. Information gathered and compiled during the initial intake of inmates into state prisons was not considered in the placement of new inmates into double cells, and such information could be of valuable assistance in predicting compatibility of cellmates. (Nebraska State Penitentiary)

U.S. Appeals Court
AIDS
SEGREGATION

Moore v. Mabus, 976 F.2d 268 (5th Cir. 1992). A state prisoner brought in forma pauperis Section 1983 action claiming he had been mistreated because he had the HIV virus (Human Immunodeficiency Virus). The U.S. District Court dismissed the complaint as frivolous, and an appeal was taken. The court of appeals, reversing, vacating, and remanding, found that the claim should not have been dismissed as frivolous. There were instances of potentially disputed facts resolved against him by the district court. However, the privacy rights of the prisoner had not been violated by his placement into an area set aside for prisoners who had tested positive for the virus. The court also found that the prisoner was entitled to have court appointed counsel, as the type and complexity of issues raised in the complaint deserved professional development. The complex subject of HIV and AIDS (Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome) management in prison environment was beyond the ability of the prisoner to investigate adequately, the scope of questions raised and resources required to pursue questions exceeded the capabilities of the prisoner, and apparently essential testimony from experts would require a questioner with professional trial skills. (Mississippi State Penitentiary, Parchman, Mississippi)

U.S. District Court
AIDS
SEGREGATION

Muhammad v. U.S. Bureau of Prisons, 789 F.Supp. 449 (D.D.C. 1992). An inmate sued the Bureau of Prisons, seeking writ of mandamus compelling the immediate removal of all prisoners from the general inmate population who either have Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome (AIDS), or have tested positive for the HIV virus, and the Bureau moved to dismiss. The U.S. District Court found that the inmate was not entitled to a writ of mandamus as the weight of authority on the issue indicated that the inmate was not entitled to relief in the form of segregation of such prisoners, he failed to show he was entitled to the extraordinary remedy of mandamus. (United States Bureau of Prisons)

U.S. District Court
AIDS
SEPARATION

Myers v. Maryland Div. of Correction, 782 F.Supp. 1095 (D. Md. 1992). Inmates brought an action against the Maryland Division of Correction, regarding a threat of infection with the Human Immunodeficiency Virus (HIV) and of spread of Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome (AIDS) in prison. On motions for summary judgment, the U.S. District Court found that the policies and programs adopted by Maryland Division of Correction to combat the spread of HIV and AIDS did not violate the right of HIV negative inmates to be free from cruel and unusual punishment to the extent that they did not require mandatory testing of all inmates and did not consider an inmate's HIV status in making housing and work assignments; although pervasive risk of harm was present, there was no showing of deliberate indifference. (Maryland Division of Correction)

U.S. Appeals Court
DUE PROCESS
SEGREGATION
DISCIPLINE

Nicholson v. Moran, 961 F.2d 996 (1st Cir. 1992). An inmate brought an action alleging that he was deprived of his constitutional rights in violation of Section 1983 and certain provisions of Rhode Island law. The U.S. District Court dismissed the complaint and appeal was taken. The court of appeals, reversing and remanding, found that the inmate, by way of rules resulting from a consent decree specifying the procedure to be used by Rhode Island correctional institutions with regard to inmate disciplinary actions, had a state-created liberty interest under the due process clause in remaining in the general prison population and, thus, the inmate's complaint that he was sentenced to punitive segregation for providing false information in connection with a complaint he filed stated a claim under Section 1983. (Rhode Island Adult Correctional Institute)

U.S. District Court
CLASSIFICATION
CRITERIA
HOMOSEXUALS
TRANSFER

Taylor v. Foltz, 803 F.Supp. 1261 (E.D.Mich. 1992), affirmed, 14 F.3d 602. A state prison inmate brought a civil rights action against a state prison warden, state prison assistant resident unit manager, and members of a correctional facility security classification committee. He alleged denial of an Eighth Amendment right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment and Fifth and Fourteenth Amendment rights not to be subjected to arbitrary and capricious decisions. The warden and committee members moved for summary judgment. The district court found that a genuine issue of material fact existed as to whether the warden's operating procedure in reviewing and authorizing transfers of inmates was defective so as to create an unconstitutional condition under the Eighth Amendment, precluding summary judgment for the warden on a qualified immunity basis. The court also found that the classification committee members were entitled to qualified immunity from the state prison inmate's claim that because the inmate was mislabeled as a homosexual, he was improperly classified, transferred, and denied a prison job. The inmate had failed to show that the committee members' conduct violated a right so clearly established that any official in their position would have clearly understood that he should refrain from such conduct. (State Prison of Southern Michigan)

1993

U.S. District Court
RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

Arney v. Thornburgh, 817 F.Supp. 83 (D.Kan. 1993). Inmates filed a civil rights complaint alleging race discrimination in the assignment of inmates to various units. On the defendants' motion for summary judgment, the district court found that the prisoners failed to establish race discrimination in the assignment of inmates to a unit at the prison where the Department of Corrections provided a detailed statistical profile of the racial composition of the entire Kansas prison population, the population at the Lansing facility and the Hutchinson Correctional Facility. The information provided showed a racial composition of these areas that was consistent with that of the overall inmate population. (Lansing Correctional Facility and the Hutchinson Correctional Work Center)

U.S. Appeals Court
AIDS
SEGREGATION

Camarillo v. McCarthy, 998 F.2d 638 (9th Cir. 1993). A former state inmate who was human immunodeficiency virus (HIV)-positive brought a Section 1983 action alleging that his transfer to a housing unit for HIV-positive inmates violated his constitutional rights. The U.S. District Court denied the officials' motion for summary judgment, and the official appealed. The appeals court, reversing and remanding, found that the officials were entitled to qualified immunity from liability on the claim that the transfer to the housing unit violated the inmate's constitutional rights of equal protection, privacy, due process, freedom from cruel and unusual punishment, and freedom of association, as any such rights that the inmate had were not clearly established at the relevant time. (California State Prison)

U.S. District Court
DUE PROCESS
LIBERTY INTEREST POLICY/PROCEDURE

Casey v. Lewis, 837 F.Supp. 1009 (D. Ariz. 1993). Inmates brought an action against prison officials alleging due process violations. The district court found that inmate classification and administrative segregation policies did not create liberty interests for inmates in a particular classification, in not having the classification score increased, or in remaining in the general population. Liberty interest in being free from administrative segregation is not created even when administrative segregation involves severe hardships. These hardships may include denial of access to educational, recreational, vocational and rehabilitative programs, confinement to cells for long periods, or restrictions in exercise privileges. Even if the inmates had such a liberty interest to be in the general population and free from administrative segregation and to not have their classification scores increased, it was found that prison officials provided the inmates with sufficient due process: (1) every six months, the institutional classification committee (ICC) conducted classification hearings for each inmate; (2) the inmate was notified of the hearing and had an opportunity to provide a statement or witnesses' statements; (3) the ICC decision was reviewed by the warden or administrator of the facility and by central classification before it was implemented; (4) the inmate was then provided with a written notice of the determination; (5) the inmate could appeal the final determination made by central classification to the administrator of the bureau of offender services; and (6) the bureau had the authority to uphold or modify the classification or to order a rehearing. (Arizona Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
CLASSIFICATION
CRITERIA
TRANSFER

Crane v. Logli, 992 F.2d 136 (7th Cir. 1993), cert. denied, 114 S.Ct. 245. A prisoner sued prison officials under Section 1983 for violation of his due process rights. The U.S. District Court dismissed the complaint, and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court found that the prisoner's continued incarceration in a maximum security prison, after reversal of his conviction for murder but before the reviewing court issued its mandate, did not violate due process, as he did not have a liberty interest in the type of prison for his incarceration. He continued to be a convicted prisoner and had not become a "pretrial detainee." Furthermore, the decision of Illinois Department of Correction officials to hold the prisoner at the maximum security prison until the Supreme Court issued its mandate following reversal of the conviction did not violate any of the prisoner's constitutional rights. The decision was a management decision within the scope of the officials' discretion. (Joliet Correction Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
AIDS

Goss v. Sullivan, 839 F.Supp. 1532 (D.Wyo. 1993). An inmate who had been attacked by an inmate infected with HIV (Human Immunodeficiency Virus) brought a civil rights action against various officials claiming violation of the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment rights. The district court found that the complaint failed to state a claim for violation of equal protection and the plaintiff inmate failed to establish a requisite deliberate indifference to a pervasive risk of harm necessary to show a violation of the Eighth Amendment. (Wyoming State Penitentiary, Rawlins)

U.S. District Court
DUE PROCESS
LIBERTY INTEREST
TRANSFER

Harrison v. Raney, 837 F.Supp. 875 (W.D. Tenn. 1993). A prison inmate brought a civil rights action asserting claims that he was transferred and reclassified without a hearing. On motion of defendants for summary judgment, the district court found that Tennessee Department of Corrections (TDOC) regulations did not create a liberty interest requiring state officials to afford any due process under the Fourteenth Amendment before either reclassification or transfer of inmates. Even if the regulations required hearings to follow certain procedures, they lacked any mandatory language that would require the warden to base a decision on any particular criteria, and unlimited discretion was explicitly conferred on the warden. Even if some types of transfers of inmates required security reclassification and due process protections, population management transfers did not, under the Tennessee regulation. (Lake County Regional Correctional Facility, Tiptonville, Tennessee)

U.S. District Court
AIDS

Johnson v. U.S., 816 F.Supp. 1519 (N.D. Ala. 1993). An inmate brought an action against the Federal Bureau of Prisons and prison officials, alleging violation of his Eighth Amendment right against cruel and unusual punishment. On the defendants' motion for summary judgment, the district court, adopting a report and recommendation of a U.S. Magistrate Judge, found that the inmate failed to show an Eighth Amendment violation concerning his being housed in the same cell with an inmate who was dying from acquired immune deficiency syndrome (AIDS). All examples listed as means by which the inmate feared he may have contracted AIDS were based on unsubstantiated fears and ignorance. In addition, the inmate presented no facts or allegations supporting an inference of deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs or a culpable state of mind on the part of the prison officials. (Federal Correctional Institute, Talladega, Alabama)

U.S. District Court
AIDS

Marcussen v. Brandstat, 836 F.Supp. 624 (N.D. Iowa 1993). An inmate filed a Section 1983 civil rights action against a warden of a correctional facility and a lieutenant and nurse employed at the facility. He alleged that his constitutional rights were violated when prison officials assigned a HIV-positive (Human Immunodeficiency Virus) inmate to his cell and allowed that inmate to use his toiletries. The defendants filed a motion for summary judgment. The district court found that the defendants were entitled to summary judgment on the inmate's allegations that he was exposed to the risk of contracting AIDS from the use of his drinking cup and cigarette roller by the allegedly HIV-positive inmate because the possibility of transference of AIDS through these means was too remote. The defendants were granted summary judgment on the inmate's claim that simply housing him with an allegedly HIV-positive inmate violated his constitutional rights. The defendants were granted summary judgment on the inmate's claim of exposure to pervasive risk of harm from allowing other inmates to use sharp objects, such as a razor, that could cause blood-to-blood transmission of HIV, because rules were in place at the correctional facility prohibiting behavior by inmates that could result in exposure to AIDS or HIV and stating that inmates were responsible for their personal property. The defendants were granted summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity since the officials' behavior was in line with standards stated in existing precedent, and so could not have violated the clear contours of any of the inmate's rights. (North Central Correctional Facility, Rockwell City, Iowa)

U.S. Appeals Court
LIBERTY INTEREST
SEGREGATION

Smith v. Noonan, 992 F.2d 987 (9th Cir. 1993). An inmate in the Washington State Penitentiary filed a Section 1983 action against prison officials for violation of his liberty interest after he was placed in administrative segregation during an investigation of allegations that he had threatened another inmate and a corrections officer. The U.S. District Court granted summary judgment to prison officials, and the inmate appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the Washington Administrative Code providing for segregation of an inmate if, in the superintendent's judgment, his presence in the general population would be a serious threat to others or himself, did not create a liberty interest requiring the inmate to remain in the general prison population. (Washington State Penitentiary)

1994

U.S. Appeals Court
CLASSIFICATION
DUE PROCESS

Barnett v. Centoni, 31 F.3d 813 (9th Cir. 1994). A death row inmate filed a Section 1983 action against prison officials. The U.S. District Court granted summary judgment on the prisoner's claim that he was denied due process when he was given a Grade B classification. The inmate appealed. The appeals court found that the inmate's due process rights were not violated by the prison classification committee's administrative decision to reclassify him. The inmate could be reclassified from Grade A to Grade B for possessing inmate manufactured alcohol and being affiliated with a prison gang. (San Quentin State Prison)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEGREGATION

Caraballo-Sandoval v. Honsted, 35 F.3d 521 (11th Cir. 1994). A prisoner brought a civil rights action against prison officials. The U.S. District Court dismissed the action and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court found that the prisoner neglected to apply for any administrative remedy after his placement in a dry cell for allegedly receiving contraband from a visitor and, therefore, he failed to exhaust administrative remedies for the incident. (Federal Correctional Institution, Marianna, Florida)

U.S. Supreme Court
TRANSSEXUAL

Farmer v. Brennan, 114 S.Ct. 1970 (1994). A prisoner who was transsexual brought a Bivens suit against prison officials, claiming that officials showed "deliberate indifference" by placing the prisoner in the general prison population, thus failing to keep him from harm allegedly inflicted by other inmates. The U.S. District Court entered judgment for the officials and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed and certiorari was granted. The Supreme Court, vacating and remanding, found that prison officials may be held liable under the Eighth Amendment for denying humane conditions of confinement only if they know that inmates face a substantial risk of serious harm and disregard that risk by failing to take reasonable measures to abate it. Remand would be required to determine whether prison officials would have liability, under the above standards, for not preventing harm allegedly occurring in this case. (Federal Correctional Institute, Oxford, Wisconsin and United States Penitentiary, Terre Haute, Indiana)

U.S. District Court
SEPARATION

Galvan v. Carothers, 855 F.Supp. 285 (D.Alaska 1994). A female inmate who was placed on an all male wing of a prison brought an action against prison officials, alleging violations of her constitutional rights. The officials moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion, finding that Alaska regulations and prison policies did not give the inmate a liberty interest in her right to classification hearings for purposes of her procedural due process claim. Also, the female inmate's right not to be housed on the all male wing was not clearly established at the time of the alleged wrongful conduct by officials for purposes of qualified immunity. (Lemon Creek Correctional Center, Alaska)

U.S. Appeals Court
DUE PROCESS
LIBERTY INTEREST

Griffin-El v. Delo, 34 F.3d 602 (8th Cir. 1994). An inmate brought a Section 1983 action against a prison superintendent, alleging that his due process rights were violated when the superintendent reduced him to medium custody before referring the matter to the classification committee for recommendation. The U.S. District Court dismissed the action and the inmate appealed. The appeals court found that the superintendent's failure to wait for a recommendation did not violate due process. Although the inmate had a protected liberty interest in his classification status, the inmate was given notice and an opportunity to speak and present witnesses before the adjustment board. (Potosi Correctional Center, Mineral Point, Missouri)

U.S. District Court
RACIAL
DISCRIMINATION

Hill v. Davidson, 844 F.Supp. 237 (E.D. Pa. 1994). The district court found that an indigent inmate, who claimed that he was denied employment in the prison because of his race, presented a claim of arguable merit. However, the inmate did not show sufficient "special circumstances" to warrant appointment of counsel. (Pennsylvania)

U.S. District Court
FAILURE TO PROTECT POLICY/PROCEDURE

Schwartz v. County of Montgomery, 843 F.Supp. 962 (E.D.Pa. 1994) affirmed 37 F.3d 1488. An inmate brought claims under Section 1983 and Pennsylvania law against a county correctional facility and its employees. The district court found that the defendants were not deliberately indifferent to the inmate's constitutional rights by failing to ensure that the facility's policies and procedures governing inmate classification and recreation were followed. Even though failure to follow policies and procedures resulted in the attempted strangulation of the inmate by a prisoner who was known to be extremely dangerous and who should have not been allowed to leave his cell unescorted, the policies and procedures did not cause the harm suffered by the inmate. According to the court, failure to communicate and follow policies and procedures did not rise above the level of negligence. Under Pennsylvania law, the defendants could not be held liable on the intentional tort theory for the attack, and the defendants were immune from negligence claims. (Montgomery County Correctional Facility, Eagleville, Pennsylvania)

U.S. Appeals Court
CLASSIFICATION
LIBERTY INTEREST REGULATIONS

Slezak v. Evatt, 21 F.3d 590 (4th Cir. 1994) U.S. cert. denied 115 C.Ct. 235. Inmates in the South Carolina prison system sued prison officials under Section 1983 alleging that their constitutional rights were violated by their security classifications. The U.S. District Court dismissed the suit and the inmates appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that state statutes creating and defining the power of the South Carolina Department of Corrections did not create a liberty interest in custody or security classifications protectible under the due process clause. Furthermore, a consent decree settling a class action suit brought by inmates to rectify prison conditions in South Carolina did not create a protected liberty interest with respect to custody and security classifications for purposes of Section 1983. The operational classification regulations which the state prison officials put in place, with prior court approval, pursuant to obligations imposed by the consent decree, did not create a protected liberty interest in an inmate's security and custody classifications. (Kirkland Correctional Institution, South Carolina)

U.S. Appeals Court
RACIAL DISCRIMINATION
SEGREGATION

Sockwell v. Phelps, 20 F.3d 187 (5th Cir. 1994). Inmates filed a Section 1983 action against former Louisiana prison officials alleging that the general policy of segregating two-person cells violated equal protection. The U.S. District Court found for the inmates and cross appeals were taken. The court of appeals found that a general policy of racially segregating two-person cells at the state penitentiary violated equal protection, despite the contention that security and discipline concerns demanded segregation. Offending prisoners responsible for violence should be disciplined individually, and any segregation to prevent racial violence must be based on an individualized analysis. (Louisiana State Penitentiary)

U.S. District Court
PRETRIAL
DETAINEES
SEPARATION
SPECIAL NEEDS

Young v. Larkin, 871 F.Supp. 772 (M.D. Pa. 1994), affirmed, 47 F.3d 1163. A pretrial detainee filed a civil rights action against prison officials complaining about treatment during pretrial detention. On the defendants motion for summary judgment the district court found that the prison officials' decision to hold the pretrial detainee in restricted housing was justified by legitimate institutional security concerns. The detainee's conduct raised serious concerns about the suitability of his release to the general population when he engaged in a hunger strike which caused his transfer from a restricted housing unit to a psychiatric observation room. It suggested possibilities the detainee might be seeking to harm himself or to disrupt institutional operations, and prison officials received warnings from law enforcement officials about the security threat posed by the detainee. (State Correctional Institution, Dallas, Pennsylvania)

1995

U.S. Appeals Court
AIDS

Anderson v. Romero, 72 F.3d 518 (7th Cir. 1995). An inmate who was infected with the human immunodeficiency virus (HIV) sued prison officials alleging violation of his constitutional right of privacy and the Illinois AIDS Confidentiality Act. The district court denied the officials' motion to dismiss and they appealed. The appeals court found that the inmate's claim regarding disclosure of his HIV status to other inmates or prison staff and other measures taken against him on the basis of his HIV status was barred by the doctrine of official immunity. The court noted that HIV-positive inmates can be segregated from the rest of the population, in view of the prevalence of HIV in prisons, the amount of violence and homosexual intercourse. (Stateville Penitentiary, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
SEX OFFENDERS
FAILURE TO PROTECT

Benji v. Broome County N.Y., 887 F.Supp. 395 (N.D.N.Y. 1995). A state inmate filed pro se federal civil rights claims against local and county officials alleging failure to adequately protect his personal security. The court found that the inmate raised triable issues of fact for his claim that officials were deliberately indifferent to his safety. Another inmate had threatened to kill the plaintiff because of sex crimes charged against him; the plaintiff was moved to another part of the facility and other inmates were told that the plaintiff was charged with burglary. The plaintiff sent three notes about "potential trouble" to the facility main desk and shortly thereafter he was assaulted by another inmate, knocked unconscious for an hour, and suffered injuries to his ear, eye and trachea. The inmate had also received a threatening letter from "vigilantes" in the facility. (Broome County Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
TRANSFER
SPECIAL NEEDS

Clarkson v. Coughlin, 898 F.Supp. 1019 (S.D.N.Y. 1995). Male and female deaf and hearing-impaired inmates sued correctional officials alleging failure to accommodate their hearing impairments in violation of the Rehabilitation Act, the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), due process, and the Eighth Amendment. The inmates also alleged violation of equal protection because male inmates were granted access to a sensorially disabled unit, but not females. The district court found that the defendants violated all statutes and constitutional provisions under which the inmates had sought relief, warranting declaratory and injunctive relief. The court found that deaf and hearing-impaired inmates had a parole-related liberty interest at stake entitled them to the presence of a qualified interpreter at hearings and other proceedings.

The court found that the defendants violated the Rehabilitation Act and ADA by conducting disciplinary, grievance and parole hearings for deaf and hearing-impaired inmates without affording them interpretive services or assistive devices necessary to render their opportunity to be heard meaningful.

The court held that even if all of the needs of deaf and hearing-impaired inmates were met at a sensorially disabled unit at one prison, the defendants violated their rights under the Rehabilitation Act and ADA by transferring them to other facilities for disciplinary, safety and/or medical reasons. Also, the court found that the fact that there were more male deaf and hearing-impaired inmates requiring services than female did not justify the fact that many male inmates--but no female inmates--had access to a prison's sensorially disabled unit. (New York Department of Correctional Services)

U.S. District Court
PROTECTIVE CUSTODY

Cody v. Jones, 895 F.Supp. 431 (N.D.N.Y. 1995). An inmate brought a § 1983 action alleging violation of his Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment rights. The district court held that although the inmate did not always receive all of the conditions of confinement for protective custody inmates, the conditions of his confinement did not present a dramatic departure from the basic conditions of his sentence so as to give rise to a due process violation. The inmate alleged that he did not always receive some of the conditions that were intended for protective custody inmates, such as two meals out-of-cell per day and three hours of out-of-cell time per day. (Great Meadow Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
CUSTODY LEVEL
RACIAL DISCRIMINATION
TRANSFER

Franklin v. Barry, 909 F. Supp. 21 (D.D.C. 1995). Hispanic prisoners incarcerated in District of Columbia correctional institutions sought equitable relief, declaratory judgment and damages from alleged violations of their constitutional rights by a policy that denies alien prisoners transfers to minimum security facilities. The district court found that the policy, which was based on alienage, was not discriminatory, but also that class certification was appropriate for the purpose of other claims raised by the prisoners. The court noted that the prisoners had alternative means to challenge INS detainers and that transfer to a minimum security facility was not a protected liberty interest. (District of Columbia correctional facilities)

U.S. District Court
AIDS

Fuller v. Rich, 925 F.Supp. 459 (N.D.Tex. 1995). An inmate brought a suit against employees of the Bureau of Prisons alleging violation of his Eighth Amendment rights. The district court granted the defendants' motion to dismiss, finding no constitutional violation. The court held that the inmate's job reassignment from food preparation to a dishroom was rationally related to the legitimate penological purpose of protecting the inmate from possible harm at the hands of other inmates, where other inmates made derogatory comments to prison officials regarding the inmate's homosexuality and there were rumors the inmate was infected with the HIV virus. The court noted that compelling prison inmates to fulfill work requirements does not violate an inmate's constitutional rights. (Federal Correctional Institution, Seagoville, Texas)

U.S. Appeals Court
SMOKING
SEPARATION

Goffman v. Gross, 59 F.3d 668 (7th Cir. 1995). A state prison inmate filed a § 1983 action against correctional officers alleging deliberate indifference to his immediate medical needs. The district court entered judgment for the officers and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court found that the inmate failed to establish that his exposure to his cellmate's cigarette smoke and the officers' refusal to assign him a nonsmoking cellmate constituted deliberate indifference. The court noted that the sole testifying physician offered the opinion that because the inmate was cured of lung cancer after the prior surgical removal of a lung, cigarette smoke affected him no more than any other prisoner. (Menard Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
PROTECTIVE CUSTODY
DUE PROCESS

Golub v. Coughlin, 885 F.Supp. 42 (N.D.N.Y. 1995). An inmate who had been convicted of the murder of a 14-year-old girl whose body was found mutilated challenged the decision of prison officials to place him in involuntary protective custody (IPC). A state court ordered that the inmate be transferred to the general population and the inmate brought a federal civil rights action against prison officials. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants, finding that the periodic reviews of the inmate's IPC status were meaningful. The court also found that the inmate's due process rights were not violated by his continued IPC status because the inmate was presented with a written explanation that his placement was due to the threat posed by his presence in the general population due to the heinous nature of his crime, and the inmate was provided with separate written explanations each time he protested his status. (Auburn Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
FAILURE TO PROTECT PRETRIAL DETAINEE
SEPARATION

Hale v. Tallapoosa County, 50 F.3d 1579 (11th Cir. 1995). A pretrial detainee filed a Section 1983 action against a county, its sheriff and a jailer arising from an alleged beating of the detainee by other inmates in a group cell. The U.S. District Court entered summary judgment in favor of the defendants and the detainee appealed. The appeals court, affirming in part, reversing in part and remanding, found that evidence that the jailer failed to check on the group cell during the hour between the last check and the beating was not sufficient to show deliberate indifference and causation necessary to hold the jailer individually liable for the detainee's injuries. However, genuine issues of material fact existed, precluding summary judgment for the sheriff and the county, on whether conditions of the cell subjected the detainee to a substantial risk of serious harm, whether the sheriff was deliberately indifferent to the risk, and whether the beating of the detainee was caused by the excessive risk of violence in the group cell resulting from an atmosphere of deliberate indifference. The evidence showed that the jail was overcrowded during the time in question. In addition, the sheriff testified that he knew of inmate violence during periods of overcrowding and that incidents had required hospitalization of inmates. Although the sheriff worked toward the construction of a new jail, the existing jail had no policy for classifying and segregating inmates, the jailer had received no professional training, and the jailer was stationed out of eyesight and earshot of the cell. (Tallapoosa County Jail, Alabama)

U.S. District Court
RECLASSIFICATION
CUSTODY LEVEL

Hall v. Griego, 896 F.Supp. 1043 (D.Colo. 1995). An inmate brought an action against prison officials alleging violation of his rights under the Religious Freedom Restoration Act (RFRA). The district court found that the inmate stated a claim for violation of his rights under RFRA in being prohibited from wearing headgear and being transferred after conducting religious services. The court held that material questions of fact precluded summary judgment on whether the inmate's transfers were retaliatory. The court noted that if a second correctional facility offers fewer or inferior opportunities for religious practice, the transfer of an inmate to that facility may be punitive, so as to be impermissible retaliation. The court found that reclassification of the inmate's security status did not trigger constitutional due process. (Colorado State Penitentiary)

U.S. District Court
CUSTODY LEVEL
TRANSFER
LENGTH OF SEGREGATION

Jones v. Moran, 900 F.Supp. 1267 (N.D.Cal. 1995). A prisoner brought a civil rights suit against prison officials based on his confinement in a secured housing unit beyond his scheduled release date. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants, finding that procedures employed in the prisoner's segregation did not violate due process and his liberty interest was not infringed by retention in a secured housing unit beyond his scheduled release date. The prisoner was not transferred out of the secured housing unit until two months after a Classification Security Representative approved the move. (Secured Housing Unit at Pelican Bay, California)

U.S. District Court
CUSTODY LEVEL REGULATIONS

Knox v. Lanham, 895 F.Supp. 750 (D.Md. 1995). A prisoner serving a life sentence with the possibility of parole brought an action against state corrections officials and parole commissioners alleging constitutional violations and seeking injunctive, declaratory, and monetary relief. The district court held that a corrections directive that moved inmates serving life sentences to higher security, combined with the parole commission's refusal to recommend parole unless inmates were on active work release--which required lower security classification, constituted retroactive "punishment" in violation of the ex post facto clause. The court noted that an unwritten policy of the parole commission requiring inmates to be on active work release was "law" for ex post facto purposes where the state had not disavowed the policy nor could the policy be deemed solely interpretive. The court found, however, that the removal of inmates from family leave and work release programs, their transfer from prerelease facilities, and their increased security levels did not violate equal protection. (Maryland Division of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
SEPARATION
TRANSSEXUAL

Long v. Nix, 877 F.Supp. 1358 (S.D. Iowa 1995). A prisoner claiming to be a transsexual brought a Section 1983 action against prison officials seeking to have appropriate living conditions and medical treatment provided for him. The district court found that the denial of desired accommodations and medical treatment did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment. The prisoner's transsexualism tendencies did not constitute a sufficient gender identity disorder to create a serious medical need for which treatment was mandated under the Eighth Amendment. An experienced physician who examined the prisoner concluded that his desires to cross-dress and anxieties regarding his sexual identity could be controlled by drugs. In addition, the prisoner had not requested a sex change operation and the staff had not shown deliberate indifference to the condition. The court also found that placing the prisoner claiming to be a transsexual in an "inappropriate" facility and denying him desired medical treatment without giving him an opportunity to be heard did not violate his Fourteenth Amendment due process rights. Also, the inmate had no Fourteenth Amendment due process right to a particular prison classification or status. Prison officials were entitled to qualified immunity on the claim by the inmate that he was denied a separate classification to accommodate his needs. Officials did not violate any clearly established constitutional rights of which reasonable prison officials would have known, as the claimant had no right to any particular medical treatment or to be classified in a certain way. (Iowa State Penitentiary)

U.S. District Court
GANGS
SEGREGATION

Madrid v. Gomez, 889 F.Supp. 1146 (N.D.Cal. 1995). Inmates brought a class action suit challenging conditions of confinement at a new high-security prison complex in California. The district court found for the plaintiffs in the majority of issues presented, ordered injunctive relief and appointed a special master to direct a remedial plan tailored to correct specific constitutional violations. In the beginning of its lengthy opinion, the court noted that this "...is not a case about inadequate or deteriorating physical conditions...rather, plaintiffs contend that behind the newly-minted walls and shiny equipment lies a prison that is coldly indifferent to the limited, but basic and elemental, rights that incarcerated persons--including the 'worst of the worst'--retain under...our Constitution." The court held that the fact that a prison may be new does not excuse its obligation to operate it in a constitutionally acceptable manner. The court held that prison inmates established prison officials' deliberate indifference to the use of excessive force by showing that they knew that unnecessary and grossly excessive force was being employed against inmates on a frequent basis and that these practices posed a substantial risk of harm to inmates. According to the court, officials consciously disregarded the risk of harm, choosing instead to tolerate and even encourage abuses of force by deliberately ignoring them when they occurred, tacitly accepting a code of silence, and failing to implement adequate systems to control and regulate the use of force. The court found that officials had an affirmative management strategy to permit the use of excessive force for the purpose of punishment and deterrence. The court upheld the prison's efforts to identify and separate gang members, finding that inmate's were not entitled to a hearing before a special services unit officer prior to being transferred to a segregated housing unit because of gang membership. The inmates were given an opportunity to present their views to the institutional gang investigator (IGI) and the IGI was the critical decision-maker in the process. Also, although some inmates who were transferred for gang membership may not have affirmatively engaged in gang activity while confined, the court held that evidence showed that gang members join gangs "for life," justifying their placement in security housing. (Pelican Bay State Prison, Calif.)

U.S. District Court
SEX OFFENDERS

Neal v. Shimoda, 905 F.Supp. 813 (D.Hawai'i 1995). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against prison officials alleging that their labeling of him as a "sex offender" violated his constitutional rights. The inmate had been compelled to participate in a sex offender treatment program, which required the inmate to admit his guilt. The inmate had refused to admit his guilt, affecting his chances for parole and preventing him from being transferred to a minimum security facility. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants, finding that the inmate had no constitutional liberty interest in a furlough or in freedom from being classified as a sex offender. The court ruled that the prison's policies did not create a protected liberty interest and that placement of the inmate in the prison's sex offender treatment program did not violate equal protection or the Eighth Amendment. The court also found that classifying the inmate as a sex offender, and its affect on the inmate's potential transfer to a minimum security facility and granting of a furlough, were not improper ex post facto laws. The court noted that even if an inmate was not convicted of any sex offense, the state had a legitimate interest in denying untreated sex offenders parole, furlough and minimum security classification based on their high rate of recidivism. The sex offender treatment program was not overbroad by including inmates who engaged in sexual misconduct during the course of nonsexual offenses. Denying the inmate parole or transfer to a minimum custody facility because he refused to admit guilt, which was the first step necessary for completion of the sex offender treatment program, did not violate the inmate's right against self-incrimination as the program was not a proceeding in which the answers could incriminate the inmate in future criminal proceedings. The program's requirement that the inmate not be in denial about his crime did not violate his Fifth Amendment right to be free from compelled testimony in light of the recognition that rehabilitation, including acceptance of responsibility, is an important sentencing consideration. (Halawa Correctional Facility, Hawai'i)

U.S. District Court
DUE PROCESS
LIBERTY INTEREST
SEGREGATION

Nettles v. Griffith, 883 F.Supp. 136 (E.D. Tex. 1995). A prisoner who was placed without a hearing in administrative segregation in a section of the jail designated primarily for the mentally imbalanced brought a Section 1983 action against the county sheriff and other officials. The district court found that the prisoner had a protected liberty interest in remaining in the general jail population, as opposed to administrative segregation. A jail official testified that, under the jail's rules, regulations, and practices, a notice and a hearing preceding administrative segregation was mandatory or expected. However, the prisoner's consultation with a jail official prior to being placed in administrative segregation did not constitute a hearing comporting with due process requirements. The official did not consider her discussion with the prisoner to be a disciplinary hearing, the prisoner never received even an informal notification of charges against him, and the nature of the charges was uncertain even at the time of the trial. Evidence supported a finding that a police lieutenant ordered the prisoner to administrative segregation, and thus committed a deliberate and intentional act within the purview of Section 1983. Although the lieutenant stated that she did not order the prisoner to administrative segregation, her statement conflicted with another officer's testimony and with the lieutenant's earlier testimony, and another officer testified that he understood that the prisoner was being placed in administrative segregation on the lieutenant's orders. The district court found that the appropriate damage award for the prisoner was $50 per day of segregation. (Jefferson County Detention Center, Beaumont, Texas)

U.S. Appeals Court
TRANSFER
CUSTODY LEVEL

Pratt v. Rowland, 65 F.3d 802 (9th Cir. 1995). A prisoner filed a § 1983 action against prison officials, alleging their transfer of him from one prison to another and his placement in a double cell was in retaliation for his exercise of his First Amendment rights. The district court granted a preliminary injunction against the inmate, which the appeals court reversed and remanded. The appeals court held that the prisoner failed to establish that the transfer was retaliatory and was not justified by neutral institutional objectives. The prisoner had given an interview to a television network and had been successful in previous lawsuits against prison officials; the interview occurred after the officials had met to transfer the prisoner, and there was no evidence that officials at the new prison who placed the inmate in a double cell were aware of the interview. (Mule Creek Prison, California)

U.S. Appeals Court
TRANSFER
CUSTODY LEVEL

Schroeder v. McDonald, 55 F.3d 454 (9th Cir. 1995). An inmate filed a pro se civil rights action alleging he was transferred in retaliation for filing a civil rights action against a prison guard. The district court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment in part and the appeals court reversed in part and remanded. The appeals court found that the prison officials were entitled to qualified immunity and that state prison regulations generally requiring that an inmate be held in the least restrictive level of confinement did not give rise to any liberty interest protected by due process. The court noted that evidence showed that the inmate was disrupting internal discipline during his first 16 days after transfer to a minimum security facility and that he was creating an excessive burden on staff by constantly demanding access to the law library and continuously requesting legal materials. The inmate was transferred back to the medium security facility from which he had come, and the court found that inmate had no constitutional right to remain in a facility which corresponded to the risk level at which he had been classified. (Hawai'i Department of Public Safety, Corrections Division)

U.S. District Court
DUE PROCESS
LIBERTY INTEREST

Treadwell v. Murray, 878 F.Supp. 49 (E.D. Va. 1995). A state inmate brought a Section 1983 action against supervisory prison personnel and an unknown physician. On a motion to dismiss, the district court found that the state inmate's broad allegations that supervisory prison personnel deprived him of a safe and rehabilitative environment by failing to oversee employees failed to state a Section 1983 claim based on supervisory liability where the inmate's claim focused on the single event of an unknown physician's alleged inappropriate initial medical classification of the inmate. In addition, neither the due process clause nor state statutes or regulations conferred upon the inmate a protected liberty interest in a particular classification. (Field Unit #30, Virginia)

U.S. Appeals Court
LOWER BUNK

Williams v. Ramos, 71 F.3d 1246 (7th Cir. 1995). An inmate sued prison officials alleging due process and Eighth Amendment violations. The district court granted summary judgment for the officials and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed the lower court decision. The court found that the inmate's 19-day segregation in a closed-front cell for 24 hours per day was not an atypical, significant deprivation that violated the inmate's rights. While in segregation the inmate was not allowed to participate in activities available to the general population, lacked much contact with other inmates or staff, and was handcuffed whenever he left his cell. The inmate had a medical certificate stating he should be assigned a lower bunk; prison officials offered him an upper bunk in a protective custody unit or a lower bunk in a segregation unit. The inmate chose the lower bunk. The court found that prison officials did not cause the inmate needless pain and suffering nor did they place him in an impossible situation in which he could not avoid pain or permanent injury. (Stateville Correctional Center, Illinois)

1996

U.S. Appeals Court
GANGS
TRANSFER

Babcock v. White, 102 F.3d 267 (7th Cir. 1996). A prisoner brought a Bivens claim against prison officials alleging violation of his rights as the result of his retention in administrative segregation and delays in transferring him to another facility. The prisoner had requested a transfer to another prison because of gang members who had threatened to kill him. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded the case. The appeals court held that prison officials did not violate the prisoner's Eighth Amendment rights or due process rights by keeping him in the facility despite his fear of physical harm, because no harm was inflicted and there was no indication of malice on the part of the officials. The court noted that the prisoner had originally requested placement in administrative segregation and therefore could not claim that he was deprived of the opportunity to earn good time credits. But the appeals court found that the prisoner had stated a claim that the officials had acted in retaliation for the prisoner's right to petition for redress of grievances, precluding summary judgment. The court also held that the officials were not entitled to qualified immunity. In its decision, the appeals court stated "John Babcock is living proof of the dangers that prison gangs pose to inmates, and of the logistical nightmare they create for prison administrators." Babcock had claimed that he was held in administrative segregation for ten months while the officials processed his request to be transferred to another prison. (United States Penitentiary, Terre Haute, Indiana)

U.S. District Court
DUE PROCESS
SEGREGATION

Christianson v. Clarke, 932 F.Supp. 1178 (D.Neb. 1996). A state inmate brought a § 1983 action against prison officials alleging violation of his Fourth Amendment due process rights. The inmate had been placed on immediate segregation, administrative confinement, and protective custody pending investigation of an assault charge. The district court dismissed the case finding the inmate failed to allege facts sufficient to implicate a state created liberty interest and noting that even if a liberty interest had been created the inmate had received all process due to him. The inmate did not allege that he faced the possibility of losing good time credits or that his release date could be affected by administrative segregation. The inmate was afforded a hearing before each classification decision and the inmate was given notice prior to each hearing and was given an opportunity to make a statement at each hearing. (Lincoln Correctional Center, Nebraska)

U.S. Appeals Court
TRUSTY

Davis v. Fulton County, Ark., 90 F.3d 1346 (8th Cir. 1996). A victim of rape and assault by a prisoner who had escaped from a county detention center brought an action alleging claims under § 1983 against county staff and officials. The district court dismissed the claims and the appeals court affirmed. The court found that the victim failed to establish that the danger to her resulting from the prisoner leaving the detention center was any greater than that faced by the general public in the area, as required to maintain a § 1983 claim. The court also found that the victim failed to allege that the duty jailer acted intentionally, or was not performing official county functions in failing to prevent the prisoner from escaping. (Fulton County Detention Center, Arkansas)

U.S. District Court
TREATMENT

Douglas v. DeBruyn, 936 F.Supp. 572 (S.D.Ind. 1996). An inmate who was assigned to the "idle unit" of a prison filed an in forma pauperis complaint alleging violation of § 1983. The district court found the complaint to be frivolous within the meaning of the in forma pauperis statute. The court held that the absence of a job, and the absence of vocational, educational and rehabilitation programs does not violate due process. The court noted that while such programs and activities might be useful and productive as a matter of correctional policy, the absence of them does not create any atypical and significant hardships on an inmate in relation to the ordinary incidents of prison life. According to the court, to sustain a viable Eighth Amendment violation the inmate would have to allege that conditions in the idle unit constituted an excessive risk to his health or safety. The court also noted that inmates have no constitutional right to recreation and that only the objective harm that can result from significant deprivation of movement implicates the Eighth Amendment. (Correctional Industrial Complex, Indiana)

U.S. District Court
CELL ASSIGNMENT
CLASSIFICATION
CRITERIA

El Tabech v. Gunter, 922 F.Supp. 244 (D.Neb. 1996). Inmates sued corrections officials alleging that the practice of double celling inmates with random cell assignment violated the Eighth Amendment. The district court ordered remedial measures and the officials appealed; the appeals court remanded the case for certification of findings. On remand, the district court held that evidence was sufficient to find that prison officials actually knew of and disregarded the substantial risk to the safety of inmates posed by making random double cell assignments without the use of classification information and without determining inmate compatibility. The court noted that evidence supported the conclusion that the level of violence at the penitentiary, including violence in double cells, posed a substantial risk of harm to inmates. The court found that remedial measures, such as cell moves, protective custody, or posting staff on a gallery, did not render the decision not to use classification information reasonable. The court found that evidence established that wardens were personally responsible for the failure to use classification information before making cell assignments. (Nebraska State Penitentiary)

U.S. District Court
SEPARATION

Estep v. Dent, 914 F.Supp. 1462 (W.D.Ky. 1996). An inmate moved for a preliminary injunction in this suit against prison officials. The district court denied the motion with regard to the inmate's allegation that he was deprived of opportunities for outdoor exercise while he was housed in a particular housing unit. The court noted that prison officials had already begun to build an outdoor recreation site for that unit and therefore recognized the need and were resolving the problem. The court also denied the motion with regard to the inmate's assertion that his safety was endangered because prison officials allowed inmates of different classifications to exercise together. (Kentucky State Penitentiary)

U.S. District Court
CELL ASSIGNMENT

Evans v. Hennessy, 934 F.Supp. 127 (D.Del. 1996). An inmate sued a guard alleging violation of his civil rights when the guard struck him twice on the head with a closed fist. The court found that evidence established that the guard struck the inmate without justification or reasonable apprehension of physical harm, in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The court awarded damages in the amount of $7,500. However, the court found that moving the inmate away from other prisoners to a cell closer to the guard post to prevent him from disrupting and inciting other inmates was not a violation of the inmate's First Amendment right of free speech, and the change of cells did not violate any constitutionally protected liberty interest because the inmate was not moved to a more restrictive unit. (Sussex Correctional Institution, Delaware)

U.S. District Court
CUSTODY LEVEL
TRANSFER TREATMENT

Garrett v. Angelone, 940 F.Supp. 933 (W.D.Va. 1996). A state prisoner brought a pro se action against prison officials asserting § 1983 claims and violation of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA). The district court found that the prisoner's allegations were insufficient to support a claim under ADA. The court also found that changes in the prisoner's custody status, security status, and earning rates for good conduct time did not violate due process. The court noted that an inmate's security level, custody status and opportunity to earn good conduct time are subject to change at any time during incarceration based on the behavior of the inmate and discretion of prison officials. The court also noted that an inmate's parole eligibility date and mandatory parole release date are estimates only, subject to change based on changes in an inmate's other classifications. According to the court, an inmate has no constitutional right to be paroled at all before the expiration of his valid criminal sentence--let alone on a specific date. (Virginia Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
PROTECTIVE CUSTODY
GANGS

Jelinek v. Greer, 90 F.3d 242 (7th Cir. 1996). A prison inmate who was seriously injured after he was removed from protective custody filed a civil rights action against prison officials. The district court granted summary judgment to the prison officials and the appeals court affirmed, finding that moving the inmate from protective custody despite his fears of harm from gang members whom he turned in did not show that the prison officials knowingly disregarded a serious risk of harm to the inmate. The prison officials had assigned the inmate a space that was less protected than protective custody, but which was not in the general population. (Menard Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
CELL ASSIGNMENT
SEPARATION

Jensen v. Clarke, 94 F.3d 1191 (8th Cir. 1996). State prison inmates brought a § 1983 action against prison officials alleging that randomly assigning new inmates to double cells substantially increased the risk of violence by cellmates. On remand from an appeal of a remedial plan, the district court ruled that prison officials had actual knowledge of and disregarded a substantial risk of safety to inmates posed by random cell assignments. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the practice was cruel and unusual punishment and noting that this suit was a failure-to-protect case focusing on the manner of assigning new inmates to cells, rather than a prison crowding case. The court found that cruel and unusual punishment was established by evidence that demonstrated the increased number of inmates found guilty of violent offenses, the number of inmates requesting protective custody, and anecdotal evidence of violence from prisoners. The appeals court held that prison officials were entitled to qualified immunity in their individual capacities in light of the diversity of precedent on the need for classifying cellmates. The appeals court found that a district court injunction which required prison officials to use available classification information to determine cellmate compatibility was a proper remedy, after officials chose to take a premature appeal rather than remedy the constitutional violation. (Nebraska State Penitentiary)

U.S. District Court
CLASSIFICATION
SUICIDE
CELL ASSIGNMENT

Johnson v. Hill, 910 F.Supp. 218 (E.D.Pa. 1996). A county prisoner sued officials alleging violation of his rights with respect to housing and medical treatment. The district court dismissed the case, ruling that prisoner placement in housing is a matter of prison administration; the prisoner had claimed he was wrongfully placed in a cell block that housed people accused of murder and rape and people with high bail. The court also found that the inmate did not state a claim for an Eighth Amendment violation with respect to the officials' responses to his thoughts of suicide or to his injuries when he slit his wrists. The court found that the prisoner had not communicated a strong likelihood that he would inflict harm on himself, but rather that there as a mere possibility that harm would occur. Medical care received for self-inflicted injuries to his wrist was adequate where a nurse examined his wrist daily for two weeks following the injury. (Delaware County Prison, Pennsylvania)

U.S. District Court
PROTECTIVE CUSTODY

Jones v. Russell, 950 F.Supp. 855 (N.D.Ill. 1996). A prisoner filed a § 1983 complaint against prison officials for denying him protective custody and sought leave to proceed in forma pauperis. The district court dismissed the complaint, finding that the prisoner failed to state a claim absent any allegation of a history of assaults against him or of a particular vulnerability. The court noted that in determining under the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) whether to dismiss, a motion to dismiss may be granted only if the court concludes that no relief could be granted under any set of facts that could be proved consistent with the plaintiff's allegations. (Stateville Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
DISCIPLINE

Keenan v. Hall, 83 F.3d 1083 (9th Cir. 1996). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against prison officials and employees. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part and reversed in part, finding that summary judgment was precluded for several allegations. The inmate was found to have presented sufficient evidence to preclude summary judgment on his claim that he was deprived of outdoor exercise, in violation of his constitutional rights, while he was confined for six months at the maximum security prison. (Oregon State Prison)

U.S. Appeals Court
CUSTODY LEVEL
TREATMENT

Kerr v. Farrey, 95 F.3d 472 (7th Cir. 1996). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against corrections officials alleging that requiring him to attend religious-based narcotics rehabilitation meetings violated his constitutional rights. The district court granted summary judgment to the defendants but the appeals court reversed and remanded. The appeals court found that requiring the inmate to attend meetings upon pain of being rated a higher security risk and suffering adverse effects for parole eligibility violated the establishment clause, but that the defendants were entitled to qualified immunity. The court held that under the establishment clause the inmate could not be forced to attend meetings of an organization for narcotics rehabilitation whose program referred to "God, as we understood Him." (Oakhill Correctional Institution, Wisconsin)

U.S. District Court
CUSTODY LEVEL
TRANSFERS

Marshall v. Reno, 915 F.Supp. 426 (D.D.C. 1996). A former federal prisoner who was a Canadian citizen sued federal officials alleging violation of his rights due to the officials' failure to transfer or deport him to his home country and denial of access to release programs which were available to United States citizens. The district court dismissed the case, finding that the prisoner did not have a protected liberty interest in obtaining deportation or transfer, nor did he have a right to be incarcerated at a particular prison or under a certain security classification. Although there was a treaty between the United States and Canada that allowed the transfer of the prisoner, the court noted that this was a discretionary matter which afforded the prisoner no right to a transfer. The Federal Bureau of Prisons program statement that limited access of aliens to community confinement facilities and minimum security facilities did not, according to the court, violate the equal protection clause. (Federal Bureau of Prisons)

U.S. District Court
CUSTODY LEVEL

Meyer v. Federal Bureau of Prisons, 940 F.Supp. 9 (D.D.C. 1996). A federal prisoner brought an action against the Bureau of Prisons and his case manager claiming violation of his rights under the Privacy Act, Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) and the Constitution. The district court held that the prisoner was not entitled under the Privacy Act to amend his custody classification form, since the Bureau's regulations exempted such forms from the Privacy Act's requirements. The court ruled that summary judgment was precluded on the prisoner's FOIA claim due to genuine issues of material fact regarding the existence of documents which were the subject of the prisoner's FOIA request. The court held that the prisoner failed to establish that he had suffered any adverse determination as the result of an allegedly improper rating in his custody classification form. (Fed. Medical Ctr, Rochester, MN)

U.S. District Court
LIBERTY INTEREST
CUSTODY LEVEL

Meyer v. Reno, F.Supp. 11 (D.D.C. 1996). An inmate at a federal prison in Minnesota sued federal authorities, alleging that prison officials and staff conspired to secure detainers against him from local authorities in Florida, barring him from a lower custody classification. The prisoner alleged that these actions negatively affected his programming and resulted in a longer period of incarceration than would have been required if he had been able to attain a lower security status. The district court ruled that it could not exert its authority over some of the defendants. The court also found that the inmate did not have a protected liberty interest under the due process clause, and that prison officials were entitled to qualified immunity. (Federal Bureau of Prisons, Sandstone FCI, Minnesota)

U.S. Appeals Court
RELIGION

Ochs v. Thalacker, 90 F.3d 293 (8th Cir. 1996). A state inmate filed a § 1983 action against prison officials, alleging violation of his due process rights. The inmate had requested that he be housed with persons of his own race, claiming a religious motivation, and officials refused his request. The inmate also alleged deliberate indifference to his allergic reaction to metal handcuffs. The district court dismissed the complaint and the appeals court affirmed. The court held that officials had legitimate reasons for rejecting the inmate's request for segregated housing, as they believed that random cell assignment lessened racial tensions and promoted security. The court found that officials did not subsequently assign him to administrative segregation in retaliation for his request; evidence showed that the officials segregated the inmate to protect him and others because he had identified himself as a racist at a time of racial tension in the prison. The court also held that the inmate failed to prove that he had a serious medical need, as he experienced only a mild discomfort from two or three brief exposures to metal handcuffs, and he was issued new protective coverings as soon as he requested help from a medical professional. (Iowa Mens Reformatory)

U.S. Appeals Court
SMOKING
SEPARATION

Oliver v. Deen, 77 F.3d 156 (7th Cir. 1996). A state prison inmate sued prison officials seeking damages for alleged violation of his Eighth Amendment rights by housing him with smoking cellmates. The district court entered summary judgment in favor of the defendants and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the inmate failed to demonstrate that he had a sufficiently serious medical need to implicate the Eighth Amendment or to provide the basis for an award of damages. The court noted that while the inmate was asthmatic and showed signs of discomfort and the prison doctor issued a permit to the inmate to have a nonsmoking cellmate, the inmate's medical records showed that his asthma was mild, that he never required outside hospitalization, and the only evidence of a causal relationship between smoke and the inmate's discomfort was a few general news articles which indicated that smoke could aggravate an asthmatic condition. (Pontiac Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
SPECIAL NEEDS
MENTALLY ILL
SEX OFFENDERS

Riddle v. Mondragon, 83 F.3d 1197 (10th Cir. 1996). Twenty-one inmates who had been convicted of sex offenses filed separate civil rights claims against state prison officials, judges, legislators and other state officials. The district court consolidated the actions and granted the defendants' motion to dismiss. The inmates appealed the dismissal of certain claims relating to denial of medical treatment, failure to protect, and equal protection. The appeals court affirmed the lower court decision. The inmates alleged that prison officials failed to include sex offenders within prison policies concerning minimum custody status, work release, community corrections, and purposeful classification in medium custody. They challenged their classification as violent offenders which made them ineligible for various pre- and post-sentencing programs. The court ruled that these allegations, if proven, would fail to establish that the different treatment afforded to sex offenders was irrational or arbitrary, and that sex offenders did not constitute a suspect class for equal protection purposes. (Southern New Mexico Correctional Facility)

U.S. District Court
CUSTODY LEVEL
RECLASSIFICATION

Sandefur v. Lewis, 937 F.Supp. 890 (D.Ariz. 1996). A state inmate brought a § 1983 action asserting violation of his due process rights when he was placed in administrative segregation without a hearing, and when his security status was reclassified. The district court held that confinement in administrative segregation for 141 days did not implicate a due process liberty interest, and that security reclassification did not implicate due process. (State Prison Complex in Tucson, Arizona)

U.S. Appeals Court
AIDS

Tokar v. Armontrout, 97 F.3d 1078 (8th Cir. 1996). A former inmate infected with the HIV virus brought a § 1983 action against former prison officials claiming that conditions in the segregation unit for HIV-positive inmates constituted cruel and unusual punishment and that his placement in the unit violated his right to privacy. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the officials and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the former inmate failed to show that the combination of broken windows and leaking roof in his housing unit caused a deprivation of an essential human need such as food, warmth or exercise; the inmate's cubicle did not have a window and the roof above his cubicle did not leak, and the inmate was able to use a blanket to stay warm before broken windows in the unit were repaired. The court also found that the inmate failed to establish that the alleged filthiness of toilet facilities in the housing unit violated the Eighth Amendment, noting that the inmate admitted that he had never asked for cleaning supplies. The appeals court held that the officials were entitled to qualified immunity with regard to the inmate's claim for violation of his right to privacy. The court noted that the inmate did not have a clearly established right to nondisclosure of his HIV status at the time he was segregated. (Jefferson City Correctional Center, Missouri)

U.S. District Court
CELL ASSIGNMENT

Webb v. Lawrence County, 950 F.Supp. 960 (D.S.D. 1996). A prisoner sued county correctional officials alleging civil rights violations under § 1983 and common-law negligence, seeking compensatory and punitive damages in connection with a sexual assault by another prisoner. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants and dismissed the negligence and punitive damages claims. The court ruled that the incarceration of the plaintiff in the same cell as a prisoner who sexually assaulted him did not give rise to a cause of action against corrections officials under § 1983. The court found that the officials had no reason to be aware and were not in fact aware of an excessive risk to the plaintiff's health or safety, noting that the prisoner who committed the assault had assaulted no other prisoners while incarcerated nor had the plaintiff notified officials of his fear of his cellmate or of any assaults until he had been assaulted for four straight days. The court also found that under South Dakota law, the purchase of liability insurance by the county on behalf of prison officials did not waive the officials' statutory immunity from personal liability for negligence. (Lawrence County Jail, South Dakota)

1997

U.S. District Court
BUNKS-LOWER

Boblett v. Angelone, 957 F.Supp. 808 (W.D.Va. 1997). An inmate filed a pro se § 1983 action against prison officials alleging constitutionally inadequate treatment for his knee problems and exposure to environmental tobacco smoke (ETS). The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court found that the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) did not apply to state prisons and that prison officials' alleged denial of proper rehabilitative therapy and knee braces did not amount to deliberate indifference. The court also found that the officials' refusal to assign the inmate to a nonsmoking dormitory and to assign him to a bottom bunk did not violate his constitutional rights. According to the court, the inmate failed to establish that the level of environmental tobacco smoke (ETS) to which he was exposed for a four-day period had created an unreasonable risk of serious damage to his future health. Although a prison physician did not examine the inmate until approximately one month after the inmate requested to see a physician, the court found nothing in the record to suggest that the delay stemmed from any deliberate indifference on the part of the physician or any other prison official. The court also found that the failure of prison officials to arrange for the inmate's immediate consultation with a prison physician regarding the inmate's request for a medical transfer did not amount to deliberate indifference. (Bland Correctional Center, Virginia)

U.S. District Court
PROTECTIVE CUSTODY

Carrigan v. State of Del., 957 F.Supp. 1376 (D.Del. 1997). A female inmate brought a civil rights action against prison officials and a guard as the result of an alleged rape by the guard. The district court found that the inmate did not establish deliberate indifference by prison officials where the officials had a policy forbidding sexual contact between correctional officers and inmates. The alleged rapist had received a total of 64 hours of training, and the inmate offered no expert opinion to rebut an expert report that the training was adequate. The court found that prison officials were entitled to qualified immunity. The court noted that the inmate's transfer to protective custody following her alleged rape by a guard did not show deliberate indifference but, rather, showed the prison officials' attentiveness to her condition as they were aware that her claims put her at risk of attack by other inmates. The court found that the inmate failed to establish an Eighth Amendment violation through evidence of other incidents because nearly all of those incidents occurred after the alleged rape, and those which occurred prior took place at a different institution or were unsubstantiated by the inmate involved. However, the court found that the inmate had stated a claim based on gross or wanton negligence, or bad faith, against the guard. (Delaware Dept. of Correction)

U.S. District Court
CLASSIFICATION
CRITERIA
SEPARATION

Carty v. Farrelly, 957 F.Supp. 727 (D.Virgin Islands 1997). Detainees and inmates housed in a criminal justice complex asked the court to find officials in civil contempt of a consent decree. The district court found that the consent decree comported with the principles of the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) because it was narrowly drawn, extended no further than necessary to correct the violation of federal rights, and was the least intrusive means necessary to correct the violations. The court found the officials in contempt for failing to comply with the terms of the consent decree, and continued noncompliance with a court order requiring officials to pay detainees' and inmates' attorney fees. The officials admitted they never fully complied with the order and failed to make meaningful progress toward reducing the inmate population. The court cited "abominable" treatment of mentally ill inmates at the facility. Mentally ill inmates were housed together in clusters with often four or five inmates per cell and the majority of inmate assaults occurred in the clusters. According to the court, when overcrowding and commingling of mentally ill inmates with the general population contributes to inmate-to-inmate violence, the failure to remedy the situation constitutes deliberate indifference to the inmates' basic safety and security in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The court also cited the failure of officials to house inmates according to an objectively based classification system and the failure to maintain separate housing for violent inmates. (Criminal Justice Complex, St. Thomas, Virgin Islands)

U.S. District Court
RACIAL
DISCRIMINATION

De La Paz v. Peters, 959 F.Supp. 909 (N.D.Ill. 1997). An incontinent prisoner brought a § 1983 action against corrections officials alleging they were deliberately indifferent to his serious medical needs in violation of the Eighth Amendment by refusing him daily showers. The prisoner also alleged that denial of his request to transfer to an honor dorm that had more showers was the product of racial discrimination in violation of equal protection. The court granted summary judgment in favor of the officials, finding that although the prisoner's incontinence was a serious medical condition, the officials did not display deliberate indifference to his condition because they had made special provisions for him, including permission to shower more frequently than other inmates. Because the law was not clearly established that an incontinent inmate was entitled to daily showers, the court found that the officials were entitled to qualified immunity. The court also held that the Indian-American/Mexican-American prisoner failed to establish that denial of his request to transfer to an honor farm was motivated by racial discrimination; the mere fact that there were very few Mexican-American inmates in the honor dorm was insufficient to establish racial discrimination. (Joliet Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
FAILURE TO PROTECT
SEPARATION

K.F.P. v. Dane County, 110 F.3d 516 (7th Cir. 1997). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against a county, a sheriff, and correctional facility employees after he was assaulted by another inmate. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the inmate failed to present evidence establishing the liability of the employees, sheriff or county. The inmate failed to isolate for the court which individuals knew of another inmate's threatening nature and disregarded the danger to the plaintiff inmate. The court found that the inmate failed to establish that the county had a policy of housing violent and nonviolent inmates together, or that any county official knew of a causal link between the alleged policy and harm to inmates. The inmate was serving a forty-six day sentence in a dormitory-like facility used to house inmates with work release privileges. About a week into his sentence, the inmate was sexually assaulted by another inmate, and a week later the same inmate threatened to assault the plaintiff inmate again. (Dane County Ferris Center, Wisconsin)

U.S. District Court
CELL ASSIGNMENT
FAILURE TO PROTECT

Killingsworth v. Ondahl, 978 F.Supp. 1425 (D.Kan. 1997). An inmate brought a Bivens action alleging that prison officials were deliberately indifferent to his safety by placing him in a holding cell with a prisoner who had previously assaulted him. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the officials, finding that the record did not show that the officials had information suggesting that the prisoner presented a threat to the inmate's safety. According to the court, it did not appear that the inmate notified officials of his belief that they should be separated, and the inmate did not allege that the prisoner made any effort to harm him while they were celled together. (United States Penitentiary, Leavenworth, Kansas)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEGREGATION
LENGTH OF SEGREGATION
LIBERTY INTEREST

Mackey v. Dyke, 111 F.3d 460 (6th Cir. 1997). A state inmate brought a § 1983 action against state corrections officials alleging violation of his due process right when they failed to reclassify him promptly after he was released from administrative segregation. The district court granted summary judgment for the officials and the inmate appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded, and the district court again granted summary judgment for the officials. The appeals court affirmed, finding that because an inmate's detention in administrative segregation did not create a liberty interest, failure to release him to the general population upon his release from segregation did not amount to a procedural due process violation. The court noted that the delay in transferring the inmate after his release was understandable given the corrections system's need to find him a bed at a suitable security level institution in an overcrowded system. (Michigan Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEX OFFENDER
DUE PROCESS

Neal v. Shimoda, 131 F.3d 818 (9th Cir. 1997). Two state prisoners brought separate § 1983 actions against prison officials and administrators of a state's sex offender treatment program. They claimed that labelling them as sex offenders and compelling them to admit guilt violated their constitutional rights. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants and the prisoners' appeals were consolidated. The appeals court held that the sex offender treatment program did not violate the Ex Post Facto Clause because denying a prisoner's eligibility for parole so that he could participate in treatment was not punishment. But the appeals court found that labelling a prisoner who was not convicted of a sex offense as a "sex offender" without a hearing, and requiring the successful completion of a treatment program as a precondition for parole eligibility, created a liberty interest protected by due process. The appeals court held that a prisoner is entitled to an advance statement of the reasons for the classification and to a hearing at which he can present a defense. According to the court, a prisoner convicted of a sex offense received all process to which he was due when he was notified that he was classified as a sex offender due to his conviction. The court found that a prisoner whose labelling as a sex offender violated due process was entitled to injunctive relief. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed and remanded in part with instructions. The appeals court instructed the district court to issue an injunction ordering the Hawaii Parole Authority to remove "sex offender" from one of the prisoner's classifications unless and until he is provided with a hearing that provides him with the procedural protections contained in Wolff. (Hawaii Sex Offender Treatment Program)

1998

U.S. District Court
DUE PROCESS
TRANSFER
SEGREGATION

Batts v. Richards, 4 F.Supp.2d 96 (D.Conn. 1998). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against correctional officials alleging that his placement in administrative segregation and transfer to a different facility violated his due process rights. The district court granted summary judgment for the officials, finding that no due process violation occurred. According to the court, the inmate received due process because he was given written notice of a classification hearing 48 hours in advance, was given the opportunity to call witnesses, was given a hearing before a hearing officer with a staff advocate acting on his behalf, and the hearing officer issued a written report. (Northern Correctional Institution, Somers, Connecticut)

U.S. District Court
LOWER BUNK

Bout v. Bolden, 22 F.Supp.2d 646 (E.D.Mich. 1998). A prisoner brought a civil rights action against prison officials. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants, finding that a prison official was not deliberately indifferent in refusing to reassign the prisoner to a lower bunk, even though the prisoner had been given a "medical detail" for assignment to a lower bunk. According to the court, even assuming that the official had knowledge of the medical detail, refusal to comply would not have posed conscious disregard for excessive risk to the prisoner's health and safety, given evidence of malingering in the prisoner's medical records. The court also held that drilling the prisoner's teeth without anesthesia for a short period in order to treat a dental condition is not the sort of barbarous and wanton infliction of pain from which a prisoner is protected by the Eighth Amendment. (Michigan Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
PROTECTIVE CUSTODY

Bullock v. Barham, 23 F.Supp.2d 883 (N.D.Ill. 1998). A prisoner sued prison officials under § 1983 seeking to enjoin his transfer from protective custody to the general population, alleging the officials had previously failed to protect him from inmates who had threatened his life. The district court held that the prisoner's claim for injunctive relief to enjoin his transfer was cognizable, even though he was currently in protective custody, because the prison officials had previously failed to protect him from inmates and had transferred him back to the general population several times. The court denied the prisoner's claim for damages because the prisoner did not allege any physical injury. The prisoner had been a member of the Black Gangster street gang and alleged that the gang had placed a "hit" on him in retaliation for leaving the gang. (Joliet Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
CUSTODY LEVEL
SPECIAL NEEDS

Collins v. Hannigan, 14 F.Supp.2d 1239 (D.Kan. 1998). An inmate brought a pro se action against prison officials, a physician and a nurse, alleging that his constitutional rights were violated by their responses to his health-related complaints, which resulted in his transfer from minimum security to maximum security. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court found that changes in the inmate's medical and security classifications which resulted in his transfer from minimum security to maximum security, his inability to participate in a work program, and short visitation periods, did not pose an atypical and significant hardship that violated the due process clause. According to the court, denial of the opportunity to participate in an in-house work program does not raise due process concerns. The court held that a corrections officer did not violate the Eighth Amendment when he ordered the inmate, who had a heart condition, to clean baseboards. The inmate did not suffer serious injury but at most was dizzy and suffered some pain, and the officer checked with a physician before ordering the inmate to work. The court also found that the Eighth Amendment was not violated when a corrections officer allegedly waited 15 minutes before summoning medical assistance at the request of the inmate. The court held that the transfer of the inmate to a maximum security facility after his heart condition prevented him from working did not violate equal protection, and was justified by his need to be located close to a prison clinic. (Hutchinson Correctional Facility, Kansas)

U.S. District Court
CLASSIFICATION

Essex County Jail Annex Inmates v. Treffinger, 18 F.Supp.2d 445 (D.N.J. 1998). Inmates filed a motion to hold county corrections defendants in civil contempt for noncompliance with a consent decree addressing unconstitutional conditions of confinement. The district court held that monetary sanctions for civil contempt were not appropriate in light of the county's efforts to attain full compliance by investing over $200 million in new facilities and improving existing ones. The court concluded that contempt sanctions would be counterproductive and would impede the county's efforts to build a new jail. The court held that it could not consider whether a classification plan satisfied the consent decree until an independent analysis was conducted. The court noted that the Special Master reported that staffing was inadequate, and as a result inmates and staff are exposed to danger and other problems. The court adopted the Master's recommendation that an independent, professional staffing analysis be conducted to address staff training, coverage and operations. The Master also reported that there was an insufficient supply of personal hygiene items, and the court ordered the defendants to comply with the consent order's terms by issuing adequate amounts of personal hygiene items, including toilet paper, soap, shampoo, toothpaste, toothbrush, comb, mirror, individual razors and shaving cream or powder. (Essex County Jail and Essex County Jail Annex, New Jersey)

U.S. District Court
PRETRIAL DE-TAINEES
SEPARATION

Faulcon v. City of Philadelphia, 18 F.Supp.2d 537 (E.D.Pa. 1998). A pretrial detainee who had been stabbed by another inmate sued city officials and correction officers, alleging failure to protect, failure to supervise and failure to train under the Eighth Amendment. The district court granted summary judgment to the defendants, finding that the facility's policy of keeping pretrial detainees in the same housing unit as convicted inmates did not constitute deliberate indifference to a substantial risk of harm. The court also held that the lack of guidelines or training procedures regarding segregation of convicted inmates was insufficient to support claims for failure to supervise or failure to train. According to the court, a state statutory provision that indicated that sentenced prisoners should be housed separately from detainees was merely a recommended guideline rather than a mandatory requirement. (Philadelphia Industrial Corr'l Center, Penn.)

U.S. Appeals Court INTERPRETER

Franklin v. District of Columbia, 163 F.3d 625 (D.C.Cir. 1998). Spanish-speaking prisoners incarcerated in eight District of Columbia correctional facilities brought a class action under § 1983 alleging that the District violated their First, Fifth and Eighth Amendment rights as well as federal and local statutes by failing to provide qualified interpreters when they appeared at parole and disciplinary hearings and when they sought medical care. The district court found that the District violated the Fifth and Eighth Amendments and entered an injunction. The appeals court vacated in part and reversed in part. The appeals court held that the prisoners lacked standing to assert due process challenges regarding parole hearings for misdemeanants because they did not name any members of the class who went before the parole board as misdemeanants and did not understand the proceedings because of lack of proficiency in English. Upon learning that the authority for parole of felons had been transferred to the United States Parole Commission since the district court had ruled, the appeals court stated that "why neither of the parties, and why especially the District of Columbia never alerted us to this statute is beyond comprehension." The appeals court found that failure to provide interpreters at all disciplinary hearings, adjustment board hearings, housing determinations, and classification decisions did not violate due process. The appeals court also found that the District's failure to provide interpreters for prisoners during medical consultations was not cruel and unusual punishment. (District of Columbia)

U.S. Appeals Court
CUSTODY LEVEL

Frost v. Agnos, 152 F.3d 1124 (9th Cir. 1998). A pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 suit against a sheriff, corrections officers and others alleging that he was subjected to unconstitutional conditions because of his disability. The district court entered judgment for the officers and the detainee appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part and remanded. The appeals court held that, as a matter of first impression, denial of adequate handicapped-accessible shower facilities to the detainee who wore a leg cast and relied on crutches could support a § 1983 claim. The appeals court held that the detainee failed to establish a § 1983 claim that he was improperly classified as a close custody inmate, absent any showing that the jail's classification system was not reasonably related to legitimate penological interests. (Madison Street Jail, Maricopa County, Arizona)

U.S. District Court
CELL ASSIGNMENT
LOWER BUNK

Hron v. Jenkins, 15 F.Supp.2d 1082 (D.Kan. 1998). An inmate brought a Bivens action against prison officials alleging violation of his Eighth Amendment rights. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants, finding that the officials did not show deliberate indifference to the inmate's medical needs when they assigned him to an upper bunk. The inmate was susceptible to seizures and he was assigned to an upper tier cell after he returned from reconstructive knee surgery that was required after he fell from his upper bunk. The court found that the cell and bunk assignments reflected, at most, negligence. (United States Penitentiary, Leavenworth, Kansas)

U.S. District Court
SEPARATION

Mabine v. Vaughn, 25 F.Supp.2d 587 (E.D.Pa. 1998). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against three prison officials alleging that they failed to protect him from other inmates. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants, finding that the fact that the inmate's attacker was inadvertently released into the general prison population did not violate the Eighth Amendment. The court also found no violation in the fact that prison officials failed to keep the inmate separate from another inmate who was the victim's brother. (State Correctional Institution at Graterford, Pennsylvania)

U.S. District Court
SMOKING

McPherson v. Coombe, 29 F.Supp.2d 141 (W.D.N.Y. 1998). An inmate brought a § 1983 action alleging violations of his First, Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment rights arising from his exposure to environmental tobacco smoke (ETS). The district court denied the defendants' motion for summary judgment, finding that it was precluded by fact questions as to whether smoke conditions in the prison violated contemporary standards of decency, whether officials were aware of the potential risks to the inmate's future health, and whether the superintendent was personally involved in decisions leading to denial of the inmate's request to be housed in a smoke-free environment. The court found that prison smoking regulations, which permitted smoking in dormitory areas, did not violate the inmate's First Amendment rights to freedom of association because designated non-smoking areas gave the inmate opportunities to exercise his right to associate with other inmates. The inmate had alleged that the smoking policy restricted his movement within the dormitory in his attempt to evade contact with ETS. (Attica Correctional Facility and Orleans Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
MENTALLY ILL

Morales Feliciano v. Rossello Gonzalez, 13 F.Supp.2d 151 (D.Puerto Rico 1998). In an ongoing action against a corrections system seeking improvement of medical and mental health care provided to inmates, an expert witness prepared a report documenting the state of compliance with prior orders that had been entered. The district court held that the correctional system continued to violate inmates' Fifth, Eighth, and Fourteenth Amendment rights by failing to provide adequate medical care. The court found that the officials' actions or lack thereof contributed to the deaths of inmates and to the infliction of pain and suffering. The court ruled that there were systematic deficiencies in staffing, facilities, procedures and administration, and that officials acted in a manner that was deliberately indifferent to the basic human and health needs of inmates. The court held that the officials failed to hospitalize inmates whose mental health condition required the therapeutic environment of a mental health treatment facility, allowing several mentally ill patients to continue to cohabit with the general population without being tendered any type of mental health treatment. The court noted that budgetary limitations or inadequate resources can never be a valid justification for constitutional violations. The court concluded that the system had failed to provide adequate facilities and equipment necessary for the provision of adequate health care of inmates pursuant to acceptable professional standards. But the court noted that despite the findings of the expert, the National Commission on Correctional Health Care had accredited the medical care programs in four prisons and awarded provisional accreditation to four more in 1992. But an expert found noncompliance with at least one essential standard at every accredited facility, and the Department of Health provided the court monitor's staff with credible evidence that employees had falsified documents in support of accreditation. (Administration of Correction, Puerto Rico)

U.S. Supreme Court
ADA-Americans with Disabilities Act
HANDICAP

Pennsylvania Dept. of Corrections v. Yeskey, 118 S.Ct. 1952 (1998). A state prison inmate who was denied admission to a prison boot camp program due to his history of hypertension sued corrections officials under the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA). The U.S. Supreme Court held that Title II of the ADA, prohibiting a "public entity" from discriminating against a "qualified individual with a disability" applied to inmates in state prisons. In a unanimous decision the Court stated that the text of ADA was not ambiguous and it unmistakably included state prisons and prisoners in its coverage. (Pennsylvania Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
CELL ASSIGNMENT
RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

Simpson v. Horn, 25 F.Supp.2d 563 (E.D.Pa. 1998). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against a corrections commissioner and officials, alleging that conditions of confinement at an overcrowded facility violated his Eighth Amendment rights, and that a classification system for double-cell assignment violated the equal protection clause. The district court found that the alleged deficiencies in the facility were not cruel and unusual punishment, but that fact issues precluded summary judgment on the equal protection claim. The court questioned the officials' intent to cause racial segregation via double-celling, and ruled they were not entitled to qualified immunity with respect to that claim. The court noted that prison officials have the right, acting in good faith and in particularized circumstances, to take into account racial tensions in maintaining security, discipline, and good order in prisons and jails. The court found that housing two inmates in a cell designed for one inmate does not, per se, violate the Eighth Amendment proscription against cruel and unusual punishment, but it may if it results in deprivations of essential food, medical care, sanitation or other conditions intolerable for human confinements. The inmate had alleged that as the result of overcrowding, inmates were not provided with adequate furniture, cleaning supplies, laundry service, ventilation, bedding, clothing, seating, recreational equipment, or telephones. He also alleged that food was served cold 85% of the time and that the dining hall was not kept clean or free of vermin. (State Correctional Institution at Graterford, Pennsylvania)

U.S. Appeals Court
PRETRIAL DETAIN.
FAILURE TO PROT.

Turquitt v. Jefferson County, Ala., 137 F.3d 1285 (11th Cir. 1998). The estate of a pretrial detainee who was killed during an altercation with another inmate at a county jail filed a civil rights action against the county. The district court denied the county's motion to dismiss and the county appealed. The appeals court vacated and remanded, finding that an Alabama county cannot be liable in a civil rights case for harms that befall jail inmates due to improper operation of the jail or negligent supervision of its inmates because the county has no responsibility in that area. According to the court, the sheriff, not the county, is responsible for jail conditions under Alabama law; counties have no duties with respect to daily operation of county jails and have no authority to dictate how jails are run. The deceased inmate was fatally injured in a fight with another inmate, who was a convicted felon, in the dayroom of the jail. (Jefferson County Jail, Alabama)

U.S. District Court
CUSTODY LEVEL

U.S. v. Harmon, 999 F.Supp. 467 (W.D.N.Y. 1998). An offender brought a habeas corpus petition following his conviction. The district court denied the petition and held that it would not direct the federal Bureau of Prisons to lower the offender's custody classification level. The court found that there was no allegation that his custody classification was unlawful and there was no evidence that the defendant had sought prior administrative relief. (Federal Bureau of Prisons)

1999

U.S. District Court
ADA-Americans with Disabilities Act
HANDICAP

Beckford v. Irvin, 49 F.Supp.2d 170 (W.D.N.Y. 1999). Defendants moved to set aside a jury verdict and dismiss an inmate's case against them. The district court denied the motions, finding that the award of compensatory and punitive damages was not excessive. The inmate had been confined to a wheelchair since 1984. In 1994 he was transferred from a psychiatric center to another correctional facility where he was assigned to a Mental Health Observation Unit (MHU). The court noted that the inmate was "...not placed in MHU for mental health treatment. He was placed in MHU because the cell was bigger and because his wheelchair fit in the cell." But shortly after his transfer officials took away his wheelchair and denied him access to it for the majority of his time at the facility. The inmate repeatedly requested permission to use his wheelchair and his requests were denied. The jury concluded that the inmate's rights had been violated because he was unable to participate in outdoor exercise or to take a shower because he was not allowed to use his wheelchair. The jury awarded $125,000 in compensatory damages for violations of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) and punitive damages totaling $25,000 against two supervisory officials for being deliberately indifferent to the inmate's serious medical needs. The court noted that the fact that the jury did not assess liability on the part of lower ranking prison officials did not preclude the jury from assessing liability on the supervisory officials. (Wende Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
SEX OFFENDERS

Cooper v. Garcia, 55 F.Supp.2d 1090 (S.D.Cal. 1999). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against prison officials following the denial of family visitation privileges. The district court dismissed the action, finding that the inmate did not have a liberty interest in a state family visitation program, and the classification of the inmate as a "sex offender" did not violate his right to procedural due process. According to the court, state regulations stated that family visitation was a privilege, not a right. The court noted that the classification of the inmate as a "sex offender" without an individualized assessment of security risks did not violate the inmate's due process rights, even though the inmate was not convicted of a sex offense and the inmate was denied family visitation as a result of the classification, because the classification did not result in any mandatory, coercive treatment. (Centinela State Prison, California)

U.S. District Court
PROTECTIVE CUST.
SEPARATION

Giroux v. Somerset County, 178 F.3d 28 (1st Cir. 1999). A jail inmate who had been assaulted by another inmate sued a jail employee, sheriff and county alleging violations of § 1983. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants and the inmate appealed. The appeals court vacated and remanded, finding that summary judgment was precluded by a factual dispute about the scope of the jail shift supervisor's responsibility and whether he abdicated his responsibility. The inmate was threatened by a cellmate when he left his cell to meet with a detective. After the meeting the inmate was moved to a different cell, apparently in response to the threat. The inmate was threatened again the next day when he was escorted past his former cell, and was allegedly threatened by other inmates while dining. The inmate requested protective custody. Although he was not moved, he was placed on "cell feed" status which eliminated his contact with other inmates in the common dining area. Several days later the inmate was involved with a visit which required him to use a common visiting area. While in the visiting area he was assaulted by his former cellmate who was also involved with a visit. The inmate suffered a broken nose, torn shoulder ligaments and a head laceration which required stitches. (Somerset County Jail, Maine)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEX OFFENDERS

Glauner v. Miller, 184 F.3d 1053 (9th Cir. 1999). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action challenging the constitutionality of a Nevada statute that requires a panel to certify that certain sexual offenders are not a menace to the health, safety or morals of others, prior to parole eligibility. The district court dismissed the action and the appeals court affirmed, finding that the statute did not violate the prisoner's right to equal protection and the statute was not void for vagueness. The court noted that heightened recidivism concerns for sexual offenders provided a rational basis for requiring more scrutiny in parole matters than other classes of criminals. (Nevada)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEX OFFENDER

Kirby v. Siegelman, 195 F.3d 1285 (11th Cir. 1999). In separate cases, state prisoners challenged the application of a sex offender community notification statute to them in § 1983 actions. The cases were dismissed by the district court and were consolidated on appeal. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part and remanded in part. The appeals court held that one prisoner, who had not been convicted of a sex crime, was entitled to due process before being classified as a sex offender because of the stigmatizing effect of being classified as a sex offender. The prisoner was classified based on prior sex-related charges rather than a conviction. (Alabama's Community Notification Statute)

U.S. District Court
RACIAL DISCRIMIN.

Mason v. Schriro, 45 F.Supp.2d 709 (W.D.Mo. 1999). A prisoner sued prison authorities claiming that the practice of considering race in making temporary housing assignments violated his equal protection rights. The district court found that several state prison officials, including the Director of the state Department of Corrections, were subject to suit. The court ruled that the prisoner did not have to allege intentional discrimination. The court found that the prison did not show disciplinary or security justifications for the policy. According to the court, the policy was based on the "bare conclusion" that persons of the same race were more apt to be collegial, which was unsupported by any history of racial trouble. (Fulton Recept./Diagnostic Ctr, Missouri)

U.S. Appeals Court
PRETRIAL DETAIN.
EQUAL PROTECTION TRUSTY

MacFarlane v. Walter, 179 F.3d 1131 (9th Cir. 1999). After their state habeas petitions were denied, state prisoners petitioned for federal habeas corpus relief, challenging two counties' "good conduct" and "good performance" policies as they were applied to them. The district court granted summary judgment for the respondent corrections officials, but the appeals court reversed and remanded. The appeals court held that there was an equal protection violation in the counties' allowance of lesser good time credits for defendants who were detained pretrial in county jails because of their financial inability to post bail, than that allowed for defendants who were able to wait to serve their sentences until after sentencing to a state correctional facility. The counties' early release policies limited presentence detainees to a maximum good-conduct credit of 15% of the sentence imposed; the court noted that persons who had posted bail and served their entire sentence at a state correctional facility could end up serving 23 days less on a five- to six-year sentence. The court upheld the policies under which pretrial detainees were not eligible for participation in work and other programs through which they could earn good-performance credit, finding the counties had established a strong rational connection between the legislative means and purpose of protecting community safety. (Pierce and Clark County Jails, Washington)

U.S. District Court
AIDS

Onishea v. Hopper, 171 F.3d 1289 (11th Cir. 1999). State inmates who tested positive for the human immunodeficiency virus (HIV) brought a class action suit against prison officials challenging segregation of prison recreational, religious and educational programs based on inmates' HIV-positive status. The inmates alleged that the practices were unconstitutional and violated the Rehabilitation Act. At the male prison at which HIV-positive male inmates were housed they were excluded from participation in various prison jobs, vocational classes, inmate barber jobs, laundry jobs, gardening, and other activities and programs. The district court denied relief after a bench trial and the inmates appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part and vacated and remanded in part. On remand the district court again denied relief and the inmates again appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that a "significant risk" of HIV transmission existed for any prison program in which HIV-positive inmates sought participation. The appeals court affirmed the district court's finding that integrated programs would risk violence and that segregation of HIV-positive inmates was not an exaggerated response. The court also affirmed the finding that hiring additional guards to accommodate integration of programs was too costly and imposed an undue burden on the prison system. The court noted that the Rehabilitation Act did not require a state corrections department to do whatever it was legally capable of doing to accommodate HIV-positive inmates. (Limestone Correctional Facility and Julia Tutwiler Prison for Women, Alabama Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
CUSTODY LEVEL
TRANSFER

Posey v. Dewalt, 86 F.Supp.2d 565 (E.D.Va. 1999). A federal inmate filed a petition for a writ of habeas corpus challenging a decision by the federal Bureau of Prisons to deny him minimum custody status on the basis of a state detainer that had been filed against him. The district court dismissed the petition, finding that consideration of the state detainer as part of the inmate's classification did not implicate a liberty interest under the due process clause because the inmate had no protected liberty interest in a particular classification or in being assigned to a particular institution. (Federal Correctional Institution at Petersburg, Virginia)

- U.S. District Court
AIDS
- Roop v. Squadrito, 70 F.Supp.2d 868 (N.D.Ind. 1999). An inmate who was HIV-positive and incarcerated in a county jail on an outstanding arrest warrant brought a § 1983 claim and a claim under the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) against county officials. The district court denied summary judgment for the defendants. The court held that evidence raised an issue of material fact as to whether the inmate's medical condition required that he be treated differently from other inmates in the jail, in violation of ADA. The inmate had informed jailers that he was HIV-positive upon his arrival at the jail and he was given an initial medical assessment. According to the inmate, he was told that because of "your medical condition, and you having AIDS, you're going to be locked down." He was initially housed by himself in an old shower room, which had a working shower but no flushable toilet. After five days he was moved to a solitary cell located close to the jail's command module, where there was no toilet or shower in the cell. (Allen County Jail, Indiana)
- 2000
- U.S. Appeals Court
CUSTODY LEVEL
DUE PROCESS
REVIEW
LIBERTY INTEREST
- Abed v. Armstrong, 209 F.3d 63 (2nd Cir. 2000). A state prisoner petitioned for habeas corpus relief and the district court granted summary judgment against the prisoner. The appeals court affirmed, finding that a state prison administrative directive making inmates classified as safety threats ineligible to earn good time credit did not violate the Ex Post Facto Clause. The court noted that the prisoner had no protected liberty interest in the opportunity to earn good time credit. According to the appeals court, the inmate received all process he was due before being classified as a safety threat because a hearing was held before the inmate was classified, his status was reviewed every six months, and he had the right to request reconsideration of his status at any time in writing. (Connecticut Department of Corrections)
- U.S. District Court
PRETRIAL DETENTION
FAILURE TO PROTECT
- Burciaga v. County of Lenawee, 123 F.Supp.2d 1076 (E.D.Mich. 2000). A pretrial detainee brought a civil rights action against county officials, alleging harm as the result of housing him with an assaultive prisoner. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants. The court held that the county did not violate the detainee's due process rights by housing him with another detainee or by improperly classifying both inmates as medium-security inmates. Both inmates had been previously incarcerated for assault. (Lenawee County Jail, Michigan)
- U.S. Appeals Court
SEX OFFENDERS
DUE PROCESS
- Chambers v. Colorado Dept. of Corrections, 205 F.3d 1237 (10th Cir. 2000). An inmate challenged his classification as a sex offender by a state corrections department and the district court granted summary judgment to the department. The appeals court affirmed in part and reversed in part. The appeals court held that the requirement that the offender participate in a sex offender treatment program was not an ex post facto violation, but that the inmate had a procedural due process right to a hearing before being classified as a sex offender. According to the court, the inmate had a protected liberty interest in not being labeled as a sex offender. (Colorado Department of Corrections, Sex Offender Treatment Program)
- U.S. Appeals Court
SEPARATION
- Curry v. Crist, 226 F.3d 974 (8th Cir. 2000). Heirs of an inmate who was murdered by fellow prisoners while the two were alone in an unsupervised area of a prison brought a civil rights action against the prison warden. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the warden and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the warden was not deliberately indifferent to the risks of allowing the inmate to work with the other prisoner in an unsupervised area of the prison. The court noted that the prisoner who made the fatal attack had been convicted of multiple murders and had made threats, 16 months earlier, to murder his fellow inmates. According to the court, there was no evidence that the murderer harbored any animosity toward the murdered inmate or that his selection of him as his victim was anything but fortuitous. The court noted that prison officials are not required to segregate indefinitely all inmates whose original crimes suggest that they might be capable of further violence. (Stillwater Correctional Facility, Minnesota)
- U.S. District Court
AIDS
- Hallett v. New York State Dept. of Correct. Serv., 109 F.Supp.2d 190 (S.D.N.Y. 2000). A former inmate brought an action against state correctional officials alleging he was denied access to special programs while incarcerated due to his status as an HIV-positive amputee, in violation of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), the Rehabilitation Act and state laws. The district court dismissed the case in part. The court found that the Eleventh Amendment did not provide immunity for officials for alleged violations of ADA and the Rehabilitation Act. The court found that the inmate's allegations that he was denied entrance into a shock incarceration program and work release programs due to his disability supported claims for alleged violations of ADA and the Rehabilitation Act. The court held that the former inmate stated a § 1983 claim by alleging that officials failed to provide him with an adequate wheelchair for five months, despite receiving notification that the inmate was in pain and the inmate's grievances concerning confiscation of his personal wheelchair, along with allegations that the inmate suffered severe back pain and a cut to his ear as the result of the officials actions. The inmate successfully alleged the personal involvement of a prison superintendent and director. (Elmira Correctional Facility and Green Haven Correctional Center, New York)
- U.S. Appeals Court
PRETRIAL DETENTION
SEPARATION
- Janes v. Hernandez, 215 F.3d 541 (5th Cir. 2000). A traffic offender sued a county to recover for alleged violation of his civil rights based upon a sheriff's policy of confining all manner of arrestees, including those with prior felony records, in one large cell. The district court entered judgment in favor of the offender and awarded attorney fees. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the sheriff, as the county policymaker, did not have to know that specific felons and other inmates with whom the traffic offender was confined posed a risk of harm to him, in order to be liable for violation of the offender's civil rights. The appeals court found that the section of the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) that limited attorney fees that may be awarded in suits by inmates did not reply to the offender, who was not a prisoner when his complaint was filed. (Bastrop County Jail, Texas)

U.S. Appeals Court
RACIAL DISCRIMI-NATION

Johnson v. State of Cal., 207 F.3d 650 (9th Cir. 2000). A state inmate brought a pro se action for damages and declaratory relief alleging violation of his rights because officials segregated inmates by race and extorted money from inmates by overcharging for telephone use. The district court dismissed the action and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part and reversed in part. The appeals court held that the inmate's allegations supported his claim for racial discrimination in inmate housing decisions and that officials were aware of the deleterious effects of the practice and the practice persisted despite a court order to house inmates in a race-neutral manner. The appeals court affirmed the dismissal of the telephone charges allegation, holding that there was no authority for the proposition that inmates were entitled to a specific rate for telephone calls and that the facts alleged did not support the conclusion that the rate charged was so exorbitant as to deprive inmates of telephone access all together. (California Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
SEX OFFENDERS

Martinez Diaz v. Olsen, 110 F.Supp.2d 295 (D.N.J. 2000). An offender petitioned for habeas corpus relief challenging the constitutionality of sex offender registration and notification requirements. The district court denied the petition, finding that the offender who was convicted of rape was properly classified as a sex offender for the purposes of a federal statute and the Bureau of Prisons program statement that imposed registration and notification requirements on sex offenders. (Federal Correctional Institute, Fairton, New Jersey)

U.S. District Court
PROTECTIVE CUSTODY
SEPARATION

Miller v. Shelby County, 93 F.Supp.2d 892 (W.D.Tenn. 2000). A county jail inmate brought a § 1983 action against a county alleging injuries suffered in an attack by fellow inmates were the result of the jail's practice of permitting inmates of different security levels to take recreation together. The district court entered judgment for the plaintiff, finding that the jail's recreation policy posed a substantial risk of harm and that jail officials showed deliberate indifference to the risk posed by the policy. The court noted that whether the policy was official or not, it was pervasive enough to be considered a de facto policy. The jail policy allowed inmates of different security levels to take recreation together, including gang members who were allowed to mix with protective-custody inmates. The inmate had been attacked by gang members and the court found that jail officials had both general and specific knowledge of threats against the inmate by gang members yet took no affirmative steps to protect the inmate, including the "readily available step of ending [the] mixed-recreation practice." The inmate suffered permanent impairment to his shoulder. The district court awarded $40,000 to the inmate. (Shelby County Corr. Center, Tenn.)

U.S. District Court
AIDS
SEPARATION

Oladipupo v. Austin, 104 F.Supp.2d 626 (W.D.La. 2000). A detainee of the Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS) who was awaiting removal from the United States brought a § 1983 action against parish jail officials challenging the constitutionality of his conditions of confinement. The district court held that the failure of jail officials to segregate pretrial detainees who were HIV positive did not violate the due process rights of non-infected detainees. (Avoyelles Parish Jail, La.)

U.S. District Court
SEPARATION
PRETRIAL
DETAINEES

Oladipupo v. Austin, 104 F.Supp.2d 643 (W.D.La. 2000). A detainee of the Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS) who was awaiting removal from the United States brought a § 1983 action against parish jail officials challenging the constitutionality of his conditions of confinement. The district court found that the fact that INS detainees held at the parish jail had fewer privileges than INS detainees held at a federal detention center did not violate the Equal Protection Clause. The court also found that housing INS detainees with convicted prisoners did not violate the Due Process Clause. The court denied summary judgment for the officials on the allegation that the housing unit at the jail had serious sewage problems that created unsanitary conditions. The court also denied summary judgment to the officials on the allegation that the jail had an inadequate number of emergency exits. (Avoyelles Parish Jail, Louisiana)

U.S. District Court
CUSTODY LEVEL
DUE PROCESS

Rivera Borrero v. Rivera Correa, 93 F.Supp.2d 122 (D.Puerto Rico 2000). An inmate brought a pro se § 1983 action against Puerto Rico corrections officials alleging that he had been unjustifiably kept in maximum security custody for more than three years before being reclassified to medium security. The inmate also sought to compel his reclassification to minimum security custodial status. The district court dismissed the case, finding that the inmate's three years in maximum security custody status was not arbitrary because the inmate had been charged with escape. Commenting on the case, Judge Casellas opened by stating "This case is a good example of the thicket of claims and arguments that can flourish from a pro se prisoner's understandable effort to save his complaint from doom." (Servicios Correccionales de

U.S. District Court
RACIAL DIS-CRIMINATION

Simpson v. Horn, 80 F.Supp.2d 477 (E.D.Pa. 2000). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against state corrections officials challenging conditions of confinement at a crowded prison. The district court denied summary judgment for the officials on the inmate's claim that the practice of assigning inmates to cells based on their race violated his equal protection rights. The district court found that summary judgment was precluded by material issues of fact as to whether race was only one factor in determining dual cell assignments and whether the officials intended to discriminate by segregating cells by race. (SCI-Graterford, Pennsylvania)

U.S. Appeals Court
PROTECTIVE CUSTODY
SEPARATION

Weiss v. Cooley, 230 F.3d 1027 (7th Cir. 2000). A suspect in a highly publicized rape case, who had been assaulted by fellow inmates while detained in a county jail, brought a § 1983 action against the sheriff, jail commander and a jail officer. The district court dismissed the claims against the sheriff and jail commander and granted summary judgment for the officer. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The appeals court held that summary judgment for the officer was precluded by a fact issue as to whether the officer had actual knowledge that the suspect faced an objective risk of danger. Affirming the dismissal of the sheriff and jail commander from the action, the appeals court noted that allegations that circumstances were such that assaults on prisoners like the suspect were inevitable, and that the system used to classify inmates for housing safety purposes were inadequate, were insufficient to provide adequate notice to the sheriff and commander in order to sustain an Eighth Amendment claim against them. Upon admission to the jail, the suspect had been asked if he had any enemies in the jail, if he needed any special care, or if he had ever assaulted anyone or was contemplating assaulting anyone, and the suspect answered "no" to each of these questions. (Morgan County Jail, Indiana)

2001

U.S. District Court
AIDS

Canell v. Multnomah County, 141 F.Supp.2d 1046 (D.Or. 2001). An inmate brought a § 1983 action alleging that his conditions of confinement in a county jail violated his constitutional rights. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants. The district court held that the inmate did not suffer a constitutionally significant injury, sufficient to support a § 1983 action under the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA), as the result of jail officials' failure to shower and "debug" inmates or test them for communicable diseases before double bunking them and mixing them with the general population. The court found that the inmate's exposure to a cellmate suffering from acquired immune deficiency syndrome (AIDS) did not violate his rights, even though he was splashed in the eye with vomit from the cellmate, where the inmate had not since been tested as HIV positive. (Multnomah County Jails, Oregon)

U.S. Appeals Court
CLASSIFICATION
CRITERIA
SPECIAL NEEDS

Chisolm v. McManimon, 275 F.3d 315 (3rd Cir. 2001). A hearing-impaired detainee brought a suit against the warden of a pretrial detention facility and county court system, alleging violations of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), Rehabilitation Act, § 1983 and a state discrimination law, for failing to provide an interpreter and other services. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants and the detainee appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded, finding that the county court system was not entitled to Eleventh Amendment immunity during an ongoing merger with the state court system. When the detainee arrived at the detention facility on a Saturday, he was locked down in his cell to keep him apart from the general population until Monday when facility classification staff arrived. This practice was applied to all detainees admitted when classification staff members were not working at the facility. Such unclassified detainees consumed meals in their cells and did not have television or telephone privileges. When the detainee was not provided with an interpreter at intake he became upset and was eventually interviewed by a nurse, who concluded that he was a suicide risk. He was kept in solitary lockup from Saturday until Tuesday. On Monday he was taken to meet with a classification staff member, where he was interviewed and was given a medium security classification. But the staff member had described the detainee as a "vagrant" in spite of the fact that he had worked for the U. S. Postal Service for 13 years and had lived at the same address for three years. This error added two points to his classification score, moving him from "minimum" security to "medium." (Mercer County Detention Center, New Jersey)

U.S. District Court
CELL ASSIGNMENT

Dobbin v. Artuz, 143 F.Supp.2d 292 (S.D.N.Y. 2001). A state inmate brought a § 1983 action against prison officials and medical staff, arising from a fall down stairs at the prison. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants, finding they were not deliberately indifferent to the medical needs of the inmate. The inmate had requested to be moved to a cell on the ground floor on several occasions but he had failed to demonstrate any medical need for such a move. The court noted that the inmate regularly received sick calls and medication upon request, including consultations with outside specialists in connection with his back condition. (Green Haven Correctional Facility, New York)

- U.S. District Court
SEX OFFENDERS
DUE PROCESS
- Jones v. Puckett*, 160 F.Supp.2d 1016 (W.D.Wis. 2001). A prisoner brought a § 1983 action against two corrections officials for violation of his Fourteenth Amendment rights in labeling him as a sex offender without due process. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that the prisoner did not have a liberty interest in not being identified as a sex offender in prison records, noting that evaluation of the needs of prisoners was a normal prison procedure and such evaluations were not made a matter of public knowledge in such a way that would constitute a stigma. The court also found that the defendants were entitled to qualified immunity because, at the time of the prisoner's evaluation, no law held that an inmate had a Fourteenth Amendment liberty interest in not being so classified. (Oshkosh Correctional Institution, Wisconsin)
- U.S. District Court
CUSTODY LEVEL
DUE PROCESS
- Lile v. Simmons*, 143 F.Supp.2d 1267 (D.Kan. 2001). An inmate brought a § 1983 action, individually and on behalf of others who are similarly situated, against state corrections officials. The inmate alleged he was denied due process with respect to determining his custody classification. The court denied the inmate's motion to certify a class action and granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court found that the inmate had no protected liberty interest in a correct risk level classification, and that even if he had such an interest, his due process rights were not violated by his current "medium" classification. The court noted that a liberty interest in a particular custody classification may arise only if state law or prison regulations create such a right. (Lansing Correctional Facility, Kansas)
- U.S. Appeals Court
GANGS
- Mayoral v. Sheahan*, 245 F.3d 934 (7th Cir. 2001). A pretrial detainee who was severely injured in a gang-instigated jailhouse riot brought a civil rights suit against a county sheriff and jail officers, alleging they were deliberately indifferent to his safety. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants and the detainee appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part and remanded. The appeals court held that the failure of the jail to segregate inmates by gang affiliation was not a constitutional violation, given the high number of gang members housed in the jail and the burden that would be placed on administrators by such a policy. The court found that summary judgment was precluded by fact issues as to whether the detainee had asked an officer for protective custody and was ignored, and whether an officer delayed in summoning help when fighting broke out. (Cook County Jail, Illinois)
- U.S. District Court
PROTECTIVE CUSTODY
TRANSFER
- Miller v. McBride*, 259 F.Supp.2d 738 (N.D.Ind. 2001). A pro se state prisoner sued corrections officials under § 1983, challenging his transfer from protective custody following an altercation with a fellow inmate. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the officials, finding that the prisoner had no constitutional right to a hearing on his transfer from protective custody. (Pendleton Correctional Facility, Indiana)
- U.S. District Court
SMOKING
- Reilly v. Grayson*, 157 F.Supp.2d 762 (E.D.Mich. 2001). A prisoner brought a § 1983 action against a warden, deputy warden, and Michigan Department of Corrections physicians, alleging violation of his Eighth Amendment rights. After a bench trial, the district court ruled that the warden and deputy wardens were deliberately indifferent to the prisoner's serious medical need to be placed in a smoke-free environment, supporting the prisoner's cruel and unusual punishment claims. The court found that the wardens were reckless in their disregard of the prisoner's rights, and awarded the prisoner $18,250 in punitive damages and $36,500 in compensatory damages for the five years of inaction by the wardens. The prisoner had two Individual Management Plans (IMP) which required that he be placed in a smoke-free environment, but the non-smoking regulations in the prisoner's cell block were consistently violated and the wardens were aware of the violations. After receiving notice that the IMPs were not being followed, the wardens continued to do nothing to remedy the situation. The court concluded that the three wardens "...each clearly ignored his supervisory obligations and, as a consequence, should suffer the opprobrium of punitive damages, not so much to deter each of them in the future, but to deter other officials in like positions of ignoring their responsibility." (Trustee Division, State Prison of Southern Michigan)
- U.S. Appeals Court
SEPARATION
- Wilson v. Jones*, 251 F.3d 1340 (11th Cir. 2001). A female arrestee brought a civil rights action against a county sheriff challenging her strip search following her arrest for driving under the influence. The district court denied the sheriff's motion to dismiss. The appeals court reversed. The appeals court held that the strip search violated the arrestee's Fourth Amendment privacy rights, but that the sheriff was entitled to qualified immunity because the unconstitutionality of the county's blanket strip search policy was not clearly established at the time of the search. The arrestee had been strip searched by a female corrections officer before being placed in a cell with the general female population because the county did not have separate facilities to temporarily hold female detainees. (Shelby County Jail, Alabama)

U.S. District Court
DUE PROCESS
RECLASSIFICATION
CUSTODY LEVEL
DUE PROCESS

Austin v. Wilkinson, 189 F.Supp.2d 719 (N.D. Ohio 2002). A class of current and former prisoners at a high maximum security prison brought a § 1983 action seeking injunctive relief, alleging denial of due process in their placement and retention at the facility. The district court held that: (1) the inmates had a liberty interest in their conditions of confinement; (2) the inmates were entitled to due process protection in decisions to send them and retain them at the facility; (3) the inmates were denied due process in the decisions to send them to, and retain them at, the facility; and (4) new corrections policies failed to provide adequate due process safeguards. The court held that the combination of conditions faced by inmates at the high maximum security prison imposed an atypical and significant hardship, giving the inmates a liberty interest protected by due process. The court noted that inmates in the prison were subjected to lengthy stays of indefinite duration, had extremely limited contact with other individuals, were never allowed outdoor recreation, were subject to extremely intrusive restrictions when they were allowed out of their cells, and were denied parole eligibility.

The court held that inmates sent to the prison were entitled to minimal due process consisting of: (1) twenty-four hour advance notice of all specific evidence relied upon to support reasons for reclassification; (2) a requirement that an inmate be allowed to appear at his reclassification hearing and present evidence, including witnesses and documents; and (3) a requirement that the reclassification committee issue a written statement specifically describing evidence relied on and reasons for its recommendation. "Having found that the defendants violated, and will continue to violate, the plaintiffs' constitutionally liberty interest," the court ordered the parties to file proposed injunctive orders to correct the violations. (Ohio State Penitentiary)

U.S. Appeals Court
PRETRIAL DETAINEE
SEPARATION

Burrell v. Hampshire County, 307 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2002). A pretrial detainee who was severely beaten by a fellow detainee brought a § 1983 action against a county and county officials, alleging deliberate indifference to his health and safety in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. The detainee also alleged an Eighth Amendment violation resulting from failure to segregate violent and nonviolent detainees. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants and the appeals court affirmed. The detainee had told one jail official that he was threatened by a fellow detainee who had a history of assaults, but the officials failed to separate them. The court noted that the plaintiff told one official he had a black belt in martial arts and was a decorated war hero and never requested protective custody. The court found that the county's policy of not screening or segregating potentially violent inmates from non-violent ones did not constitute deliberate indifference to the health and safety of detainees, because inmates were housed in single cells and were able to lock their cells from the inside at any time. (Hampshire County Jail/House of Corrections, Massachusetts)

U.S. Appeals Court
CELL ASSIGNMENT
SEPARATION

Estate of Ford v. Ramirez-Palmer, 301 F.3d 1043 (9th Cir. 2002). The family and estate of a state prison inmate who was killed by his cellmate brought a § 1983 action against an associate warden and correctional officers. The district court denied summary judgment for the defendants and they appealed. The appeals court reversed, finding that the defendants were entitled to qualified immunity. The court noted that the correctional officers violated the Eighth Amendment to the extent that the officers knew that the inmate was acting out dangerously with his cellmates, or that he was a threat to another inmate. The cellmate had been under observation for two weeks after an incident with a different cellmate, had been returned on medications and was not found to be in need of single-celling. (California Medical Facility-Vacaville)

U.S. Appeals Court
CUSTODY LEVEL

Fraise v. Terhune, 283 F.3d 506 (3rd Cir. 2002). State inmates brought a § 1983 action against corrections officials challenging their classification and treatment as members of a "Security Threat Group" (STG). The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the officials and the inmates appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the STG policy did not violate the inmates' free exercise or equal protection rights, and that the transfer of the inmates to a STG management unit did not deprive them of a protected liberty interest. According to the court, the inmates' free exercise rights were not violated by the STG policies and practices because the officials had a legitimate and neutral objective in maintaining order and security in the prison system, and the officials had adequate grounds to conclude that the inmates were "core members" of an STG. The court noted that the inmates had alternative means available to practice their religion, which they call the Five Percent Nation. The inmates were recognized leaders of the Five Percent Nation and had taken documented roles in the group's activities. The appeals court found no violation of the inmates' equal protection rights because the inmate group had demonstrated a greater propensity for violence, and religion did not play any role in the decision to treat the group as an STG. The inmates were not deprived of a protected liberty interest by their transfer to the STG Management Unit because they were not subjected to a longer period of confinement and the transfer did not impose any atypical or significant hardships on them. (N.J. Dept. of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
DUE PROCESS
CUSTODY LEVEL

Kitchen v. Upshaw, 286 F.3d 179 (4th Cir. 2002). A former jail inmate brought a § 1983 action against a regional jail authority and jail officials, alleging violation of his due process rights when he was not allowed to participate in a work release program. The district court granted summary judgment to the defendants and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the authority was not an arm of the state and was therefore not protected by Eleventh Amendment immunity. But the court held that the inmate did not have a liberty interest under state law in participating in a work release program that was protected by the due process clause. (Riverside Regional Jail, Virginia)

U.S. Appeals Court
PRIVILEGES

Love v. McKune, 33 Fed.Appx. 369 (10th Cir. 2002). Four prison inmates brought a civil rights action challenging their forced participation in a prison incentive level system that tied inmate privileges to participation in programs and good behavior. The district court dismissed the action and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that forced participation did not violate the inmates' Fourteenth Amendment due process rights. The Internal Management Policy and Procedure (IMPP) system assigned inmates to one of four levels. Each level had a corresponding level of privileges, such as television ownership, handicrafts, participation in organizations, use of outside funds, canteen expenditures, incentive pay, and visitation. The system had been previously upheld by the state supreme court, which found that none of the restrictions denied to inmates on lower levels infringed on inmates' property or liberty interests and therefore did not implicate due process protection. (Lansing Correctional Facility, Kansas)

U.S. District Court
SEX OFFENDERS

Montalvo v. Snyder, 207 F.Supp.2d 581 (E.D.Ky. 2002). A prisoner sued the federal Bureau of Prisons claiming that he was wrongfully classified as a sexual offender and subjected to a statutory requirement that authorities be notified prior to his release. The district court entered judgment for the Bureau, finding that it was appropriate to classify the prisoner based on his state conviction for criminal sexual abuse. The court also held that the statute requiring the Bureau to notify authorities when a sex offender was about to be released did not violate the Double Jeopardy Clause, because Congress intended the statute to be remedial by serving law enforcement and protecting the public, rather than punitive. (Federal Correctional Institution, Manchester, Kentucky)

U.S. District Court
SEX OFFENDERS

Munoz v. Kolender, 208 F.Supp.2d 1125 (S.D.Cal. 2002). A civil detainee who was confined in a county jail under the provisions of California's Sexually Violent Predator Act brought a § 1983 action against a county sheriff, challenging his confinement and the conditions of his confinement. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the sheriff. The court held that the Act had a dual purpose, to remove dangerous sexually violent predators from society and to provide them with treatment, and that confinement pursuant to the Act was civil in nature, rather than criminal and punitive. (San Diego County Jail, California)

U.S. District Court
CELL ASSIGNMENT

Smith v. Muccino, 223 F.Supp.2d 396 (D.Conn. 2002). A state prisoner brought a pro se action alleging that the practice of housing him with violent inmates, sometimes in retaliation for his complaints, violated his constitutional rights. After an agreement to settle the case fell through, the court reopened the case and held that the prisoner's allegations stated a claim for an Eighth Amendment violation. The court noted that the prisoner was not claiming that double-celling was per se unlawful. The prisoner, who is Caucasian and who believes he is perceived to be gay, alleged that he was repeatedly housed with racist and homophobic inmates, and that his requests for a cell change were ignored. (Osborn Correctional Institution, Connecticut)

U.S. Appeals Court
HOMOSEXUALS EQUAL PROTECTION

Veney v. Wyche, 293 F.3d 726 (4th Cir. 2002). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against prison officials, alleging they treated him differently from other inmates because of his gender and sexual preference, in violation of his right to equal protection. The district court dismissed the claim and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the prison practice of segregating homosexual male inmates was based on legitimate penological interests, and that the gender-related disparate treatment in the housing of homosexuals was rationally calibrated to address legitimate concerns. According to the court, institutions for females are much less violent than those for males, and male inmates were more likely than females to have homophobic attitudes. The court noted that prison officials had an absence of ready alternatives available. (Riverside Regional Jail, Virginia)

U.S. Appeals Court
CELL ASSIGNMENT
GANGS

Washington v. LaPorte County Sheriff's Dept., 306 F.3d 515 (7th Cir. 2002). A pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 due process claim against a jail and its officers, alleging that injuries he suffered when he was attacked by another inmate were caused by the jail's cell assignment policy. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants and the detainee appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the jail's cell assignment policy did not demonstrate deliberate indifference on the part of officials to a substantial risk of serious harm to the detainee. The policy allowed inmates to choose their own cell assignments. The detainee was charged with driving with a suspended license and he was detained at the jail pending trial, as he was unable to post bond. He was assigned to a cell block originally designed to hold ten inmates, but which actually housed seventeen. The detainee was allowed to choose his own cell assignment within the housing unit. The court noted that the detainee shared a cell with the inmate who eventually assaulted him for two weeks without incident prior to the attack, and did not inform jail officers he had fought with the inmate or that he feared harm. (LaPointe County Jail, Indiana)

U.S. District Court
SEX OFFENDER
CIVIL COMMIT-MENT

West v. Macht, 235 F.Supp.2d 966 (E.D.Wis. 2002). Civilly-committed sex offenders brought a § 1983 action against employees of a state treatment facility. The district court held that security-related seclusion placements did not violate the offenders' substantive due process rights because they were rationally related to the purpose of maintaining institutional security and could not reasonably be characterized as punitive. But the court found that fact issues existed as to whether treatment-related placements were based on staff psychologists' reasonable professional judgment, because expert testimony asserted that the placements were not consistent with accepted professional norms. (Wisconsin Resource Center, Wisconsin Department of Health and Family Services)

2003

U.S. District Court
CUSTODY LEVEL
TRANSFER

Adler v. Menifee, 293 F.Supp.2d 363 (S.D.N.Y. 2003). A federal prisoner sought an order compelling the federal Bureau of Prisons to disregard the statutory requirement that limits the period of time an inmate may spend in a community confinement center to 10% of his total sentence. The district court held that the Bureau's application of the statute did not implicate the Administrative Procedures Act and did not violate the ex post facto clause. (U.S. District Court, Southern District New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEPARATION

Cardenas v. Lewis, 66 Fed.Appx. 86 (9th Cir. 2003). [unpublished] A pretrial detainee brought a pro se § 1983 action against a county, alleging deliberate indifference to a substantial risk to his safety. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants and the detainee appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part and reversed and remanded in part. The appeals court held that officers who placed the detainee in a holding tank with an inmate, from whom the detainee was supposed to be kept separated, were not acting with deliberate indifference, even if the officers were negligent in failing to check the detainee's "keep separate" wristband. The court found that the detainee was deprived of due process in disciplinary proceedings in which he was allegedly not allowed to call witnesses, to have his exculpatory statement read, or to tape the hearings, and was placed in segregation without a hearing. (Yakima County Department of Corrections, Washington)

U.S. Appeals Court
LOWER BUNK

Hoover v. Keating, 59 Fed.Appx. 288 (10th Cir. 2003) [unpublished]. A state inmate filed a § 1983 action alleging that his disciplinary citations should have been reversed for his refusal to comply with housing assignments, in violation of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) and the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments. The district court entered summary judgment in favor of the officials and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the officials did not violate ADA by disciplining the inmate for refusing to obey housing orders. The court held that assigning the inmate randomly, rather than using restrictive housing, did not deprive the inmate of due process. The inmate had a medical condition that required him to be assigned to a lower bunk only, but the court found that the inmate's refusal was based on the race of his newly-assigned cell mate, rather than on his alleged disability. (Dick Conner Correction Center, Oklahoma)

U.S. Appeals Court
CELL ASSIGNMENT
RACIAL DISCRIMI-NATION
DOUBLE CELLING

Johnson v. State of California, 321 F.3d 791 (9th Cir. 2003). An African-American state prison inmate brought an action against prison administrators, alleging that a prison policy of using race as a factor in assigning a new inmate's initial cell mate violated the equal protection clause. The district court dismissed the case, but the appeals court reversed in part and remanded. On remand, the district court granted summary judgment for the prison administrators on qualified immunity grounds. The inmate appealed and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the policy did not violate the equal protection clause, given high racial tensions and violence existing at the prison. The court found the policy to be rationally related to a legitimate penological interest in protecting the safety of inmates, and found the policy to be neutral in that it did not provide an advantage or disadvantage to any race. The court noted that the policy was limited to the first 60 days after admission to a prison and that the remaining time in prison was integrated. Administrators had told the court that ignoring race in initial cell assignments would increase violence in those cells and would have a ripple effect on inmates and staff. The officials told the court that the suggested alternatives to the policy-- asking inmates about their gang affiliation or racial biases-- were not reasonable. (California Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
SEPARATION
GANGS

Mooring v. San Francisco Sheriff's Dept., 289 F.Supp.2d 1110 (N.D.Cal. 2003). A county jail inmate brought a pro se § 1983 action alleging deliberate indifference to his safety when he was housed unwillingly with gang rivals who assaulted him. The court granted summary judgment for the defendants. The court held that a deputy sheriff did not violate the inmate's due process right to protection from violence, absent any evidence that the deputy knew the inmate's particular gang affiliation or that the deputy could have learned the inmate's gang affiliation from information on the inmate's housing records. (San Francisco County Jail, California)

U.S. District Court
DUE PROCESS
CUSTODY LEVEL

Torres v. Stewart, 263 F.Supp.2d 463 (D.Conn. 2003). A state inmate sued prison officials, alleging that as a pretrial detainee he was designated as a security risk without a hearing, and confined in segregation in violation of his due process rights. The inmate sought damages and the restoration of forfeited good time credits. The district court entered summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that the inmate's request for restoration of good time credits was not cognizable under § 1983, and that as a pretrial detainee, he had not protected liberty interest in his classification. The court noted that the classification was not punishment proscribed by due process principles. The detainee had received a notice of his hearing two days prior to its scheduled date, declined to present witnesses, declined the assistance of an advocate, admitted to being a soldier for a gang, was identified as a regional commander in the gang, and had been arrested for the murder of a rival gang member. (Northern Correctional Institution, Connecticut)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEX OFFENDERS

West v. Schwebke, 333 F.3d 745 (7th Cir. 2003). Civilly committed sex offenders brought a § 1983 action against employees of a state treatment facility, alleging that therapeutic seclusion as practiced at the facility violated their due process rights. The district court denied summary judgment for some of the employees and they appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the offenders were entitled, as a matter of due process, to the exercise of professional judgment as to the needs of residents and that due process requires that the conditions and duration of involuntary civil confinement bear some reasonable relation to the purpose for which the persons are committed. The court found that summary judgment was precluded by fact issues as to whether employees' use of seclusion against the offenders, for at least 20 days and as much as 82 consecutive days in one case, could be justified on either security or treatment grounds. The court noted that civil detention institutions may employ both incapacitation and deterrence to reduce violence within their walls, but if mental limitations render a detainee insensible to punishment, the only appropriate goal would be incapacitation. (Wisconsin Resource Center, Sand Ridge Secure Treatment Center)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEX OFFENDERS

Williams v. Meyer, 346 F.3d 607 (6th Cir. 2003). A state prisoner who was committed under Michigan's Criminal Sexual Psychopath Act sought habeas relief. The district court denied the petition and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court reversed, vacated and remanded. The appeals court held that the prisoner's claim that it was more difficult to obtain release under the Act than under Michigan's Mental Health Code could warrant habeas relief, if the state's reasons for such differences were not compelling. The prisoner alleged that the Act's discharge provision did not necessarily require proof of likelihood of a prisoner's future dangerousness for continued commitment, in violation of due process. (Michigan)

2004

U.S. District Court
SEPARATION
TRANSFER

Ashford v. District of Columbia, 306 F.Supp.2d 8 (D.D.C. 2004). A prisoner brought a civil rights action against the District of Columbia and its employees, alleging they were liable to him for injuries resulting from an attack by other inmates. The district court held that the prisoner stated a sufficient causal connection between his injuries and the District's alleged policy or custom of transferring inmates without informing the receiving institutions about active separation orders. The court also found that the prisoner stated a claim under § 1983 against the District's Interstate Compacts administrator. The court noted that the prisoner told prison officials at the receiving facility about the separation orders, but that an official separation order would have received more consideration and attention. (Pleasant Valley State Prison, California)

U.S. Appeals Court
CUSTODY LEVEL
DUE PROCESS

Austin v. Wilkinson, 372 F.3d 346 (6th Cir. 2004). State inmates housed at a supermaximum security prison facility brought a class action against corrections officials under § 1983, alleging violations of their procedural due process rights. The district court ruled that officials had violated the inmates' due process right and granted injunctive relief. The court ordered the adoption of a revised version of placement regulations and the officials appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part and remanded. The appeals court held that state inmates enjoyed a due process protected liberty interest in not being placed at a supermaximum facility, but that the district court did not have the power to order state officials to modify their predicates. The appeals court upheld the procedural modifications made by the district court to the state's placement and retention policies, which included increased notice requirements and changes to the administrative appellate procedure. The court noted past erroneous and haphazard placements at the facility, and the availability of administrative segregation to ensure the state's interest in safety. The appeals court found that the proper comparison was within the state's prison system, not between other supermaximum facilities in other states. The court held that confinement at the supermaximum facility imposed an atypical and significant hardship, given the extreme isolation visited upon inmates, lack of outdoor recreation, limitations on personal property rights and access to telephone and counsel, and ineligibility for parole. (Ohio State Penitentiary, Youngstown)

U.S. District Court
CLASSIFICATION
SEPARATION
FAILURE TO PROTECT

Carmichael v. Richards, 307 F.Supp.2d 1014 (S.D.Ind. 2004). A county jail prisoner who was injured by his cellmate brought a § 1983 action against a sheriff in his individual and official capacities, claiming that the sheriff failed to take reasonable measures to ensure his physical safety, and did not provide necessary medical care. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that the sheriff could not be held individually liable for failing to ensure the physical safety of a medium security inmate who was injured by a maximum security inmate, absent evidence that the sheriff knew of a substantial risk that the inmate would be harmed, or evidence of a causal link between the policy of mixing of medium and maximum security prisoners and the increased risk of violence. The court also found that the sheriff was not liable in his official capacity. The jail had three types of cell classifications: maximum, medium and minimum security. Inmates are classified by the shift leader who is on duty at the time an inmate arrives at the jail. (Johnson County Jail, Indiana)

U.S. District Court
CUSTODY LEVEL
TRANSFER

Colton v. Ashcroft, 299 F.Supp.2d 681 (E.D.Ky. 2004). A federal prisoner filed a petition for habeas corpus relief alleging that the federal Bureau of Prison's new regulation, which would delay his release to a halfway house until only ten percent of his sentence remained, violated the notice and comment provisions of the Administrative Procedures Act (APA). The district court granted the prisoner's motion for a preliminary injunction. The court held that the Prison Litigation Reform Act's (PLRA) exhaustion requirements did not apply to a habeas petition. The court noted that the public interest would be served by the grant of an injunction and that the prisoner would be irreparably harmed in the absence of an injunction. The court ordered the prisoner to be immediately transferred to a halfway house without regard to the new regulation. (FMC-Lexington, Kentucky, Fed. Bureau of Prisons)

U.S. District Court
SMOKING

Johnson v. Pearson, 316 F.Supp.2d 307 (E.D.Va. 2004). A prisoner brought a civil rights action under § 1983 against state prison officials, alleging that they acted with deliberate indifference to his risk of medical harm when they refused to assign him to a nonsmoking cell. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants in part, and denied in part. The court held that the defendants acted with deliberate indifference to the risk of serious damage to the prisoner's future health as the result of his exposure to environmental tobacco smoke, and that the defendants were not entitled to qualified immunity from the prisoner's future injury claims. The court also held that the prisoner's allegations regarding present injuries from environmental tobacco smoke stated a cognizable claim under the Eighth Amendment, and that the defendants were not entitled to qualified immunity from that claim. The inmate alleged that he experienced mild headaches, difficulty breathing, eye irritation, runny nose, dizziness, and occasional stomach cramping when he was housed with a smoking inmate. The court noted that officials never considered the consequences of future health problems when they refused to transfer the inmate to a nonsmoking cell, but were only concerned with administrative convenience. (Sussex II State Prison, Virginia)

U.S. District Court
SEX OFFENDER
DUE PROCESS

Kritenbrink v. Crawford, 313 F.Supp.2d 1043 (D.Nev. 2004). Former and current state inmates filed § 1983 actions alleging that the state provided no adequate due process procedures for them to challenge their classification as sex offenders. The district court dismissed the action, finding that the current inmate had to exhaust his administrative remedies, and that the state did not violate the former inmate's procedural due process rights. The court found that the State of Nevada provided an adequate administrative procedure for the inmate to challenge his classification as a sex offender, where administrative regulations stated that classification decisions were grievable and that the grievance procedure had to afford a meaningful remedy. (Northern Nevada Correctional Center, and Warm Springs Correctional Center, Nevada)

U.S. Appeals Court
SMOKING

Lehn v. Holmes, 364 F.3d 862 (7th Cir. 2004). A pro se state prisoner sued a state, alleging denial of access to the courts and living conditions that violated the Eighth Amendment. The district court dismissed the action and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The appeals court held that the State of Illinois, the state in which the prisoner was confined, was the proper defendant on the prisoner's claim that denial of access to Maryland legal materials hampered his ability to respond to pending Maryland criminal charges. The court also found that the prisoner had standing to challenge the corrections department's system-wide practice of housing nonsmoking inmates with smokers, by alleging concrete, particularized and actual injuries traceable to the practice. The court noted that the plaintiff held a Ph.D. in biochemistry and was a former Resident Research Assistant at the National Cancer Institute, and that he "knows a lot about the ill effects of exposure to second-hand tobacco smoke." (Pontiac Correctional Center, Big Muddy Correctional Center, and Graham Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
LOWER BUNK

Pennington v. Taylor, 343 F.Supp.2d 508 (E.D.Va. 2004). A state prisoner brought a pro se § 1983 action against a correctional officer, alleging that the officer showed deliberate indifference to a risk of harm by assigning him to a top bunk in light of certain medical conditions. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the officer. The court held that the officer was not deliberately indifferent because he simply had the prisoner's representations as to his medical condition, and she had no duty to confirm the representations because she had no authority over bed assignments, and there was no prior medically-authorized bottom bunk assignment. The court noted that the officer informed the prisoner of the steps he needed to take to change his bunk assignment, and there was no immediate indication that the prisoner was at risk. (Mecklenburg Correctional Center, Virginia)

U.S. Appeals Court
CLASSIFICATION
CRITERIA
FAILURE TO PROTECT

Pierson v. Hartley, 391 F.3d 898 (7th Cir. 2004). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against prison officials for failing to protect him from an assault by another inmate. Following a jury verdict in favor of the inmate, the district court entered judgment as a matter of law in favor of the officials. The inmate appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The court held that evidence was sufficient to create a fact issue for the jury as to whether officials disregarded risk to the inmate by assigning the assailant to a low-security dorm and allowing him to remain there following his weapons conviction in a prison disciplinary system. According to the court, the officials probably reviewed a letter from a county sheriff warning of the assailant's aberrant behavior and calling him an escape and assault risk, and the officials were likely aware of the assailant's disciplinary conviction of weapon possession. The court also found that the officials knew that the assailant had neither one year in the general prison population nor ten years without any serious convictions of conduct violations, as required by prison policy for placement in a low-security level dorm. (Indiana State Prison)

U.S. District Court
CUSTODY LEVEL

Scott v. Federal Bureau of Prisons, 317 F.Supp.2d 529 (D.N.J. 2004). A prisoner who had filed a habeas corpus petition filed a motion for injunctive relief to compel the federal Bureau of Prisons (BOP) to make a determination of his eligibility for release to a community corrections center (CCC) pursuant to a former BOP policy. The district court granted injunctive relief, finding that the prisoner was denied due process by a Justice Department's Office of Legal Counsel memo, which misinterpreted the law, thereby unlawfully restricting the BOP's discretion in determining how a prisoner's level of custody was to be implemented. (Fed. Corr'l. Ctr., Fort Dix, New Jersey)

U.S. District Court
SEGREGATION
PRETRIAL DETAINEE

U.S. v. Catalan-Roman, 329 F.Supp.2d 240 (D.Puerto Rico 2004). Two pretrial detainees filed a motion contesting their placement in administrative segregation after they were certified as being death-penalty eligible. The district court granted their motion, finding that death certification did not justify their automatic placement in administrative detention. The court noted that the detainees had resided in the general prison population without incident for over one year before being death-certified, there was no evidence that death-certified detainees were more likely to be disruptive or to take hostages, and their placement in administrative segregation eliminated their ability to establish mitigating evidence relative to their character and adjustment to life in prison. (Metropolitan Detention Center-Guaynabo, Puerto Rico)

U.S. District Court
PRETRIAL
DETAINEE
SEGREGATION

U.S. v. Lopez, 327 F.Supp.2d 138 (D.Puerto Rico 2004). A pretrial detainee who was placed in a special housing unit because he faced the death penalty, filed a motion for an evidentiary hearing on the conditions of his pretrial confinement. The district court held that the detainee's placement in a special housing unit solely because he faced the death penalty amounted to unconstitutional punishment. (Special Housing Unit, MDC-Guaynabo, Puerto Rico)

2005

U.S. District Court
SMOKING

Bartlett v. Pearson, 406 F.Supp.2d 626 (E.D.Va. 2005). A state prison inmate who was a non-smoker suffering from asthma, brought a § 1983 Eighth Amendment action against corrections officials alleging that being housed in a cell and housing unit with inmates who smoked endangered his health. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held the officials were not deliberately indifferent to the inmate's request for non-smoking housing and they were not indifferent to the inmate's asthma. The court noted that an allegation that exposure to environmental tobacco smoke (ETS) posed an unreasonable risk of serious damage to future health is cognizable under the Eighth Amendment. The prison had a policy aimed at limiting, when practicable, inmates' exposure to ETS, and they twice offered the inmate the option of residing in special or segregated housing. The inmate was moved to a non-smoking area after being housed with smokers for a total of 17 weeks, which the court found to be "not unreasonable" given the level of crowding at the prison and the fact that safety concerns took precedence over smoking preferences. (Sussex II State Prison, Virginia)

U.S. District Court
SEPARATION

Esmont v. City of New York, 371 F.Supp.2d 202 (E.D.N.Y. 2005). An arrestee filed a § 1983 action alleging that city health inspectors and police officers violated her constitutional rights during her arrest and detention for violations of a city nuisance law. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that the officials were not deliberately indifferent to the arrestee's serious medical needs when they did not comply with the arrestee's request for hot tea during an asthma attack, but called emergency medical services instead. The female detainee was handcuffed to a cross bar outside of a holding cell for over 7 hours, with no place to rest her elbow. She was required to use a bathroom that was monitored by a security camera and an officer insisted on watching her while she used the bathroom. She sought medical attention two days after her release for damage caused to her wrist by the handcuffing. The court held that the detainee was not exposed to excessive force, where the jail had only one cell and officials had a policy of not placing prisoners of opposite sexes in the cell together. The court noted that there was no evidence that the handcuffs were too tight, and the arrestee did not request that her handcuffs be loosened. (City of New York Police Department)

U.S. Appeals Court
DUE PROCESS
GANGS

Harbin-Bey v. Rutter, 420 F.3d 571 (6th Cir. 2005). A state prisoner filed a pro se § 1983 action alleging that his designation as a member of a security threat group without a hearing violated his constitutional rights. The district court dismissed the case and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the prisoner's designation without a hearing did not violate equal protection due process, or the prisoner's right of access to the courts. Although the designation caused the prisoner to be excluded from community placement and placed on visitor restrictions, the court found that his designation was not based on his religious beliefs but rather was due to his gang affiliation. The court upheld the state's policy directive regarding classification of inmates as security threat group members, finding it was rationally related to the legitimate state interest of maintaining order in the prison. According to the court, identifying, reclassifying and separating prisoners who are members of groups that engage in the planning or commitment of unlawful acts or acts of misconduct "targets a core threat to the safety of both prison inmates and officials." (Alger Maximum Security Facility, Michigan)

U.S. District Court
CUSTODY LEVEL
DUE PROCESS

Harris v. Meulemans, 389 F.Supp.2d 438 (D.Conn. 2005). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against a warden and corrections officials to challenge, as a violation of procedural due process, a hearing that resulted in his classification as a "Security Risk Group Member." The district court dismissed the action for failure to state a claim. The court held that an inmate has no due process liberty interest in a particular security classification, accrual of good time credits, or placement in a less-restrictive half-way house or work-release setting. (Cheshire Corr'l Inst., Connecticut)

U.S. District Court
PRIVILEGES

King v. Frank, 371 F.Supp.2d 977 (W.D.Wis. 2005). A state prison inmate brought a § 1983 action against corrections officials, alleging undue restrictions on telephone usage and access to written publications, improper cell illumination, and failure to provide adequate mental health care. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the officials. The court found that policies that placed extra restrictions on telephone use and the number of visitations for inmates in segregation status, and prohibited those inmates from possessing publications other than books, were reasonably related to legitimate penological interests. According to the court, the policies were designed to promote security and rehabilitation by allowing for the award of increased privileges for segregated inmates who demonstrated good behavior. (Waupun Correctional Institution, Wisconsin)

U.S. District Court
POLICY/PROCEDURE
FAILURE TO PROTECT

Little v. Shelby County, Tenn., 384 F.Supp.2d 1169 (W.D.Tenn. 2005). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against a county and sheriff, alleging that he had been raped in jail in violation of his Eighth Amendment rights. The county stipulated to liability and an order of injunctive relief was issued. Later, the district court found the county in contempt, and the county sought to purge itself of the contempt finding. The court entered a purgation order. The court held that the county and sheriff complied with the Eighth Amendment and purged themselves of contempt through the adoption of a structured reform to correct conditions that included violence, rape and gang control among inmates. In reaching its conclusion, the court considered whether officials took all reasonable steps within their power to comply with the order, which included whether they marshaled their own resources, asserted their highest authority, and demanded the results needed from subordinate persons and agencies in order to effectuate the course of action required by the order. The court praised the county, noting that it had adopted a focused, systemic and information-driven structural reform based on critical expert assessment of essential institutional functions. The county adopted a 14-point remedial scheme that included implementing direct supervision management of inmate cellblocks, improving population management, collecting and utilizing data, and installing an objective inmate classification system. (Shelby Co. Jail, Tenn.)

U.S. District Court
RELIGION

McRoy v. Cook County Dept. of Corrections, 366 F.Supp.2d 662 (N.D.Ill. 2005). A Muslim inmate at a county correctional facility brought a civil rights action under § 1983, alleging that his opportunities to practice his faith were restricted in violation of the Free Exercise Clause of the First Amendment. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that the inmate's free exercise rights were not violated by the cancellation of Muslim services during lockdowns, staff shortages, and when no volunteer imams were available to preside over services. The court upheld the facility's decision not to create a Muslim-only living unit. The court noted that the inmate was permitted to pray in his cell using religious materials he was allowed to keep there, as well as being allowed to pray in the common area of his living unit. (Cook County Department of Corrections, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEGREGATION
DUE PROCESS

Peoples v. CCA Detention Centers, 422 F.3d 1090 (10th Cir. 2005). A pretrial detainee who was housed at a detention center operated by a private contractor under a contract with the United States Marshals Service brought actions against the contractor and its employees, alleging Fifth and Eighth Amendment violations. The district court dismissed the action and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the employees did not punish the pretrial detainee in violation of his due process rights when they placed him in segregation upon his arrival at the center and kept him in segregation for approximately 13 months without a hearing. The detainee was first placed in segregation because the center lacked bed space in the general population, and he remained in segregation due to his plot to escape from his previous pretrial detention facility. According to the court, the detention center has a legitimate interest in segregating individual inmates from the general population for nonpunitive reasons, including threats to the safety and security of the institution. (Corrections Corporation of America, Leavenworth, Kansas)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEPARATION
CLASSIFICATION
CRITERIA

Purcell ex rel. Estate of Morgan v. Toombs County, 400 F.3d 1313 (11th Cir. 2005). The mother of a county jail inmate who died after he was beaten and injured by three other inmates brought a § 1983 action against a sheriff and jail administrator. The district court denied qualified immunity for the defendants, and Eleventh Amendment immunity for the sheriff, and they appealed. The appeals court reversed. The court held that the conditions at the county jail did not pose a “substantial risk of serious harm” as required to show an Eighth Amendment violation. The inmate was beaten by three other inmates in his cell over an alleged money dispute. Inmates were allowed to keep money in their cells, play cards and gamble, the jail had a history of inmate-on-inmate assaults, and the jail’s layout presented some difficulty in the continuous observation of inmates. But the court noted that inmates were segregated based on particularized factors, including the kind of crime committed and personal conflicts, the jail was not understaffed at the time of the attack, serious inmate-on-inmate violence was not the norm, fights that did occur were not linked to any recurring specific cause, and jailers had a history of punishing inmate violence. At the time of the incident the jail held 118 inmates and was staffed at normal levels, having five officers on duty. The sheriff had directed that a new commissary system be instituted to manage inmate funds so that inmates would not have to keep money on their persons, but the system had not been put in place by the day of the incident. (Toombs County Jail, Georgia)

U.S. District Court
LOWER BUNK

Reimann v. Frank, 397 F.Supp.2d 1059 (W.D.Wis. 2005). A state prison inmate sued various correctional officials under § 1983 alleging violations of his constitutional rights. The inmate petitioned for the right to proceed in forma pauperis and the district court granted the petition in part, and denied it in part. The court held that denial of weight training facilities was not an Eighth Amendment violation where there was no showing that a corrections official knew that weight training was necessary to treat the inmate’s femoral neuropathy and other leg ailments. The court also held that a warden and nurse practitioner did not violate the inmate’s Eighth Amendment rights by denying him access to indoor recreational facilities that were needed for the rehabilitation of his leg. They had been following a regulation that barred inmates who were on “low bunk restriction” due to medical conditions from indoor recreation. The court found that the inmate stated an Eighth Amendment claim with his allegations that a nurse practitioner countermanded an earlier order of a physician that only soft restraints were to be used. The court noted that there was a possibility that the nurse practitioner sought to deliberately inflict pain, rather than implement a differing medical assessment of the inmate’s condition. (Stanley Correctional Institution, Wisconsin)

U.S. District Court
ISOLATION

Scarver v. Litscher, 371 F.Supp.2d 986 (W.D.Wis. 2005). A state prison inmate sued officials seeking damages for their alleged indifference to his illness and challenging his conditions of confinement. The district court entered judgment in favor of the officials. The court held that the officials did not show deliberate indifference to the inmate’s mental illness condition, because he was examined and prescribed various antipsychotic medications. The inmate alleged that the only deficiency in his treatment was that officials failed to provide art supplies when they were requested. The court found that there were fact issues as to whether the inmate was subjected to conditions that were severe enough to violate the Eighth Amendment, but that the officials had qualified immunity from the inmate’s damages suit. The court held that placing the mentally ill inmate in a continuously-illuminated maximum security cell without windows was not clearly established to be an Eighth Amendment violation at the time they placed the inmate in the most extreme isolation section of the maximum security prison. (Wisconsin Secure Program Facility)

U.S. District Court
TRANSFER

Scott v. Garcia, 370 F.Supp.2d 1056 (S.D.Cal. 2005). An inmate brought a suit against a state corrections department alleging violation of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), and against individual department employees for violation of the Eighth Amendment. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants in part and denied it in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded on a claim that members of the prison’s classification committee violated the inmate’s Eighth Amendment rights by not recommending his transfer to a facility with acute hospital care, and on a claim that the prison system violated ADA by not allowing him a longer time to eat his meals or by allowing him to eat small frequent meals. (High Desert State Prison, Centinela State Prison, California)

U.S. Appeals Court
GANGS
TRANSFER

Westefer v. Snyder, 422 F.3d 570 (7th Cir. 2005). State prisoners brought a § 1983 action challenging their transfers to a higher-security prison. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants and the prisoners appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The court held that the prisoners' suit challenging transfers to a high security prison was not subject to dismissal for failure to exhaust administrative remedies as required by the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA), where the transfer review process was not available to prisoners in disciplinary segregation, and the prisoners' grievances were sufficient to alert the prison that the transfer decisions were being challenged. The court held that the alleged change in a prison policy that required transferring gang members to a high security facility did not constitute an ex post facto violation. The court ruled that the prisoners stated a claim for denial of due process, where the conditions at the high security prison were arguably different enough to give the prisoners a liberty interest in not being transferred there, and there was a dispute as to whether the state provided sufficient pre- and post-transfer opportunities for the prisoners to challenge the propriety of the transfers. The court held that the transfers did not violate the gang members' First Amendment associational rights, noting that prisoners had no right to associate with gangs. (Tamms Correctional Center, Illinois)

2006

U.S. District Court
CLASSIFICATION
DUE PROCESS
CUSTODY LEVEL

Austin v. Wilkinson, 502 F.Supp.2d 675 (N.D. Ohio 2006). A state inmate filed a § 1983 action alleging that the procedure for transferring him to a super maximum security prison violated due process. The inmate moved to compel the state to reduce his security placement level. The district court granted the motion. The court held that the process used by the state to increase the inmate's security placement level after he killed his cellmate violated due process, even though the prison's rules infraction board found insufficient evidence that the inmate acted solely in self-defense, where the prison's classification security committee recommended that the inmate's security placement remain unchanged, the inmate was not given notice of the warden's decision to override the committee's recommendation or opportunity to argue his position and submit evidence, the inmate was not given a hearing on administrative appeal, the board's finding was subject to review by the committee, and the inmate was transferred to a super maximum security prison before the review process was complete. According to the court, due process required that the warden and the state's administrative appeals board provide adequate reasoned statements to justify their decisions to override the prison's classification committee's recommendation that the inmate's security placement remain unchanged after he killed his cellmate. The court held that the state prison system was required to provide an individualized review of the security risk presented by an inmate following his transfer to a super maximum security prison, and thus the state's use of a boilerplate checklist violated the inmate's due process rights, where the inmate received no meaningful review of his situation or of the events leading to his transfer. (Ohio State Penitentiary)

U.S. District Court
CLASSIFICATION
CRITERIA
DUE PROCESS
CUSTODY LEVEL

Austin v. Wilkinson, 502 F.Supp.2d 660 (N.D. Ohio 2006). State inmates in a super maximum security prison facility brought a class action against corrections officials under § 1983 alleging that procedures for transferring them to, and retaining them at, the prison violated due process. The district court ruled that the procedures denied due process and ordered modifications. Prison officials appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part and remanded. Certiorari was granted. The United States Supreme Court affirmed in part, reversed in part and remanded. On remand, the inmates moved for an order extending the court's jurisdiction over due process issues for one year, and the officials' moved to terminate prospective relief. The district court granted the inmates' motion and denied the officials' motion. (Ohio State Penitentiary)

U.S. Appeals Court
MENTALLY ILL
SEGREGATION

Clark-Murphy v. Foreback, 439 F.3d 280 (6th Cir. 2006). The estate of a state inmate who died of dehydration while in an observation cell brought two civil rights suits against prison employees, alleging deliberate indifference to the prisoner's medical needs in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The district court denied qualified immunity to 15 corrections officers and they appealed. The appeals court held that a captain and sergeant who assisted the inmate after he collapsed outside the mess hall were not subjectively indifferent to his serious medical needs in violation of his Eighth Amendment rights, and thus were entitled to qualified immunity. The court noted that each perceived that the inmate faced risks to his psychological health and took reasonable steps to ensure that officers in charge of the inmate's care secured psychological services for him, and that neither officer had any further contact with the inmate or any reason to believe that the inmate's medical needs were not being met. The court found that prison officers and a psychologist who were in the position to perceive that the inmate, who was acting strangely and had been locked in an observation cell and had not received the psychological assistance he needed, were not entitled to qualified immunity on the Eighth Amendment claim alleging deliberate indifference given their interactions with the inmate and their apparent failure to go up the chain of command when a referral did not secure assistance for the inmate. The court also found that the officers and psychologist were not entitled to qualified immunity on the claim that they were deliberately indifferent to the hydration needs of the inmate who died of dehydration after six days in an observation cell, as they could have perceived a serious risk to the inmate based on a heat wave, the fact that water was repeatedly cut off to inmate's cell during their shifts, and the reports of other inmates that the inmate had called out for water. The court found that a correctional nurse who worked just one shift shortly after the inmate's placement in an observation cell was entitled to qualified immunity from liability given her limited exposure to the inmate and the resulting absence of evidence that there was reason to believe that the nurse perceived that psychological help had not been obtained for the inmate or that his condition was deteriorating. (Bellamy Creek Correctional Facility, Ionia, Michigan)

U.S. District Court
CUSTODY LEVEL
DISCIPLINE
EQUAL PROTECTION

Dickens v. Taylor, 464 F.Supp.2d 341 (D.Del. 2006). A prisoner filed a civil rights action against various corrections defendants, alleging unlawful conditions of confinement and excessive force. The district court dismissed the claims. The court held that: (1) placement of the prisoner in isolation for not more than two months at a time did not implicate a liberty interest; (2) neither Delaware law nor Department of Corrections regulations created a due process liberty interest in a prisoner's classification within an institution, and the prisoner had no property or liberty interest in the prison classification program or his housing assignment; (3) the prisoner failed to state an equal protection claim based on the allegation that a majority of the inmates in the special housing unit were black; (4) the denial of the disciplined prisoner's television privilege did not give rise to an Eighth Amendment claim since television privileges did not constitute necessities; and (5) the failure to serve brand name cereals and cold fresh water during meal time were not an Eighth Amendment violation. (Delaware Correctional Center)

U.S. Appeals Court
SUICIDE
SPECIAL NEEDS

Drake ex rel. Cotton v. Koss, 445 F.3d 1038 (8th Cir. 2006). The legal guardian for an incapacitated person who attempted to commit suicide while he was a pretrial detainee in a county jail, and a state department of human services sued a county and various officials in their individual and official capacities under § 1983, alleging violations of the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments, and asserted a state law claim for negligence. The district court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment and the guardian appealed. The appeals court affirmed. On rehearing, the appeals court held that county jailers' actions did not constitute deliberate indifference, and the jailers' decision not to assign a special need classification to the pretrial detainee was a discretionary decision protected by official immunity. According to the court, the jailers' actions of conducting well-being checks of the pretrial detainee only every 30 minutes, failing to remove bedding and clothing, and failing to fill the detainee's anti-anxiety prescription in a timely manner did not constitute deliberate indifference. The court found that the jailers' view of the risk was shaped by the diagnosis and recommendations of a psychiatrist, who indicated that the detainee was not suicidal but simply manipulative. The court noted that the jailers' decision not to assign a special need classification to the pretrial detainee, that would have required more frequent observation, was a discretionary decision rather than a ministerial duty, protected by official immunity. The detainee was discovered hanging by a bed sheet from a ceiling vent in his cell. He was not breathing and the jailers immediately set to work resuscitating him and then transported him to a nearby hospital. He survived, but suffered serious brain injuries as a result of the suicide attempt. (McLeod County Jail, Minnesota)

U.S. District Court
SEX OFFENDERS
CLASSIFICATION
CRITERIA

Fox v. Lappin, 409 F.Supp.2d 79 (D.Mass. 2006). A federal prisoner brought suit against the Director of the Federal Bureau of Prisons and a warden, seeking declaratory judgment that his classification as a sex offender based on a 1981 state sexual assault conviction was improper. The prisoner also challenged the Bureau's failure to consider him for community center placement based on his failure to participate in a sex offender program. The district court held that a federal prisoner cannot be designated as a sex offender based on a state sex offense for purposes of the federal statute requiring that notice be given to state and local authorities of an inmate's release if the inmate has been designated as a sex offender, and that designated sex offender register in the state in which he will reside, because the Attorney General's authority under the statute is limited to designating federal offenses as sex offenses. The court found that as a matter of inmate classification, a prisoner's classification as a sex offender on basis of state sexual assault conviction was not an abuse of discretion. The court held that the BOP policy that categorically excludes inmates with sex offender safety factors from placement in community corrections centers is a permissible interpretation of the rule and that the BOP did not abuse its discretion in denying an inmate designated as a sex offender placement in a community corrections center based on his failure to participate in a mandatory sex offender program. The court noted that the federal statute governing pre-release custody of a federal prisoner does not create a liberty interest in the prisoner's transfer to the less restrictive environment of community center placement, as the statute does not mandate community center placement nor any placement in a less restrictive environment, it merely insures placement under pre-release conditions except where no such placement is practicable. (Federal Medical Center, Devens, Massachusetts)

U.S. Appeals Court
TRANSFER LIBERTY INTEREST

Garcia v. Lemaster, 439 F.3d 1215 (10th Cir. 2006). A New Mexico inmate housed in California pursuant to an Interstate Corrections Compact (ICC) filed a civil rights action against New Mexico defendants challenging his classification and denial of recreation in California. The district court granted the defendants' motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim and the inmate appealed. The court of appeals affirmed, finding that the inmate was required to bring his civil rights suit challenging the conditions of his confinement against his California custodians, and that the inmate did not have a state-created liberty interest in conditions of confinement in accord with New Mexico regulations when he was housed in another state. According to the court, an inmate incarcerated in another state pursuant to the ICC had no liberty interest entitling him to the application of the sending state's classification and recreation rules while confined in the receiving state. The court also found that the inmate had no statutory right under the ICC to be classified and afforded recreation pursuant to New Mexico regulations, noting that the ICC specifically provided that such inmates were entitled to treatment equal to that afforded similar inmates of the receiving state. (New Mexico State Penitentiary, New Mexico Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court LIBERTY
INTEREST

Gaskins v. Johnson, 443 F.Supp.2d 800 (E.D.Va. 2006). A state inmate, proceeding pro se, filed a petition for a writ of habeas corpus challenging the denial of good conduct credits. The district court dismissed the petition. The court held that the appropriate remedy for the inmate's challenge to the denial of good conduct credits was an action pursuant to § 1983, not a petition for a writ of habeas corpus. The court found that the inmate did not have a protected liberty interest in either maintaining a current classification or obtaining a new classification, as required to prevail on a § 1983 claim. (Powhatan Correctional Center, Virginia)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEPARATION
CELL ASSIGNMENT
RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

Lindell v. Houser, 442 F.3d 1033 (7th Cir. 2006). A white-supremacist inmate brought an action alleging that prison official violated the Eighth Amendment by housing him with a black inmate. The district court entered summary judgment in favor of the official and the inmate appealed. The court of appeals held that the official did not violate the inmate's Eighth Amendment rights by placing him in a cell with a black inmate, even though the official knew of the black inmate's involvement with a gang and the white inmate's expression of fear. The court found that the official did not have reason to believe that the white inmate was at a serious risk since eighteen months had passed without incident after the cellmates' initial fight and nothing indicated specific threats had been made by the black inmate or other members of the gang. The court noted that the inmate had no constitutional right to be housed with members of his own race, culture, or temperament. The court held that the inmate was not entitled to a court-appointed lawyer to help him prosecute his case against prison officials, noting that the inmate was experienced in litigation, and that any difficulty prosecuting his case was largely caused by the inmate's choice to pursue other cases at the same time. (Waupun Correctional Institution, Wisconsin)

U.S. Appeals Court
CELL ASSIGNMENT
TRANSFER

Moots v. Lombardi, 453 F.3d 1020 (8th Cir. 2006). A state prisoner sued various prison officials, alleging that they were deliberately indifferent to his serious mental health needs and that they retaliated against him for filing a grievance. The district court entered summary judgment for the officials and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed and held that: (1) the failure to house the prisoner with cellmates of his choosing did not constitute deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs, where the officials had ample reasons for their action, including safety concerns, and the officials had no reason to know that their housing choices would have a serious negative impact on the prisoner's mental health; (2) any failure to ensure that the prisoner's medications were promptly transferred to solitary confinement did not constitute deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs, absent a showing by the prisoner that he suffered harm as a result; (3) a conduct violation for fighting did not constitute retaliatory discipline, where the prisoner was bruised around his eye, and the fact that a conduct violation was later expunged did not mean that there was not some evidence for its imposition; and (4) transfer to another prison did not constitute disciplinary retaliation, where he disputed neither the computation of his classification score nor the conclusion that his score made him ineligible to remain at the prison from which he was transferred. (Missouri Eastern Correctional Center)

U.S. District Court
LETHAL INJECTION

Morales v. Tilton, 465 F.Supp.2d 972 (N.D.Cal. 2006). A death row inmate filed a § 1983 action alleging that California's protocol governing executions by lethal injection violated the Eighth Amendment prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment. The court held that the protocol, as implemented, violated the Eighth Amendment, even though the sequence of three drugs described in the protocol, when properly administered, would provide for a constitutionally adequate level of anesthesia. The court found that there were systemic flaws in the implementation of the protocol that made it impossible to determine with any degree of certainty whether inmates may have been conscious during previous executions or whether there was any reasonable assurance going forward that an inmate would be adequately anesthetized. The court noted "Any legal proceeding arising in this contest thus acts as a powerful magnet, an opportunity for people who care about this divisive issue to express their opinions and vent their frustrations." (San Quentin State Prison)

U.S. Appeals Court LIBERTY
INTEREST

Myron v. Terhune, 457 F.3d 996 (9th Cir. 2006). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against several correctional officers and medical personnel at a prison. The district court dismissed the action and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that a state regulation governing the security classification of prisoners did not give the state prisoner a liberty interest, protected by the due process clause, in the security level to which he was classified, noting that the regulation provided that prison officials retained discretion in making placement decisions. (Salinas Valley State Prison, California)

U.S. Appeals Court
CELL ASSIGNMENT
SUICIDE
MENTALLY ILL

Perez v. Oakland County, 466 F.3d 416 (6th Cir. 2006). The father and personal representative of an inmate's estate brought a § 1983 action against a county, sheriff department, sheriff deputies, inmate caseworker, and psychiatrist alleging the defendants violated the inmate's Eighth Amendment rights by failing to provide appropriate mental health treatment or monitoring while he was being held in a county jail, leading to the inmate's suicide. The eighteen-year-old inmate had hanged himself from a bedsheet tied to a vent in his single cell. The district court granted the defendants' motions for summary judgment and the father appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that a county policy allowing a caseworker, who was not medical personnel, to make decisions regarding housing assignments for mentally ill inmates did not demonstrate deliberate indifference. The court noted that the caseworker was well-trained in mental health needs and suicide, nothing established that the policy had ever resulted in suicide or attempted suicide by another prisoner in the county jail, and the father's expert stated that prisoner screening and placement decisions were commonly made by non-medical officials. The court held that the caseworker was entitled to qualified immunity because it was not clearly established at the time of the suicide that a county jail caseworker could be found to be deliberately indifferent to an inmate's medical needs by moving him to single cell housing without first consulting the inmate's treating physician or the jail's psychiatrist, even though the inmate had threatened suicide and attempted suicide in the past. The court noted that the inmate was not deemed suicidal when he was moved to a single cell, the inmate was not generally deprived of medical treatment involving his mental health needs, and prisoners had no general right to be correctly screened for suicidal tendencies. (Oakland County Jail, Michigan)

U.S. Appeals Court
LOWER BUNK
SPECIAL NEEDS

Phillips v. Jasper County Jail, 437 F.3d 791 (8th Cir. 2006). An inmate at a county jail brought a § 1983 action against various jail employees and the jail's doctor, alleging violation of his constitutional rights. The district court granted the defendants' motions for summary judgment and the inmate appealed. The court of appeals held that the inmate was not entitled to appointed counsel where discovery had just begun at the time the inmate requested counsel and there was no conflicting testimony, there was no indication that the inmate was unable to investigate or present his case, the inmate correctly identified the applicable legal standard governing his claims and successfully amended his complaint to include essential information, his claims involved information readily available to him, the inmate was able to avoid procedural default, the complaint was sufficient to survive the first motion for summary judgment, and the inmate had been able to file more than thirty documents with the court. The court found that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact regarding whether jail employees assigned the inmate to a top bunk, despite the fact that he suffered from a seizure disorder. (Jasper County Jail, Missouri)

U.S. District Court
TRANSFER
CUSTODY LEVEL

Price v. Wall, 464 F.Supp.2d 90 (D.R.I. 2006). A state prisoner brought a pro se civil rights action under § 1983 against various prison officials, alleging the officials retaliated against him in violation of his First Amendment rights. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that: (1) the prisoner's transfer to an out-of-state correctional system was not adverse; (2) the prisoner's classification while confined in the out-of-state correctional facility to a restrictive or harsh classification was not adverse, for the purposes of his First Amendment retaliation claim; and (4) the officials were not liable for retaliation based on the prisoner's classification while confined in the out-of-state correctional facility. The court noted that the prisoner's classification was not significantly more severe than his classification while confined at the in-state correctional facility. (Rhode Island Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court JUVENILE HOMOSEXUALS
DUE PROCESS

R.G. v. Koller, 415 F.Supp.2d 1129 (D.Hawai'i 2006). Three juveniles who either identified themselves as, or were perceived to be, lesbian, gay, bisexual, or transgender and who had been confined at a state juvenile correctional facility brought claims against the facility alleging due process, equal protection, Establishment Clause, and access to counsel violations. The district court granted the juveniles' motion for a preliminary injunction in part, and denied in part. The court held that the juveniles had standing to seek a preliminary injunction preventing the facility officials from engaging in unconstitutional conduct and requiring them to implement policies and procedures to ensure their safety at the facility. Although none of the juveniles were incarcerated at the time the complaint was filed, the court found that enjoining certain unconstitutional conduct and requiring officials to implement policies and procedures to remedy those conditions would remedy the juveniles' injury, and, the juveniles showed a likelihood of repetition of the injury given that each of the juveniles had been incarcerated at the facility two to three times over a relatively short period of time, each had been released only to return to the facility a short time later, and the juveniles' experiences indicated that, at the time the complaint was filed, each juvenile was likely to return to the facility. The court found that the facility's adoption of a youth rights policy providing that youth should not be discriminated against on the basis of sexual orientation did not render moot the juveniles' claims for injunctive relief from sexual orientation harassment, absent evidence, aside from the policies themselves, that the facility had altered its treatment of its lesbian, gay, bisexual, or transgender wards. According to the court, the facility's use of isolation to "protect" its lesbian, gay, bisexual, or transgender wards was not within the range of acceptable professional practices and constituted punishment in violation of their due process rights. The court found that such practices were, at best, an excessive and therefore unconstitutional, response to the legitimate safety needs of the institution. (Hawai'i Youth Correctional Facility)

U.S. District Court
GANGS
DUE PROCESS

Stewart v. Alameida, 418 F.Supp.2d 1154 (N.D.Cal. 2006). A state prison inmate brought a § 1983 action against California corrections officials alleging violation of his First and Fourteenth Amendment associational and due process rights, claiming that his validation as a gang associate kept him in a secure housing unit.

Officials moved for summary judgment and the district court granted the motion. The court held that state regulations providing for gang validation based on association bore a rational relation to a penological interest in institutional security and that the full accommodation of inmate's associational rights would seriously hinder security and compromise safety. According to the court, an interview after he was gang-validated afforded the inmate an adequate procedural remedy consistent with due process. The court found that any of three photographs of the inmate posing with inmates, some of whom were validated gang associates and one of whom was a validated gang member, supported the inmate's gang validation consistent with due process. (San Quentin Adjustment Center, California)

U.S. District Court
DUE PROCESS
EQUAL PROTECTION
DISCIPLINE

Wilson v. Taylor, 466 F.Supp.2d 567 (D.Del. 2006). Thirty-one Black inmates filed a § 1983 action alleging that state prison officials routinely denied their right to procedural due process during disciplinary hearings and security classification determinations. The officials moved to dismiss the complaint and the inmates asked for summary judgment. The motions were granted in part and denied in part. The court held that Delaware has created no constitutionally protected liberty interest in an inmate's security classification, even when the change in classification is for disciplinary reasons. The court found that the black inmates did not have a liberty interest in prison jobs, a particular security classification, or assignments to particular buildings, and thus the state prison officials' decision in those matters did not violate the inmates' due process rights. The court noted that state prison policies and procedures did not give a reasonable expectation of employment, a particular security classification, or a particular building assignment. The court denied summary judgment for the defendants on the issue of whether state prison officials consistently treated black inmates differently from similarly situated white inmates in job assignments, disciplinary actions, and security classification, and racially segregated the inmates within the facility. According to the court, the issue involved fact questions that could not be resolved on a motion to dismiss the claim against officials for violating their equal protection rights. The court held that an inmate's allegation that he was transferred to a housing unit with far fewer privileges after filing a civil rights action against the prison officials, in violation of his First Amendment right of access to courts, sufficiently alleged a retaliation claim against the officials, and that a genuine issue of material fact as to the reason for the inmate's transfer to a more restrictive facility precluded summary judgment. (Delaware Dept. of Correction)

2007

U.S. Appeals Court
GANGS
SOLITARY CONFINEMENT

Ashford v. U.S., 511 F.3d 501 (5th Cir. 2007). An inmate sued the United States under the Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA) alleging that the Federal Bureau of Prisons (BOP) was negligent in placing him in a prison population with a gang member who had attacked him in the past. The district court entered summary judgment for the BOP and the inmate appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The court held that the discretionary-function exception to FTCA did not apply if the inmate raised a concern at a prison intake interview that he would be endangered if he were placed in the prison population with the gang member. The court noted that a prison policy required that the inmate be put into solitary confinement pending an investigation if he raised such a concern, leaving prison officials with no discretion. According to the court, genuine issues of material fact existed as to whether the inmate raised a concern at the prison intake interview, precluding summary judgment. (Federal Bureau of Prisons)

U.S. District Court
CUSTODY LEVEL
TRANSFER
LIBERTY INTEREST

Farmer v. Kavanagh, 494 F.Supp.2d 345 (D.Md. 2007). A state prison inmate sued officials, claiming her Fourteenth Amendment due process rights and her Eighth Amendment right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment were violated when she was transferred from a medium to a maximum security facility. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court entered judgment for the officials on the federal claims and dismissed the state law claim. The court held that the inmate had a liberty interest in not being sent to a maximum security prison, as required in order to bring a claim that transfer to maximum security facility without prior notice and an opportunity to be heard, was a violation of her Fourteenth Amendment rights. The court noted that the maximum security prison's strict control over every aspect of an inmate's life, and almost virtual isolation from any human contact, imposed conditions of confinement far worse than her previous situation in the general population of a medium security prison. But the court found that the officials had qualified immunity from the inmate's due process claim because, at the time of the transfer, it was not clearly established that an inmate could have a liberty interest in not being transferred to a maximum security prison. (Maryland Correctional Adjustment Center ["Supermax"])

U.S. District Court
LOWER BUNK
POLICY/PROCEDURE

Felix-Torres v. Graham, 521 F.Supp.2d 157, (N.D.N.Y. 2007). A prisoner filed a pro se § 1983 suit against the New York Department of Correctional Services (DOCS), alleging that named DOCS employees and four "John Doe" defendants violated his constitutional rights under the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments, related to injuries suffered from a fall from his assigned upper bunk during a diabetic low blood sugar reaction and seizure. The named employees moved to dismiss for failure to state a claim. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the prisoner sufficiently alleged that prison officials were personally involved in the deprivation of his Eighth Amendment rights and that they were not protected by qualified immunity. The court found that the prisoner sufficiently alleged that a nurse administrator was deliberately indifferent to a risk for the prisoner and that the prisoner's allegations were sufficient for a § 1983 claim of deprivation of rights. According to the court, the prisoner sufficiently alleged the "personal involvement" of a superintendent and deputy superintendents of the prison based on the officials' creation and administration of prison procedures for assignment of inmates to upper bunks, and by supervision of subordinates who assigned the prisoner to an upper bunk despite his known medical condition. (Auburn Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
FAILURE TO PROTECT

Guzman v. Sheahan, 495 F.3d 852 (7th Cir. 2007). A pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against county jail officials and a sheriff alleging violations of his right to due process as guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment. The district court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment and the detainee appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that a corrections officer was not deliberately indifferent to the detainee's safety and welfare, as required for the detainee's § 1983 due process claim, arising out of a fight with another inmate and resulting in serious injury to the detainee. The court noted that the detainee had never before interacted with the inmate involved in the altercation nor had he ever communicated to the corrections officer or to anyone else that the inmate might be a specific danger to him. Immediately after the fight broke out, the officer called for back-up. The court held that there was no evidence that the sheriff had knowledge that the classification and reclassification of inmates were being poorly implemented by corrections officers, as required for the detainee's § 1983 official capacity claim against the sheriff. (Cook County Jail, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
CELL ASSIGNMENT
POLICY/PROCEDURE
PRETRIAL DETAINEE

Jenkins v. DeKalb County, Ga., 528 F.Supp.2d 1329 (N.D.Ga. 2007). Survivors of a county jail detainee who had died as the result of an apparent beating by a fellow inmate brought a § 1983, Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment action against a county sheriff in his individual capacity, and against corrections officers. The defendants moved for summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds. The district court granted the motion. The 71 year old pretrial detainee suffered from multiple mental illnesses including schizophrenia and dementia, which reportedly manifested themselves in the form of delusions, paranoia, bizarre thoughts and behavior, physical violence, and verbal outbursts that included racial epithets. The court held that county corrections officers' putting the inmate into a cell different from the one to which he had been assigned, allegedly leading to the beating death of a pretrial detainee who shared the same cell, did not violate the detainee's right against cruel and unusual punishment. The court noted that even though the action violated a jail policy, the policy was created primarily to keep track of inmates' placement, not to maintain inmate safety, and there was no evidence of widespread inmate-on-inmate violence due to the misplacement of inmates. The court found that the plaintiffs failed to show that the sheriff's alleged poor training and supervision of corrections officers led to the officers' allegedly inadequate reaction to the incident between the jail inmates, which ended with the beating death of one inmate. The court also found that the sheriff's failure to comply with a court order to transfer the pretrial detainee to a mental health facility did not show supervisory liability because the purpose of the transfer order was likely to get the detainee treatment for mental illness, not to protect him. The court held that the county corrections officers were acting within the scope of their duties when they mistakenly placed a fellow inmate in the same cell with a pretrial detainee, and thus the officers were eligible for qualified immunity in the detainee's survivors' § 1983 Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment action. The court noted that the fact that the mistake violated jail policies or procedures did not mean that the officers were not exercising discretionary authority. (DeKalb County Jail, Georgia)

U.S. Appeals Court
CUSTODY LEVEL
DUE PROCESS
LIBERTY INTEREST

Myron v. Terhune, 476 F.3d 716 (9th Cir. 2007). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against several correctional officers and medical personnel at a prison. The district court dismissed the claims and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that California regulations governing security classification of prisoners and subsequent facility placement did not give the state prisoner a liberty interest, protected by the due process clause, in placement at a facility consistent with his security level. According to the court, placement at a higher security level facility than an inmate's classification did not present an atypical and significant hardship, as there was no showing that conditions at the higher security prisons differed significantly from those imposed upon inmates in lower level prisons or in administrative segregation and protective custody. The court noted that there was no showing that the prisoner's classification would invariably affect the duration of his sentence. The court concluded that the prisoner's allegedly improper classification to a higher-level security facility than indicated by his individual security classification did not violate the Eighth Amendment, as classification to such a facility did not amount to the infliction of pain. (Salinas Valley State Prison, California)

U.S. Appeals Court
PROTECTIVE CUSTODY

O'Brien v. Indiana Dept. of Correction ex rel. Turner, 495 F.3d 505 (7th Cir. 2007). A prisoner brought a § 1983 action against a department of correction and a warden arising from an attack by other inmates, alleging the warden was deliberately indifferent to his safety in violation of the Eighth Amendment. After denying the prisoner's motion to add additional defendants, the district court granted summary judgment for the defendants. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the district court did not abuse its discretion in denying the motion to amend. The court found that the warden was not deliberately indifferent to a substantial risk of harm to the prisoner by placing the prisoner, who was a former prison guard convicted of rape and other charges, in a unit where other at-risk inmates were placed, notwithstanding that the prisoner was severely beaten by other inmates some four and one-half years after his placement in the unit. The court noted that prison staff initially brought the prisoner into segregation for his safety, and, having considered the nature of the threat against him and the availability of placing him among the at-risk population, the prison chose to place him with the other former police officers, guards, and prosecutors, a course of action that had been followed repeatedly in the past. (Wabash Valley Correctional Facility, Indiana)

U.S. District Court
CELL ASSIGNMENT
FAILURE TO PROTECT
SEPARATION

Rigano v. County of Sullivan, 486 F.Supp.2d 244 (S.D.N.Y. 2007). An inmate brought § 1983 and negligence claims against a county, county sheriff, jail administrator, corrections officers and fellow inmates, alleging that he was harassed and beaten by the inmate defendants while serving his sentence at the county jail, in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants. The court held that the county jail's procedure for determining where and in what manner new inmates were to be housed did not amount to deliberate indifference to the inmate's safety, as would violate the Eighth Amendment, despite the fact that the inmate was allegedly harassed and physically assaulted by other inmates in the cell block where he was placed. The court noted that, pursuant to the jail's placement procedure, corrections officers asked each inmate a series of questions to assist in placing them, including questions about any enemies the inmate had in the current prison population, the inmate failed to indicate when asked any reason why he should not be placed in the general prison population, and the officers had no reason to know that the inmate would be harassed and assaulted by other inmates. (Sullivan County Jail, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEGREGATION
DUE PROCESS

Stevenson v. Carroll, 495 F.3d 62 (3rd Cir. 2007). Three pretrial detainees filed a pro se § 1983 action against a warden, alleging that their placement in restrictive confinement violated their substantive and procedural due process rights. The district court dismissed the action and the detainees appealed. The appeals court vacated and remanded. The court held that the detainees' allegations stated a claim for violation of substantive due process rights and a claim for violation of procedural due process rights. The court remanded the case for consideration of the qualified immunity claim. The detainees alleged that they were punished prior to being sentenced by being placed in restrictive confinement, that they were subjected to lengthy stays in isolation with prisoners who had disciplinary problems or who were in protective custody, and that they were subjected to additional hardships that were not shared by the general prison population. The court found that the detainees' allegations were sufficiently factual to raise the detainees' right to relief above a speculative level. The detainees also alleged that they were placed in restrictive confinement indefinitely and removed from the general prison population while awaiting resentencing after their sentences were vacated, and that they were not given any explanation or opportunity to contest the restrictive placement. (Security Housing Unit [SHU], Delaware)

2008

U.S. District Court
CIVIL COMMITMENT
DOUBLE CELLING
DUE PROCESS
EQUAL PROTECTION

Alves v. Murphy, 530 F.Supp.2d 381 (D.Mass. 2008). A person who had been civilly committed as a sexually dangerous person (SDP) brought a civil rights action alleging that treatment center officials placed him at a risk of harm by not adhering to certain mandatory procedures prior to implementing a double-bunking policy. The plaintiff also alleged that the officials violated equal protection principles by granting privileges to certain residents at the center, but not to others. A magistrate judge dismissed the action. The judge held that failure of the state treatment center to follow its own procedures regarding double-bunking, standing alone, was not a sufficient basis for a § 1983 claim. The court noted that the First Circuit analyzes the constitutional claims of pretrial detainees, who, like civil committees, may not be punished, under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. But, according to the court, the court draws on Eighth Amendment jurisprudence and applies the "deliberate indifference" standard when analyzing a pretrial detainee's failure-to-protect claims. (Massachusetts Treatment Center)

U.S. District Court
CLASSIFICATION
CRITERIA
PRETRIAL DETAINEE

Basciano v. Lindsay, 530 F.Supp.2d 435 (E.D.N.Y. 2008). A pretrial detainee petitioned for a writ of habeas corpus seeking an order lifting special administrative measures governing his confinement and releasing him from a special housing unit back into the general prison population. The district court denied the petition. The court held that the restrictive conditions of pretrial confinement which removed the detainee from the general prison population, did not amount to punishment without due process. The court noted that there was substantial evidence of the detainee's dangerousness, a rational connection between the conditions and a legitimate purpose of protecting potential victims, and the existence of an alternative means for the detainee to exercise his right to communicate with others and with counsel. (Metropolitan Detention Center, Brooklyn, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
CELL ASSIGNMENT
EQUAL PROTECTION
RACIAL
DISCRIMINATION

Brand v. Motley, 526 F.3d 921 (6th Cir. 2008). A Black inmate, proceeding in forma pauperis, brought a § 1983 action after prison officials denied his request to share a cell with a white inmate in part because a "Black/White move is more difficult to do than a same race move." The district court dismissed the complaint as frivolous. The inmate appealed. The appeals court vacated and remanded. The court found that the prisoner's allegations--that he was discriminated against based on his race because his race figured into the denial of his request to move cells--was not frivolous, since prisoners were protected from racial discrimination under the Equal Protection Clause. (Eastern Kentucky Correctional Complex)

U.S. Appeals Court
FAILURE TO PROTECT
GANGS
SEPARATION

Howard v. Waide, 534 F.3d 1227 (10th Cir. 2008). An inmate brought claims against several Colorado Department of Corrections (CDOC) employees and a grievance officer pursuant to § 1983, alleging deliberate indifference in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The district court granted the grievance officer's motion to dismiss and granted the other defendants' motions for summary judgment, and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The court held that the inmate established an objective substantial risk of serious harm, as required for his Eighth Amendment deliberate indifference claim, by alleging that he had previously been targeted by a notorious prison gang because of his build and sexual orientation, that he was threatened, sexually assaulted, and prostituted against his will by members of this gang, and was later transferred to a different facility for his own safety, and, that after arriving at the new facility, he was identified by a member of the same prison gang who had assaulted him in the past and was housed in a less-restrictive area of the prison where it was easier for gang members to assault him. The court found that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the corrections' employees had subjective knowledge of a significant risk of substantial harm to the inmate. The court also found that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the employees responded to the known risk to the inmate by a prison gang in a reasonable manner. (Sterling Correctional Facility, Colorado)

U.S. District Court
FAILURE TO PROTECT

Jones v. Oakland County, 585 F.Supp.2d 914 (E.D.Mich. 2008). The personal representative of an arrestee's estate brought an action against a county and two employees of the jail where the arrestee died of heart failure. The arrestee had been brought to the jail on a bench warrant for failing to appear at a court proceeding. Two days after her admission she was found unresponsive in her cell and could not be revived. It was subsequently determined that she died of heart failure (ischemic cardiomyopathy). The defendants moved for summary judgment and the district court granted the motion. The court held that neither a jail interviewer, whose only contact with the arrestee was a classification interview lasting between five and fifteen minutes, nor a jail nurse, who first came into contact with the arrestee when she was summoned to assist in CPR and other efforts to revive the arrestee after she was found unresponsive in her jail cell, were deliberately indifferent to the arrestee's serious medical needs. According to the court, neither employee perceived a substantial risk to the arrestee's health and well-being and yet disregarded that risk, and any purported negligence in the interviewer's assessment of the arrestee's medical needs did not rise to the level of deliberate indifference. The court held that the conduct of the interviewer, whose only contact with the arrestee was a classification interview lasting between five and fifteen minutes, did not amount to "gross negligence" within the meaning of Michigan's governmental immunity statute, and therefore she was not liable for failing to secure immediate medical treatment for a condition that shortly would result in the arrestee's death. (Oakland County Jail, Michigan)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEPARATION
SEX OFFENDERS

Sain v. Wood, 512 F.3d 886 (7th Cir. 2008). A civilly-committed sex offender brought a § 1983 action alleging that his conditions of confinement violated his Fourteenth Amendment due process rights. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of some defendants and denied a motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity for the clinical director of a detention facility. The clinical director appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The court held that the district court did not commit plain error in assuming implicitly that the clinical director was entitled to assert qualified immunity as a state actor. The court held that the failure of the clinical director to transfer the offender to the newer, more comfortable and sanitary unit of the facility did not amount to deliberate indifference, even assuming that the director knew of the allegedly poor conditions of confinement that included cockroach infestations. The court noted that the director decided that a transfer would contravene the offender's treatment objectives because the rooms in the new unit were double occupancy. The court noted that the offender had refused to participate in sex offender treatment programs and he had a history of sexual aggression with other inmates. (Joliet Treatment and Detention Facility, Illinois Department of Human Services)

U.S. District Court RELIGION
TRANSFER

Shilling v. Crawford, 536 F.Supp.2d 1227 (D.Nev. 2008). A Washington prisoner who was being housed in Nevada brought an action against prison officials, claiming violation of his rights under the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA). The district court granted the officials' motion for summary judgment. The court held that prison authorities imposed a substantial burden on the prisoner's religious beliefs when they conditioned the prisoner's receipt of a kosher meal on his relinquishment of the benefits of living in a lower-security facility. But the court held that even if the prisoner could bring an individual capacity claim against prison officials under RLUIPA, the officials would be entitled to qualified immunity since it would not have been clear to a reasonable official in April 2004 that offering the prisoner a transfer to a higher security prison to accommodate his religious diet would violate his rights under RLUIPA. (High Desert State Prison, Nevada, and Washington Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
SEPARATION

Stanko v. Patton, 568 F.Supp.2d 1061 (D.Neb. 2008). A pretrial detainee brought two actions against jail personnel alleging a number of constitutional violations. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants. The court noted that the detainee "...is a white supremacist. He is also a prolific pro se litigator who makes a habit of suing jail and prison officials when he is charged with a crime. Those facts are central to understanding these related civil cases." The court held that the detainee's alleged belief in the Church of the Creator and "White Man's Bible" was not protected and the jail had valid reasons for denying the detainee's alleged religious dietary requests. The court found that there was no evidence that jail employees were aware of facts from which an inference could be drawn that the detainee faced a serious risk of harm by being celled with killers, robbers, and psychopaths, or that they actually drew such an inference, as required to establish deliberate indifference. (Douglas County Correctional Center, Nebraska)

2009

U.S. District Court
SUICIDE

Cuebas v. Davila, 618 F.Supp.2d 124 (D.Puerto Rico 2009). The mother of a man who committed suicide in a jail cell filed a § 1983 action on behalf of herself, her minor daughter, and her deceased son, claiming deprivation of constitutional rights by the arresting police officers and their supervisors, and seeking compensatory damages for pain and suffering due to the loss of her mentally ill son. The district court dismissed the case in part, and declined to dismiss in part. The court held that the mother, as sole heir of her deceased son, under Puerto Rico law, had Article III standing to bring a § 1983 suit on behalf of her son against the police officers and supervisors for alleged constitutional violations, since the mother inherited her son's cause of action. The court found that the mother's allegations that arresting officers and their superiors were deliberately indifferent to her son's risk of suicide in his jail cell following his arrest were sufficient to state a § 1983 claim that the son's due process rights were violated under the Fourteenth Amendment. The court held that the mother's allegations that the police officer in charge of detainees was deliberately indifferent to her son's risk of suicide were factually sufficient to state a § 1983 claim that the officer violated her son's due process rights, including allegations that the officer was aware of the likelihood that the arrestee might commit suicide, and that the officer did not take obvious steps to prevent the arrestee's suicide. The mother had explained to the officers that her son was mentally ill and that he had recently attempted suicide. The son was placed in a cell after his shoes and belt had been removed. At some point during that night he committed suicide. The mother alleged that he was not properly monitored while being held in custody, as he should have been, by the officers who were aware he was suicidal. She alleged that his cell was not adequately monitored even though the police officers who arrested him and who monitored him knew that he was mentally ill and had recently attempted suicide. (Puerto Rico Police Department, Salinas Police Headquarters)

U.S. District Court
CLASSIFICATION
CRITERIA
POLICY/PROCEDURE

Estate of Gaither ex rel. Gaither v. District of Columbia, 655 F.Supp.2d 69 (D.D.C. 2009). The personal representative of the estate of a prisoner, who was killed while incarcerated, brought a § 1983 action against the District of Columbia and several individual officials and jail employees, alleging negligence, deliberate and reckless indifference to allegedly dangerous conditions at a jail, and wrongful death. The district court granted summary judgment in part and denied in part. The court found that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to: (1) whether the District of Columbia's inmate and detainee classification policies, procedures, and practices were inadequate; (2) whether the District of Columbia's jail staffing policies, procedures, and practices were inadequate; (3) whether the security policies, procedures, and practices were inadequate; (4) whether the District of Columbia adequately trained Department of Corrections officials; and (5) whether officials provided adequate supervision of inmates. (District of Columbia Central Detention Facility)

U.S. District Court
LIBERTY INTEREST
SEX OFFENDERS

Gilmore v. Bostic, 636 F.Supp.2d 496 (S.D.W.Va. 2009). A state prison inmate brought an action against a probation officer, the state parole board, and state correctional facility employees, asserting that his constitutional rights were violated by allegedly false information in his presentence report for a burglary conviction and in the prison file which resulted in the inmate's classification in the state penal system at a higher level than was appropriate and in a sex offender designation. The district court held that: (1) the board was entitled to absolute immunity; (2) employees were not liable in their official capacities on claims for compensatory relief but the employees sued in their individual capacities were liable; (3) the inmate stated a violation of a protected liberty interest in parole release under the state constitution; (4) the inmate stated a claim under the state constitution for violation of a protected liberty interest in not being required to undergo sex offender treatment; and (5) the inmate adequately alleged a physical injury required to recover for mental or emotional injury. (Kanawha County Adult Probation Department, West Virginia Board of Probation and Parole, Huttonsville Correctional Center, West Virginia)

U.S. District Court
LOWER BUNK

Goodson v. Willard Drug Treatment Campus, 615 F.Supp.2d 100 (W.D.N.Y. 2009). A state prisoner filed a pro se § 1983 action against prison officials and a prison's drug treatment facility, claiming violation of his rights under the Eighth Amendment and the Equal Protection Clause. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants. The court held that the prison's assignment of the prisoner to a top bunk from which he fell and was injured while confined in the prison's drug treatment facility, where he was sent for medical reasons relating to a herniated disc in his lower back, did not deprive the prisoner of his Eighth Amendment right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment. The court noted that the prisoner did not have a serious medical need for a lower bunk, and the prison did not make the top bunk assignment in deliberate indifference to the prisoner's medical needs. (Willard Drug Treatment Campus, New York State Department of Correctional Services)

U.S. Appeals Court
LOWER BUNK

Griffin v. Arpaio, 557 F.3d 1117 (9th Cir. 2009). A state inmate brought a § 1983 action against a county sheriff and others, alleging cruel and unusual punishment and unsafe living conditions based on their failure to assign him a lower bunk for medical reasons. The defendants moved to dismiss for failure to exhaust administrative remedies under the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA). The district court granted the motion and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed. Although the court found that a prison grievance need only alert the prison to the nature of the wrong for which redress is sought and the inmate's failure to grieve deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs did not invalidate his exhaustion attempt, the inmate did not properly exhaust administrative remedies under PLRA. The court held that the inmate's grievance regarding his need for a lower bunk assignment did not provide sufficient notice of the staff's alleged disregard of his lower bunk assignments to allow officials to take appropriate responsive measures, as required to properly exhaust administrative remedies under the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) before he brought a § 1983 action. The officials responding to the inmate's grievance reasonably concluded that a nurse's order for a lower bunk assignment solved the inmate's problem. (Maricopa County Sheriff, Arizona)

U.S. District Court
DUE PROCESS
EQUAL PROTECTION
LIBERTY INTEREST
POLICY/PROCEDURE
TRANSFER

Holland v. Taylor, 604 F.Supp.2d 692 (D.Del. 2009). A state prisoner brought a pro se § 1983 action against a Department of Correction (DOC) and DOC officials, alleging violations of his constitutional rights to equal protection and due process, deliberate indifference, cruel and unusual punishment, and false imprisonment. The prisoner moved to appoint counsel, and the defendants brought a renewed motion for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion for summary judgment and denied the motion to appoint counsel. The court found that neither Delaware law nor Delaware Department of Correction regulations create a liberty interest, the denial of which would constitute a due process violation, in a prisoner's classification within an institution. The court found that the state prisoner had no constitutionally protected right to work release, and thus, neither the alleged failure of a multi-disciplinary team (MDT) member to inform the inmate of a disciplinary review meeting regarding his alleged work release program violation, nor the prisoner's transfer following completion of the sentence imposed in connection with the disciplinary meeting, to another facility to await return to the work-release facility, violated the prisoner's due process rights, absent any atypical or significant hardship by being housed at the other facility as compared to a work-release facility. (Delaware Correctional Center)

U.S. District Court
PROTECTIVE CUSTODY

Houseknecht v. Doe, 653 F.Supp.2d 547 (E.D.Pa. 2009). An inmate brought an action against current and former deputy wardens alleging they violated his right to freely exercise his religion under the First Amendment. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the restriction of the inmate's religious rights due to his election to enter into protective custody, under which there were no formal religious ceremonies or formal classes similar to those provided to general population inmates, was rationally related to legitimate penological interest in maintaining security and order, and thus did not violate inmate's First Amendment right to free exercise of religion. According to the court, it was reasonable for an inmate who opted for more protective conditions to enjoy fewer amenities. The court noted that the inmate had regular communication with a chaplain who regularly brought reading materials to the inmates in protective custody, and the inmate was not prevented from sitting with other inmates and doing his own Bible study in the unit day room. The court held that it could not require the prison to permit inmates in protective custody to attend formal gatherings with other inmates, given the purpose of protective custody to segregate inmates who believed that other inmates posed a danger to them, and the provision of additional reading materials or access to additional religious media programming could likely not be accomplished without significant cost. The court found that the Inmate's religious exercise was not substantially burdened by his election to enter into protective custody, under which there were no formal religious ceremonies or formal classes similar to those provided to general population inmates, as required to establish a violation of the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA). The court found that there was no suggestion that prison officials placed substantial pressure on the inmate to substantially modify his behavior or to violate his beliefs, he was not forced to choose between following the precepts of his religion and forfeiting benefits otherwise generally available to other inmates, and he acknowledged that he received and read the inmate handbook, which advised that protective custody carried with it restrictions on religious access. (Berks County Prison, Pennsylvania)

U.S. Appeals Court
CLASSIFICATION
CRITERIA
SEPARATION

Moyle v. Anderson, 571 F.3d 814 (8th Cir. 2009). The son of an inmate murdered in a county jail, and the son's trustee, brought a § 1983 action against a county, seeking damages for the murder of the son's father based on the county's booking policy. The district court granted the county's motion for summary judgment and the son appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the county's booking policy, classifying an incoming inmate as high or low risk after an intake interview, and then housing those incoming inmates designated as high risk in a separate area of the jail, was not itself unconstitutional, so as to establish the county's municipal liability under § 1983 for the murder of an inmate killed by another inmate. The inmate who murdered the plaintiff's father had been transferred from a maximum security state prison and had previously attacked a fellow inmate. The policy vested discretion in the booking officer to determine whether additional information about an inmate's criminal or incarceration history was necessary and whether the inmate posed a risk to others and needed to be placed in a separate unit. According to the court, there was no evidence that the county had notice of an alleged inadequacy in its booking policy, or that the policy's alleged inadequacy in failing to require officers to seek information about an incoming individual's history for violence prior to classification was so patently obvious that the county should have known that a constitutional violation was inevitable, as required to impose § 1983 liability on county, based on deliberate indifference. The father was arrested for having no proof of auto insurance and was placed in a cell in the Alpha Intake Unit (AIU) after it was determined that he would be unable to go before a county judge that day. When the inmate who murdered the father arrived at the jail, he was booked by a county corrections officer under the booking policy at the time that required the officer to ask an arriving inmate several questions, to observe the inmate's demeanor, to review any additional information provided about the inmate, and then to classify the inmate as either high or low risk. Under the policy, if there was no information provided about the inmate's previous history, the policy did not require the officer to seek such information. Incoming inmates classified as low risk, including those transferred from other correctional facilities, were placed in the AIU for a 72 hour observation period, after which their classification was reviewed. If classified as high risk, inmates were placed in a separate housing unit. The booking officer was unaware that the prison inmate had been in segregation 23 hours a day at a high security prison, that he had a history of mental illness, and that the assault related to his court appearance had been an unprovoked, violent attack on a fellow inmate. The officer classified him as low risk, based on the information she had and the inmate's calm, polite demeanor during the booking process. (Sherburne County Jail, Minnesota)

U.S. Appeals Court
FAILURE TO PROTECT
SEPARATION

Norman v. Schuetzle, 585 F.3d 1097 (8th Cir. 2009). A prisoner brought a § 1983 claim against various prison officials for their alleged failure to protect him from an attack by a fellow inmate. The district court granted qualified immunity to all but four officials. The four officials appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The appeals court held that: (1) the warden did not violate the Eighth Amendment rights of the prisoner when an inmate with a violent history was allowed to remain in the general population after an incident in which he cut a "C" into the prisoner's hair to identify him as child molester while performing a haircut; (2) the first case worker did not violate the prisoner's Eighth Amendment rights when he failed to take additional security measures; (3) the second worker did not violate the prisoner's Eighth Amendment rights when she did nothing after seeing a logbook entry; and (4) it was not clearly established that the director's actions of allowing other inmates to view complaints would unreasonably subject the prisoner to a threat of substantial harm. (North Dakota State Penitentiary)

U.S. Appeals Court RELIGION
SEGREGATION

Sossamon v. Lone Star State of Texas, 560 F.3d 316 (5th Cir. 2009). A prison inmate brought a civil rights action challenging prison officials' refusal to allow him to participate in religious services while he was on cell restriction, and refusal to make a chapel available for religious services due to security concerns allegedly presented by holding such services in the chapel. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants and the inmate appealed. The appeals court dismissed as moot in part, reversed in part, affirmed in part and remanded. The court held that the state-wide cessation, in all correctional facilities in Texas, of the policy of preventing general-population prisoners on cell restriction from attending religious services had the effect of mooted the civil rights claim. The court found that the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA) did not create an individual-capacity cause of action in favor of the prison inmate against prison officials who had denied him access to a prison chapel. According to the court, RLUIPA did not provide clear notice that, by accepting federal funds, the state was waiving its sovereign immunity from liability for such monetary damages. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact on the inmate's claims for injunctive relief challenging the denial of access to a chapel. The inmate alleged that his exercise of religion was substantially burdened because he could not use the prison chapel where he could kneel in front of an altar in view of a cross, and due to his being able to attend religious services only at other locations in the prison that were not specifically designed for Christian worship. (Robertson Unit of the Texas Department of Criminal Justice, Correctional Institutions Division)

U.S. District Court
HANDICAP

Thomas v. Pennsylvania Dept. of Corr., 615 F.Supp.2d 411 (W.D.Pa. 2009). A state prison inmate who was an above-the-knee amputee brought a § 1983 action against the Pennsylvania Department of Corrections and individual corrections officials and medical personnel, alleging that denial of his request for a handicap cell, and the delay in replacing and inadequate replacement of his prosthesis, violated the Eighth Amendment, Rehabilitation Act, Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), and state law. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants. The court found that there was no evidence that state corrections officials were aware that the amputee prisoner was at risk of assault at the hands of fellow inmates due to the denial of his request for a handicap cell, as required to support the prisoner's Eighth Amendment failure-to-protect claim against officials. Except for a single reference to an altercation with a fellow prisoner, the prisoner's requests for a handicap cell included no indication that the prisoner was concerned about being attacked, only that he was having difficulty moving about in a standard cell. According to the court, the state medical personnel's denial of the amputee prisoner's requests for a handicap cell did not amount to deliberate indifference to the prisoner's medical needs in violation of the Eighth Amendment. Each request for a handicap cell was reviewed, but a determination was made that since the prisoner ambulated well with crutches and subsequently was fitted with a prosthesis, a handicap cell was medically unnecessary. The court found that the prisoner's disagreement with that determination did not render it deliberate indifference. (State Correctional Institution at Camp Hill, State Correctional Institution at Houtzdale, Pennsylvania)

U.S. District Court
RECLASSIFICATION
SECURITY
CLASSIFICATION
TRANSFER

U.S. v. Rojas-Yepes, 630 F.Supp.2d 18 (D.D.C. 2009). A prisoner who was being held in a medium-security facility after his extradition from Colombia and who was pending trial, moved to modify his jail conditions after the Department of Corrections (DOC) received a copy of the indictment and he was therefore reclassified as a "maximum custody" prisoner and placed in a special management unit (SMU) pending his transfer to a maximum-security facility. The district court denied the motion. The court held that the prisoner's claim for modification of his jail conditions would be construed as a habeas petition. The court found that the prisoner lacked a property or liberty interest in his classification and placement. The court noted that classification was not a fixed entitlement, but rather was revisited every 90 days based on changed conditions and new facts. According to the court, the DOC did not violate the prisoner's equal protection rights by reclassifying him, where the prisoner was reclassified based, not on national origin, but rather on the nature of the charges against him and how much power and influence he was alleged to have within the charged drug-trafficking conspiracy. The court found that the DOC's classification procedures were rationally related to a legitimate interest in maintaining order and safety in detention facilities. (Correctional Treatment Facility, District of Columbia Jail)

2010

U.S. Appeals Court
SUICIDE
FAILURE TO PROTECT

Clouthier v. County of Contra Costa, 591 F.3d 1232 (9th Cir. 2010). The estate of a pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against a county, mental health specialist, and two sheriff's deputies alleging they violated the detainee's due process rights by failing to prevent his suicide while he was confined. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants and the estate appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The court held that the estate had to show that the detainee was confined under conditions posing a substantial risk of serious harm and that correction officers were deliberately indifferent to that risk. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the mental health specialist at the jail, who was on notice of the pretrial detainee's suicidal condition, was deliberately indifferent to a substantial risk of harm to the detainee when she removed the detainee from an observation log and told deputies that the detainee could be given regular clothes and bedding. According to the court, it was clearly established at the time of detention that a reasonable mental health professional would not have removed key suicide prevention measures put in place by a prior mental health staff member, and therefore the specialist was not entitled to qualified immunity. The court found that the estate failed to establish that a sheriff's deputy at the jail knew that moving the detainee to the general population in the jail posed a substantial risk of serious harm to the detainee, where the deputy only knew that the detainee had missed meals and free time, and that the detainee had been taken off an observation log. The court noted that the deputy spoke to the detainee all weekend and noted he had a positive outlook on wanting to get out of the room, and earlier that day the mental health specialist found that the detainee was not actively suicidal at the time. The court held that the estate failed to establish that another sheriff's deputy knew that the detainee was suicidal and deliberately ignored that risk, where the deputy knew only that the detainee was suicidal and needed to be on 15-minute checks and the mental health specialist told the deputy to give the detainee his regular clothes and bedding. The court noted that nothing indicated that the deputy saw the detainee's knotted sheet. According to the court, the county did not have a longstanding custom or practice of moving pretrial detainees from an observation cell into the general population without consultation with mental health staff, or a longstanding practice of miscommunication between mental health staff and custodial staff. The court found no pattern of repeated wrongful conduct by county staff, and nothing that indicated another suicide resulted from the improper transfer of a detainee. (Contra Costa County Martinez Detention Facility, California)

U.S. District Court
DUE PROCESS
EQUAL PROTECTION
LENGTH OF SEGREGATION
LIBERTY INTEREST

Dodge v. Shoemaker, 695 F.Supp.2d 1127 (D.Colo. 2010). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action, proceeding in forma pauperis, against prison officials, alleging that she was raped by a lieutenant while incarcerated, and asserting various due process, equal protection, and Eighth Amendment violations. The officials moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the issue of whether the state prisoner's placement in administrative segregation for a period of one year violated her due process rights could not be determined at the motion to dismiss stage of the prisoner's § 1983 action against prison officials, because of a factual dispute as to whether the duration of confinement was atypical and significant. According to the court, the contours of constitutional law were sufficiently clear that the state prison officials were on notice that assignment of a prisoner to administrative segregation under conditions that imposed a significant and atypical hardship in relation to the ordinary incidents of prison life could give rise to a liberty interest protected by due process, and, thus, the officials were not entitled to qualified immunity in the prisoner's § 1983 action, with respect to her due process claim. (Denver Women's Correctional Facility, Colorado)

U.S. District Court
TRANSEXUAL

Fields v. Smith, 712 F.Supp.2d 830 (E.D.Wis. 2010). Wisconsin Department of Corrections (DOC) inmates, who were diagnosed with Gender Identity Disorder (GID), brought a § 1983 action against DOC officials, alleging, among other things, that the officials violated the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments by enforcing a statutory provision preventing DOC medical personnel from providing hormone therapy or sexual reassignment surgery to inmates with GID, and from evaluating inmates with GID for possible hormone therapy. The inmates sought a permanent injunction barring enforcement of the statute against them and other inmates. The court held that: (1) GID or transsexualism was a "serious medical need" for the purposes of the Eighth Amendment; (2) as matter of first impression, enforcement of the statute against the inmates violated the Eighth Amendment; (3) as matter of first impression, the statute was facially unconstitutional under the Eighth Amendment; (4) the possibility that certain inmates seeking treatment for gender issues might have had conditions not requiring hormone therapy did not repel a facial challenge to the statute; and (5) as matter of first impression, the statute violated the Equal Protection Clause both as applied to the inmates and on its face. The district court granted the motion, issuing a "...permanent injunction that restrains the defendants from enforcing or attempting to enforce the provisions of Wis. Stat. § 302.386(5m), by direct, indirect or other means, against any prisoner to whom the statute would otherwise apply and specifically against the plaintiffs." (Wisconsin Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
DUE PROCESS
LENGTH OF SEGREGATION
LIBERTY INTEREST
POLICY/PROCEDURE
PRETRIAL DETAINEES
PUNITIVE SEGREGATION
RECLASSIFICATION

Ford v. Clarke, 746 F.Supp.2d 273 (D.Mass. 2010). An inmate brought an action challenging his confinement in a Departmental Disciplinary Unit (DDU) at a prison while a pretrial detainee and, later, as a convicted felon serving his sentence. The Department of Corrections' employees filed a motion for summary judgment, which the court allowed in part and denied in part. The court held that the detainee's incarceration in the DDU was intended as punishment, and thus, the Department of Corrections violated the detainee's substantive due process rights. According to the court, the Deputy Commissioner of the Prison Division of Department of Corrections stated, when he placed the pretrial detainee in DDU after his criminal sentence had been completed, that it was meant as punishment and deterrence, as well as for the safety and security of the institution and staff. The detainee's confinement in DDU was imposed as part of 10-year disciplinary sanction that he had received while serving his prior criminal sentence, and the Commissioner never reassessed the detainee's threat to the institution or others, but, instead relied on conduct which had occurred years earlier. According to the court, the detainee retained a liberty interest in freedom from disciplinary confinement without due process, even after he pled guilty and was sentenced, and thus, the Deputy Commissioner of Correction's failure to provide the detainee with any procedural protections at the time he was returned to DDU as a pretrial detainee, or at the time he was placed in the DDU as a convicted prisoner, violated his procedural due process rights. (Departmental Disciplinary Unit MCI-Cedar Junction, Massachusetts)

U.S. District Court
DUE PROCESS
LIBERTY INTEREST
TRANSFER

Hawkins v. Brooks, 694 F.Supp.2d 434 (W.D.Pa. 2010.) A state prisoner brought a pro se § 1983 action against various prison officials and corrections officers, alleging retaliation, harassment, due process violations, defamation of character, and mental anguish. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the prisoner's conduct of pressing charges against a corrections officer who the prisoner claimed raped and impregnated her and complaining about other officers' alleged harassment amounted to a "constitutionally protected activity," as required for the prisoner to state a § 1983 retaliation claim. The court found that corrections officers' alleged conduct of withholding the prisoner's incoming and outgoing mail in retaliation for the prisoner's pressing rape charges against an officer at another prison amounted to an "adverse action," as required to establish a prima facie pro se § 1983 retaliation claim against the officers. But the court found that a prison official's alleged conduct of reassigning the prisoner to a different unit in the same prison did not rise to the level of an "adverse action," as required to establish a prima facie pro se § 1983 retaliation claim. The court found that the prisoner had no liberty interest in her place of confinement, transfer, or classification, and thus, prison officials' alleged refusal to have the prisoner transferred to an out-of-state institution did not violate her due process rights. The court found that the prisoner's assertions that she made supervisory prison officials aware of the harassment and retaliation she allegedly suffered at the hands of correctional officers as a result of her pressing rape charges against a correctional officer at another facility, and that none of the supervisory officials offered assistance or took any corrective action, were sufficient to state a claim for supervisory liability, in her § 1983 retaliation action. (State Correctional Institution at Cambridge Springs, Pennsylvania)

U.S. District Court
CLASSIFICATION
CRITERIA
SEGREGATION
RELIGION

Indreland v. Yellowstone County Bd. of Comr's, 693 F.Supp.2d 1230 (D.Mont. 2010). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against a county board of commissioners and prison officials, alleging, among other things, that the defendants' actions, including denying him access to satanic materials and holding him in maximum security, interfered with his free exercise of religion in violation of First Amendment and Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA). The court held that prison officials' denial of access to his satanic medallion did not interfere with his free exercise of religion in violation of First Amendment and RLUIPA, where the officials had a legitimate penological interest in denying the prisoner a chain that the officials believed could be used to strangle another inmate. According to the court, prison officials segregated the prisoner because he was involved in fights with other inmates, and not solely on account of his alleged satanic religion, and thus the prisoner's segregation did not interfere with his free exercise of religion in violation of First Amendment and RLUIPA. The court held that the county detention facility was not required under the First Amendment or RLUIPA to purchase religious materials for the prisoner at its own expense. But the court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the prison chaplain was working in conjunction with prison staff to deny the prisoner, who claimed to practice satanism, his free exercise of religion, and therefore, whether the chaplain was state actor. (Yellowstone County Detention Facility, Montana)

U.S. District Court
FAILURE TO PROTECT

Jackson v. Stevens, 694 F.Supp.2d 1334 (M.D.Ga. 2010.) An inmate brought a § 1983 suit against a prison official asserting an Eighth Amendment deliberate indifference claim. The official moved for summary judgment and the district court denied the motion. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the prison official had subjective knowledge of a serious risk of harm to the inmate from a second inmate, whom the official heard say that he would try to kill or harm the first inmate if they were put in a cell together, and whether the official disregarded the risk when she admonished the second inmate before placing him in a cell with the first inmate. Immediately after the official closed the cell door, the second inmate immediately hit the inmate. (Washington State Prison)

U.S. Appeals Court
PRETRIAL DETAINEE
SOLITARY
CONFINEMENT

Johnston v. Maha, 606 F.3d 39 (2nd Cir. 2010). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against employees of a county jail, alleging violations of his constitutional rights and of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) in connection with detention and medical care while in jail. The district court granted the defendants summary judgment. The inmate petitioned for the appointment of counsel in his appeal. The appeals court granted the petition. The court held that the appointment of counsel was appropriate in connection with the inmate's appeal from dismissal of his claim that his placement in solitary confinement, and subsequent excessive force he suffered, violated his constitutional rights, since there was likely merit in the inmate's claims. The court found that it appeared from the inmate's complaint that he might have been a pretrial detainee at the time he was placed in solitary confinement, and thus the claim that the inmate was subjected to excessive force as a detainee would arise under the Fifth, not the Eighth Amendment, because as a detainee he could not be punished at all. The court noted that there was no evidence that the inmate violated any rule or was provided with a pre-deprivation hearing. According to the court, the legal issues were fairly complex, especially with respect to whether the inmate's pretrial detention was substantial enough to give rise to a constitutional violation of a procedural due process right. (Genesee County Jail, New York).

U.S. District Court
CLASSIFICATION
HANDICAPPED INMATES
HARASSMENT
MEDICAL CARE
WORK

Jones v. Michigan, 698 F.Supp.2d 905 (E.D.Mich. 2010). A state inmate brought a § 1983 action against a state correctional facility's classification director and a correction officer. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The court held that the inmate's grievance against the classification director and correction officer gave fair notice of his claim that he was harassed and forced to perform work as a sports equipment handler, despite fact that he was wearing a neck brace and walking with a cane due to injuries arising from an automobile accident. But the court found that the correction officer was not deliberately indifferent to the inmate's injuries, in violation of the Eighth Amendment, where the officer was never told by the inmate that he could not perform work duties as a sports equipment handler. Similarly, the classification director was not deliberately indifferent to the inmate's injuries, in violation of the Eighth Amendment, where the director was never advised of an accommodation notice or of the physician's diagnoses that the inmate could not perform work duties. (Saginaw Correctional Facility, Michigan)

U.S. District Court
WORK

Lymon v. Aramark Corp., 728 F.Supp.2d 1222 (D.N.M. 2010). A former state prisoner brought an action against the New Mexico Department of Corrections (NMDOC), its secretary, prison officers, the private company that managed a prison kitchen, and two of the company's employees, alleging various constitutional claims and negligence under the New Mexico Tort Claims Act (NMTCA). The prisoner had sustained injuries from work he was required to perform in a kitchen, and he made allegations about the injuries and his subsequent treatment. The state defendants moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion. The court held that no New Mexico Department of Corrections (NMDOC) policy or regulation made any provision for the state prisoner's liberty interest in a labor assignment or otherwise provided the prisoner with protection from corrections officers ordering him to perform work in a prison kitchen or protection from orders in contravention of a medical order. The court ruled that the prisoner's § 1983 procedural due process claim arising from injuries he allegedly sustained while performing kitchen work was precluded. According to the court, corrections officers' alleged misclassification and denial of a grievance process did not rise to the degree of outrageousness, or the magnitude of potential or actual harm, that was truly conscience-shocking, precluding the state prisoner's § 1983 substantive due process claims. The court noted that the state prisoner made no allegation that he contracted any disease while working in the prison kitchen, but only that he suffered a shoulder injury as the result of a heavy-lifting component of his work, thus precluding his § 1983 unconstitutional conditions claim against the New Mexico Department of Corrections (NMDOC) and its secretary. The court held that the prisoner did not personally suffer any injury as a result of a corrections officer's classification of prisoners for work duty, purportedly assigning inmates with known transmissible diseases to kitchen work, precluding the prisoner's claim for an alleged violation of federal public health policy. (Aramark Corporation, Central New Mexico Correctional Facility)

U.S. Appeals Court
RACIAL
DISCRIMINATION

Richardson v. Runnels, 594 F.3d 666 (9th Cir. 2010). An African-American state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against a prison warden and correctional officers, among others, alleging that he was subjected to racial discrimination during prison lockdowns, and that the defendants were deliberately indifferent to his need to exercise, in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The district court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part and reversed in part. The district court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether reasonable men and women could differ regarding the necessity of state prison officials' racial classification in response to prison disturbances that were believed to have been perpetrated or planned by prisoners who were African-American, and whether the officials' lockdown of all African-American prisoners in the unit containing high-risk prisoners following disturbances was narrowly tailored to further a compelling government interest. The court also found that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether state prison officials were deliberately indifferent to the need for exercise of a prisoner who was subjected to prison lockdowns. (High Desert State Prison, California)

U.S. District Court
CELL ASSIGNMENT
LOWER BUNK

Robinson v. Catlett, 725 F.Supp.2d 1203 (S.D.Cal. 2010). A state inmate filed a § 1983 action against prison officials alleging constitutional violations and violations of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) and the Rehabilitation Act. The officials moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The court held that the decision to assign the inmate to an upper bunk did not demonstrate deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs. The court noted that the inmate requested a vacant cell, rather than a lower bunk assignment, and officials assigned the inmate to a lower bunk once they understood problem. The court held the confiscation of the inmate's cane did not demonstrate deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs and did not violate the Rehabilitation Act. The cane was confiscated after the inmate attempted to strike another prisoner with it. The court found that prison officials' denial of the disabled inmate's request for his own cell did not amount to intentional discrimination on the basis of a disability, required to warrant the award of monetary damages under ADA or the Rehabilitation Act, even though officials had initially placed the inmate in an upper bunk. (Calipatria State Prison, California)

U.S. District Court
CELL ASSIGNMENT
DUE PROCESS
FAILURE TO PROTECT
MENTALLY ILL
SUICIDE

Silvera v. Connecticut Dept. of Corrections, 726 F.Supp.2d 183 (D.Conn. 2010). The representative of a pretrial detainee's estate filed a § 1983 action alleging that state prison officials' decision to house the detainee with a convicted inmate and their failure to provide adequate mental health care caused the detainee's suicide death. The officials moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that allegations that prison medical staff ignored abundant evidence demonstrating that the pretrial detainee was an acute suicide risk were sufficient to state a claim of deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs, in violation of the Due Process Clause. The court noted that evidence included a judge's instructions to keep him on suicide watch, the detainee's prior medical records, contemporaneous complaints and behavior, and examinations by medical staff, all of whom concluded that the detainee suffered from severe mental health issues. Nonetheless, officials placed him in a cell by himself, rather than in specialized housing, with access to materials with which he could hang himself, failed to check on him regularly, and ignored signs that his mental condition had deteriorated. The court found that a state prison supervisor was not liable under § 1983 for the pretrial detainee's suicide death, even if the supervisor had some training with regards to caring for mentally ill detainees, and his subordinates failed to properly oversee the detainee's activities. The court noted that the detainee was placed in the general prison population based on a mental health professional's recommendation, the supervisor was not aware that the detainee posed an excessive risk of suicide, and subordinates were given proper orders to keep the detainee under constant surveillance and interact with him at frequent, irregular intervals. The court described the change in the detainee's conditions of confinement prior to his suicide. "Inmates housed in the Charlie Unit—apparently unlike those in the specialized housing unit where Mr. Lyle was held from May 11 until May 15—have the ability to turn the cell's lights on and off at will. Additionally, the Charlie Unit has bunk-style beds, which are outfitted with standard-issue sheets and pillow case—both of which would play a role in Mr. Lyle's suicide. Once transferred to the Charlie Unit, Mr. Lyle was given standard DOC clothing, whereas previously he had been given only a 'suicide gown.'" According to the court, the pretrial detainee's right to due process was not violated merely because he was forced to share a cell with a convicted prisoner, absent an allegation that the detainee suffered an injury from being housed with a convicted inmate, or that placement with the convicted inmate was intended to punish the detainee. (Garner Corr'l Institute, Conn.)

2011

U.S. District Court
CLASSIFICATION
CRITERIA
DUE PROCESS
LIBERTY INTEREST
RECLASSIFICATION

Aref v. Holder, 774 F.Supp.2d 147 (D.D.C. 2011). A group of prisoners who were, or who had been, incarcerated in communication management units (CMU) at federal correctional institutions (FCI) designed to monitor high-risk prisoners filed suit against the United States Attorney General, the federal Bureau of Prisons (BOP), and BOP officials, alleging that CMU incarceration violated the First, Fifth, and Eighth Amendments. Four additional prisoners moved to intervene and the defendants moved to dismiss. The district court denied the motion to intervene, and granted the motion to dismiss in part and denied in part. The court held that even though a federal prisoner who had been convicted of solicitation of bank robbery was no longer housed in the federal prison's communication management unit (CMU), he had standing under Article III to pursue constitutional claims against the Bureau of Prisons (BOP) for alleged violations since there was a realistic threat that he might be redesignated to a CMU. The court noted that the prisoner had originally been placed in CMU because of the nature of his underlying conviction and because of his alleged efforts to radicalize other inmates, and these reasons for placing him in CMU remained. The court found that the restrictions a federal prison put on prisoners housed within a communication management unit (CMU), which included that all communications be conducted in English, that visits were monitored and subject to recording, that each prisoner received only eight visitation hours per month, and that prisoners' telephone calls were limited and subjected to monitoring, did not violate the prisoners' alleged First Amendment right to family integrity, since the restrictions were rationally related to a legitimate penological interest. The court noted that prisoners assigned to the unit typically had offenses related to international or domestic terrorism or had misused approved communication methods while incarcerated. The court found that prisoners confined to a communication management unit (CMU), stated a procedural due process claim against the Bureau of Prisons (BOP) by alleging that the requirements imposed on CMU prisoners were significantly different than those imposed on prisoners in the general population, and that there was a significant risk that procedures used by the BOP to review whether prisoners should initially be placed within CMU or should continue to be incarcerated there had resulted in erroneous deprivation of their liberty interests. The court noted that CMU prisoners were allowed only eight hours of non-contact visitation per month and two 15 minute telephone calls per week, while the general population at a prison was not subjected to a cap on visitation and had 300 minutes of telephone time per month. The court also noted that the administrative review of CMU status, conducted by officials in Washington, D.C., rather than at a unit itself, was allegedly so vague and generic as to render it illusory. (Communication Management Units at Federal Correctional Institutions in Terre Haute, Indiana and Marion, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
CUSTODY LEVEL
DUE PROCESS

Baggett v. Keller, 796 F.Supp.2d 718 (E.D.N.C. 2011). State prisoners, who were each convicted of first-degree murder and sentenced to life imprisonment, petitioned for federal habeas relief on the ground that their accrued good time, gain time, and merit time credits entitled them to unconditional release. The district court dismissed the petitions. The court held that the decision to withhold application of credits from the calculation of the date for unconditional release did not violate the prisoners' due process rights. The court noted that the credits were solely for the purpose of allowing prisoners serving life sentences to move to less restrictive custody grades, not for allowing unconditional release. The court held that the decision did not violate the Ex Post Facto Clause, where the DOC never promulgated a regulation under state law shortening or modifying prisoner's sentences and never applied sentence reduction credits toward calculating the date of their unconditional release. (North Carolina Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
GANGS
DUE PROCESS
EQUAL PROTECTION

Baker v. Kernan, 795 F.Supp.2d 992 (E.D.Cal. 2011). A state inmate filed a § 1983 action against a prison official alleging that a policy of separating members of rival prison gangs denied him equal protection, due process, and the right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment. The official moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The court held that the state's policy of separating members of rival prison gangs did not deny the inmate due process or violate his right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment, where the program was a rational response to a legitimate security concern, and it preserved the inmate's ability to exercise regularly outside, be considered for a job, use the facilities off the main yard, meet with a prison chaplain, and see visitors. The court also found that the state's classification of prisoners by their gang affiliation did not violate the inmate's equal protection rights, even if members of a larger gang fared slightly better in some aspects of confinement, where the classification was not based on race. The court noted that there was a long history of gang members immediately attacking members of rival gangs, and the policy of identifying and separating members of rival gangs advanced safety and order by preventing them from violently attacking each other. (California State Prison, Sacramento)

U.S. Appeals Court
CLASSIFICATION
FAILURE TO PROTECT

Bishop v. Hackel, 636 F.3d 757 (6th Cir. 2011). A jail inmate brought a § 1983 claim against deputies, alleging that he suffered sexual abuse by another inmate as the result of their deliberate indifference to his safety needs in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The district court denied the deputies' motion for summary judgment and the deputies appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part and reversed in part. The appeals court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the deputies' alleged failure to protect the inmate from sexual assault by another inmate was objectively serious. The court held that the deputy who processed the inmate through booking when he entered the jail and completed a referral form that scheduled the inmate for a mental health assessment did not subjectively ignore any risk to the inmate's safety, and thus was not deliberately indifferent to the inmate's safety needs, noting that the deputy had no further contact with the inmate. The court also found that a deputy who ordinarily worked road patrol, and worked in the jail only on the day that the inmate reported that he had been sexually assaulted by another inmate, did not subjectively ignore any risk to the inmate's safety, and thus was not deliberately indifferent to the inmate's safety needs in violation of the Eighth Amendment, where the deputy did not have sufficient contact with the inmate to permit the deputy to perceive his asserted status as a vulnerable inmate, or to observe his alleged altercations with the other inmate. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether one deputy, who was familiar with the inmate who reported the alleged sexual assault as well as the inmate who allegedly assaulted him, knew of the risk to inmate's safety because of his status as a vulnerable inmate and the other inmate's status as a predatory inmate, and as to whether the deputy knew of the risk to the inmate's safety based on noise generated by the alleged assaults. (Macomb County Jail, Michigan)

U.S. District Court
MENTALLY ILL
POLICY/PROCEDURE
PROTECTIVE CUSTODY
RECLASSIFICATION

Chess v. U.S., 836 F.Supp.2d 742 (N.D.Ill. 2011). An inmate who suffered personal injuries in an assault by a fellow inmate brought an action against the federal government under the Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA), alleging it failed to properly screen the fellow inmate upon intake and also failed to monitor him. The inmate had suffered second-degree burns when the other inmate threw a cup of scalding water onto his face and then physically assaulted him by hitting him with the cup and punching him. The parties cross-moved for summary judgment. The district court denied the plaintiff's motion, and granted the defendants' motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the government failed to comply with certain directives aimed at monitoring federal prisoners suffering from mental illness, for the purposes of its attempt to avoid liability to the federal inmate who suffered personal injuries in an assault by a fellow inmate under the discretionary function exception to the Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA) waiver of sovereign immunity. The court found that the inmate's claims relating to a corrections officer's alleged failure to monitor inmates during lockup were not barred by the Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA) discretionary function exception. According to the court, while there was a genuine issue of material fact as to whether Bureau of Prisons (BOP) officials complied with requirements to review the inmate's central file upon intake and to review the assaulting inmate's mental health on a monthly basis, the assaulted inmate failed to raise the issue for trial as to whether the Bureau's failure to review the assaulting inmate's central file proximately caused his injury. The court found that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact, as to whether, after his second placement, BOP officials knew or reasonably should have known that the inmate should have been segregated from the administrative population. The court also found genuine issues of material fact as to whether a correctional officer's alleged failure to monitor the unit at the time of the attack constituted negligence and proximately caused the attacked inmate's injuries. (Federal Bureau of Prisons, Metropolitan Correctional Center Chicago, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
FAILURE TO PROTECT
PRETRIAL DETAINEES
SEX OFFENDER

Holden v. Hirner, 663 F.3d 336 (8th Cir. 2011). A pretrial detainee filed a § 1983 action against officials of a county jail for allegedly violating his Fourteenth Amendment rights under the Due Process Clause by allegedly failing to protect him from an assault by three other inmates, and failing to provide adequate medical treatment for his tooth pain. The district court granted prison officials summary judgment and the detainee appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that there was no evidence that the pretrial detainee was incarcerated under conditions posing a substantial risk of serious harm in the protective custody pod in which the detainee was imprisoned as a sex offender, even though one of the assaulting inmates was involved in another fight four days before the altercation with the detainee. The court noted that the pod was designed to provide greater supervision and security for vulnerable inmates who were more likely to be assaulted, and nothing in the record established that the prior fight involved a sex offender. According to the court, even if the pretrial detainee faced a substantial risk of serious harm from other inmates in the protective custody pod, there was no evidence that officials at the county jail were deliberately indifferent to his safety, where the detainee did not tell officials that he felt threatened by other inmates, and the officials had no knowledge of any specific danger to the detainee in the pod. (Marion County Jail, Missouri)

U.S. Appeals Court
CUSTODY LEVEL
EQUAL PROTECTION

Milligan v. Archuleta, 659 F.3d 1294 (10th Cir. 2011). A state inmate filed a § 1983 action alleging that prison officials took away his prison employment in retaliation for his grievance regarding his designation as a potential escape risk, and in violation of his equal protection rights. The district court dismissed the complaint on its own motion and the inmate appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The appeals court held that the district court erred in dismissing the equal protection claim, even though the complaint was deficient because it did not plead facts sufficient to show that the inmate's classification as an escape risk lacked a rational basis or a reasonable relation to a legitimate penological interest. According to the court, amendment of the complaint would not necessarily be futile, and the claim was not based on an indisputably meritless legal theory. The court noted that the fact that the state inmate did not have a constitutional right to employment did not foreclose his retaliation claim against the prison official arising from loss of his prison job after he filed a grievance. (Colorado Territorial Correctional Facility)

U.S. Appeals Court
CELL ASSIGNMENT
DOUBLE CELLING

Murray v. Bledsoe, 650 F.3d 246 (3rd Cir. 2011). An inmate brought a pro se petition for judicial review of a decision of the Federal Bureau of Prisons (BOP) rejecting his claim that he had a right to choose his cellmate. The district court denied relief, and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the inmate had no Ninth Amendment right to choose his cellmate. (Special Management Unit, United States Penitentiary, Lewisburg, Pennsylvania)

U.S. District Court
DUE PROCESS
ISOLATION
JUVENILES
LIBERTY INTEREST
TRANSFER

Troy D. v. Mickens, 806 F.Supp.2d 758 (D.N.J. 2011). Two juvenile delinquents brought a § 1983 action against mental health providers and the New Jersey Juvenile Justice Commission (JJJ), alleging that the actions of the defendants while the delinquents were in custody violated the Fourteenth Amendment and New Jersey law. One of the plaintiffs was 15 years old when he was adjudicated as delinquent and remained in custody for a total of 225 days. For approximately 178 of those days, the delinquent was held in isolation under a special observation status requiring close or constant watch, purportedly for his own safety. Although the delinquents were placed in isolation for different reasons, the conditions they experienced were similar. Both delinquents were allegedly denied mental health treatment during their periods in isolation. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to: (1) whether the New Jersey Juvenile Justice Commission (JJJ) and mental health providers were deliberately indifferent towards conditions of confinement, in protecting and in providing medical care for the juvenile delinquent housed in JJJ facilities; (2) whether placing the juvenile delinquent housed in temporary close custody and special observation status implicated a liberty interest; (3) whether a juvenile delinquent housed in New Jersey Juvenile Justice Commission (JJJ) facilities had procedural due process protections available to him upon a change of status; (4) whether the juvenile delinquent had a liberty interest implicated in his transfer to a more restrictive placement; (5) whether the juvenile delinquent had sufficient procedural due process protections available to him upon transfer to a more restrictive placement; and (6) whether the New Jersey Juvenile Justice Commission (JJJ) and mental health providers acted with malice or reckless indifference. (New Jersey Juvenile Justice Commission, Juvenile Medium Security Facility, New Jersey Training School, Juvenile Reception and Assessment Center)

U.S. Appeals Court
LENGTH OF SEGREGATION
POLICY/PROCEDURE
DUE PROCESS

Williams v. Hobbs, 662 F.3d 994 (8th Cir. 2011). A state inmate brought a § 1983 action against deputy director of a department of correction and various wardens alleging that his approximately 14-year continuous detention in administrative segregation violated his procedural due process rights. Following a bench trial, the district court found that four of the five defendants had denied the inmate due process, awarded $4,846 in nominal damages, and denied punitive damages. Both parties appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The court held that the inmate's administrative segregation reviews were not meaningful under the due process clause. The court noted that one warden testified that the inmate's seven-years' worth of clean history was irrelevant to him, another warden confirmed that even if the inmate proved to be a model prisoner his vote would always be that the inmate remain in administrative segregation in light of his past transgressions, and the wardens failed to explain to the inmate with any specificity why he constituted a continuing threat to the security and good order of prison. The court found that the director conducted his review in a meaningful fashion. The court ruled that the inmate was not entitled to a per-day nominal damages award for each day spent in administrative segregation, and that the district court did not abuse its discretion by not awarding punitive damages. (Tucker Maximum Security Unit, Arkansas)

2012

U.S. Appeals Court
LOWER BUNK
CELL ASSIGNMENT
SPECIAL NEEDS

Akhtar v. Mesa, 698 F.3d 1202 (9th Cir. 2012). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against correctional officers, alleging deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs in connection with the officers' alleged failure to comply with the prisoner's medical orders, which required the prisoner to be housed in a ground floor cell. The district court dismissed the action and denied the prisoner's motion to alter or amend the judgment. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed and remanded. The court held that the district court abused its discretion by failing to consider arguments that directed the court to crucial facts showing he might have exhausted his administrative remedies, and in addition to being pro se, the prisoner was illiterate, disabled, and had limited English skills. The court found that the prisoner satisfied the administrative exhaustion requirement of the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) prior to filing his § 1983 action against the correctional officers, where the prisoner filed grievances addressing the officers' alleged failure to comply with medical orders several months before filing the complaint. The court held that the prisoner stated a § 1983 Eighth Amendment claim against correctional officers for deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs. The prisoner alleged that he suffered from numerous medical conditions and was hearing and mobility impaired, that his medical orders stated that the prisoner was mobility impaired and had housing restrictions requiring a lower bunk, no stairs, and no triple bunk, and that the correctional officers knew of those medical orders, but failed to comply with them. (Mule Creek State Prison, California)

U.S. District Court
DISCIPLINE
LIBERTY INTEREST

Brown v. Hannah, 850 F.Supp.2d 471 (M.D.Pa. 2012). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against prison officials, alleging violations of the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments. The officials filed a motion to dismiss and the district court granted the motion. The district court held that: (1) the inmate did not have a liberty interest in remaining free from disciplinary confinement; (2) placement in confinement was not an atypical and significant hardship; (3) the inmate did not have a constitutionally protected right in the prison setting to use inappropriate, disrespectful, and derogatory language to a prison official; (4) rejection of his grievance was not an attempt to frustrate his ability to pursue a lawsuit; and (5) allegations were insufficient to state a conspiracy claim. (State Correctional Institution, Huntingdon, Pennsylvania)

U.S. District Court
MENTALLY ILL
SUICIDE
SEGREGATION

Disability Law Center v. Massachusetts Dept. of Correction, 960 F.Supp.2d 271 (D.Mass. 2012). A nonprofit organization, which represented mentally ill prisoners, brought an action against a state's Department of Correction, alleging that the Department and its officials violated the federal constitutional rights of prisoners by subjecting them to disciplinary and other forms of segregation for prolonged periods of time. After extensive negotiations, the parties jointly moved for approval of a settlement agreement. The district court granted the motion, finding the agreement to be fair, reasonable, and adequate. The court noted that the agreement addressed the fundamental issue of prison suicides by providing a process for minimizing the possibility that inmates with serious mental illnesses would be confined in segregation, and for reviewing their mental health while in segregation. The court held that the agreement did not order any "prospective relief," or in fact any "relief" at all, thereby precluding the applicability of the requirement of the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA), that prospective relief not extend further than necessary to remedy violation of a federal right. (Massachusetts Department of Correction)

U.S. District Court
CELL ASSIGNMENT
FAILURE TO PROTECT
GANGS
POLICY/PROCEDURE

Facey v. Dickhaut, 892 F.Supp.2d 347 (D.Mass. 2012). A prisoner at a state correctional institution filed a pro se § 1983 action against the prison and officials alleging his Eighth Amendment right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment was violated when officials knowingly placed him in danger by assigning him to a housing unit where he was violently attacked by members of a rival gang. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the complaint stated a claim against the deputy superintendent and an assistant for violation of the Eighth Amendment, by alleging that officials were aware of the feud between two rival prison gangs, that the prisoner was a known member of one of the gangs, that despite this knowledge officials had assigned the prisoner to a section of the prison where a rival gang was housed, and as a result he was violently attacked and sustained permanent injuries. The court found that the official who had instituted the gang housing policy could not be held personally liable, since he did not implement the policy, nor was he deliberately indifferent in supervising or training those who did. According to the court, state prison officials who had placed the prisoner known to be a gang member in danger by assigning him to a housing unit where he was violently attacked by members of a rival gang, were not entitled to qualified immunity in the prisoner's § 1983 suit. The court noted that clearly established law provided that the Eighth Amendment was violated if officials disregarded a known, substantial risk to an inmate's health or safety, and the officials had disregarded this risk, as well as violated a prison policy, by placing rival gang members in same housing unit. (Souza Baranowski Correctional Center, Massachusetts)

U.S. District Court
CLASSIFICATION
CRITERIA
POLICY/PROCEDURE
PRETRIAL DETAINEES
SUICIDE

Ferencz v. Medlock, 905 F.Supp.2d 656 (W.D.Pa. 2012). A mother, as administrator for her son's estate, brought deliberate indifference claims under a wrongful death statute against prison employees, and the prison's medical services provider, following the death of her son when he was a pretrial detainee in a county prison. The employees and provider moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The district court held that under Pennsylvania law, the mother lacked standing to bring wrongful death and survival actions in her individual capacity against several prison employees for her son's death while he was in prison, where the wrongful death and survival statutes only permitted recovery by a personal representative, such as a mother in her action as administratrix of her son's estate, or as a person entitled to recover damages as a trustee ad litem. The court found that the mother's claims that a prison's medical services provider had a policy, practice, or custom that resulted in her son's death were sufficient to overcome the provider's motion to dismiss the mother's § 1983 action for the death of her son while he was in prison. Upon admission to the facility, the detainee had been evaluated and scored a 12 on a scale, which was to have triggered classification as suicidal (a score of 8 or more). The Classification Committee subsequently did not classify the detainee as suicidal as they were required to do under the jail classification policy, and no member of the Committee communicated to medical contractor staff or correctional officers responsible for monitoring the detainee that he was suicidal and going through drug withdrawal. (Fayette County Prison, Pennsylvania, and PrimeCare Medical, Inc.)

U.S. District Court
FAILURE TO PROTECT SUICIDE
DUE PROCESS

Glover v. Gartman, 899 F.Supp.2d 1115 (D.N.M. 2012). The personal representative of the estate of a pretrial detainee who committed suicide while in custody brought an action against a warden of a county detention center and corrections officers, alleging under § 1983 that the defendants violated his substantive due process rights when they provided him with razor blades and failed to respond in a timely manner to his emergency calls for help. The officers moved to dismiss for failure to state a claim. The district court granted the motion. The court held that a county corrections officer's act of providing the pretrial detainee with two razor blades and then leaving the detainee alone for over an hour so that detainee could shave before trial, during which time the detainee committed suicide, did not violate the detainee's substantive due process rights under the United States Constitution or the New Mexico Constitution, where the officer did not know that the detainee posed any suicide risk. The court also held that the officer was entitled to qualified immunity from the § 1983 claim that the officer violated the pretrial detainee's substantive due process rights, where there was no due process violation, as the officer did not know that the detainee posed any suicide risk, and a detainee's substantive due process right not to be left alone with razor blades was not clearly established at the time of the incident. The court also found that a corrections officer was entitled to qualified immunity from the § 1983 claim that the officer violated the substantive due process rights of the detainee by failing to respond to the detainee's calls for help. According to the court, the officer's conduct did not rise to the level of a due process violation, and the substantive due process right of the detainee to have an officer respond to a call was not clearly established absent evidence that the officer heard the call or knew of a suicide risk. (Lea County Detention Center, New Mexico)

U.S. District Court
AIDS- Acquired Immune
Deficiency Syndrome
CLASSIFICATION
CRITERIA
MEDICAL CARE
POLICY/PROCEDURE
SEGREGATION
TRANSFER
WORK

Henderson v. Thomas, 913 F.Supp.2d 1267 (M.D.Ala. 2012). Seven HIV-positive inmates brought an action on behalf of themselves and class of all current and future HIV-positive inmates incarcerated in Alabama Department of Corrections (ADOC) facilities, alleging that ADOC's HIV segregation policy discriminated against them on the basis of their disability, in violation of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) and Rehabilitation Act. After a non-jury trial, the district court held that: (1) the class representatives had standing to sue; (2) the claims were not moot even though one inmate had been transferred, where it was reasonable to believe that the challenged practices would continue; (3) inmates housed in a special housing unit were "otherwise qualified," or reasonable accommodation would render them "otherwise qualified;" (4) the blanket policy of categorically segregating all HIV-positive inmates in a special housing unit violated ADA and the Rehabilitation Act; (5) housing HIV-positive inmates at other facilities would not impose an undue burden on the state; and (6) food-service policies that excluded HIV-positive inmates from kitchen jobs within prisons and prohibited HIV-positive inmates from holding food-service jobs in the work-release program irrationally excluded HIV-positive inmates from programs for which they were unquestionably qualified and therefore violated ADA and the Rehabilitation Act. The court also found that female HIV-positive class representative had standing to challenge ADOC policies that HIV-positive women were segregated within the prison from general-population prisoners and that women were allowed work-release housing at one facility, but not at ADOC's other work-release facility for women. The court held that modification of the ADOC medical classification system to afford HIV-positive inmates individualized determinations, instead of treating HIV status as a dispositive criterion regardless of viral load, history of high-risk behavior, physical and mental health, and any other individual aspects of inmates, was a reasonable accommodation to ensure that HIV-positive inmates housed in the prison's special housing unit were "otherwise qualified," under the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) and the Rehabilitation Act, for integration into the general prison population. According to the court, requiring ADOC to dismantle its policy of segregating HIV-positive female inmates in a particular dormitory at a prison would neither impose undue financial and administrative burdens nor require fundamental alteration in the nature of ADOC's operations. The court suggested that it was almost certain that ADOC was wasting valuable resources by maintaining its segregation policy, in that a large space at a prison filled with empty beds was being used to house only a few women. (Alabama Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
RECLASSIFICATION
TRANSFER

King v. Zamara, 680 F.3d 686 (6th Cir. 2012). A state prisoner sued several corrections employees under § 1983 for violating his First Amendment rights when they transferred him to an increased security level facility in retaliation for his participation in a state-court class action against corrections officials regarding inmate property, as well as for his assistance to other inmates in filing grievances. The district court entered judgment in favor of the defendants, and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The court held that a causal connection existed between the adverse action in increasing the prisoner's security level and the prisoner's purportedly disruptive First Amendment protected conduct, and that certain officials failed to show by a preponderance of the evidence that they would have taken the same action absent the protected conduct. The court found that a deputy warden could be held liable on the prisoner's § 1983 First Amendment retaliation claim, where her memo complaining about the prisoner's behavior was the actual and proximate cause of the increase in the prisoner's security level, and where she helped execute the order increasing the prisoner's security level with the knowledge that it was intended to retaliate for the prisoner's protected conduct. According to the court, the transfer coordinator was not liable on the prisoner's § 1983 First Amendment retaliation claim based on his editing of the prisoner's security screen to replace the initial notation with the notation that the prisoner was manipulative, where there was no showing that he knew or should have known that his superior's order to do so was meant to retaliate for the prisoner's protected conduct a month earlier. The court held that an assistant deputy warden was not liable on the prisoner's § 1983 First Amendment retaliation claim based on his signing a backdated security screen approving the prisoner's transfer to the increased security facility, where he neither knew or should have known that he was implementing punishment for the prisoner's exercise of his protected rights. (Michigan Department of Corrections, Brooks Correctional Facility, Chippewa Correctional Facility)

U.S. Appeals Court
CIVIL COMMITMENT
SEX OFFENDER
TREATMENT
DUE PROCESS

Lane v. Williams, 689 F.3d 879 (7th Cir. 2012). Convicted sex offenders who, after completing their sentences, remained in state custody as civil detainees pursuant to the Illinois Sexually Violent Persons Commitment Act, brought a § 1983 action, alleging constitutional problems with the conditions of their confinement at a treatment facility. The district court granted summary judgment to the defendants and the detainees appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that security restrictions on face-to-face interactions between the civil detainees held in different units within the state's treatment facility for sexually violent persons (SVP) did not constitute treatment decisions which, as a matter of due process, had to be made by health professionals, merely because the security restrictions affected treatment options. The court found that requiring the civil detainees to use United States Mail, rather than the facility's internal mail system, to send letters to detainees in the facility's other units did not violate the detainees' First Amendment associational rights, even if the facility's internal mail system was a superior means of sending letters. The court noted that commitment under the Illinois Sexually Violent Persons Commitment Act is civil and may be for purposes such as incapacitation and treatment, but not for punishment. As a general matter, persons who have been involuntarily civilly committed are entitled to more considerate treatment and conditions of confinement than criminals whose conditions of confinement are designed to punish. (Rushville Treatment and Detention Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
MENTALLY ILL
TRANSFER

Shah v. Danberg, 855 F.Supp.2d 215 (D.Del. 2012). A state inmate who pled guilty but mentally ill to a charge of first degree murder filed a § 1983 action against a state judge and prison officials alleging that his placement in a correctional center, rather than in a psychiatric center, violated his constitutional rights. The court held that the state judge was entitled to absolute judicial immunity from liability in inmate's § 1983 action despite the inmate's contention that the judge's incorrect application of a state statute resulted in violation of his constitutional rights, where there were no allegations that the judge acted outside the scope of her judicial capacity, or in the absence of jurisdiction. The court ruled that the state inmate failed to establish the likelihood of success on the merits of his claim and thus was not entitled to a preliminary injunction ordering his transfer, despite the inmate's contention that he was mentally unstable and had repeatedly caused himself physical injury during his suicide attempts, where medical records the inmate submitted were ten years old, and a state supreme court recognized that prison officials had discretion to house inmates at facilities they chose. The court ordered the appointment of counsel, noting that the inmate was unable to afford legal representation, he had a history of mental health problems, and the matter presented complex legal issues. (James T. Vaughn Corr'l. Center, Smyrna, Delaware)

U.S. District Court
CELL ASSIGNMENT
PRETRIAL DETAINEE
SEPARATION

Solivan v. Dart, 897 F.Supp.2d 694 (N.D.Ill. 2012). A pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against a county, corrections officers, and a sheriff, alleging deliberate indifference to undue punishment. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the detainee's § 1983 complaint stated a claim against a correctional officer for deliberate indifference to a serious need in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment, where the complaint alleged facts that indicated that the officer left inmates visually and audibly unsupervised for hours, knowing that a substantial risk of harm was present. The complaint further alleged that there were no light bulbs in the detainee's cell, no intercoms or emergency call buttons in cells, and no overhead cameras on his tier of the jail. According to the court, the complaint stated that the harm the detainee suffered at the hands of other inmates was significant, including severe injuries to his right eye and bleeding from his ear, and the complaint alleged that the detainee was the only person of Hispanic origin housed in the maximum security tier, while a significant majority of other inmates were African American, and that these circumstances put the detainee in an identifiable group of prisoners who were singled out for attack. (Division One, Cook County Department of Corrections, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
LENGTH OF SEGREGATION
TRANSFER

U.S. v. Bout, 860 F.Supp.2d 303 (S.D.N.Y. 2012). A federal prisoner convicted of multiple conspiracies to kill United States nationals, kill officers and employees of the United States, acquire, transfer, and use anti-aircraft missiles, and provide material support to a designated foreign terrorist organization, who had been held in solitary confinement, moved to be transferred to the general prison population. The motion was construed as a habeas petition. The district court held that continued solitary confinement violated the prisoner's Eighth Amendment rights. According to the court, the decision of the federal Bureau of Prisons (BOP) to indefinitely hold the federal prisoner in solitary confinement was not rationally related to any legitimate penological objectives and thus violated the prisoner's Eighth Amendment rights. The court found that although the BOP argued that the prisoner's release from solitary confinement would pose a high security risk, there was no evidence that the prisoner had a direct affiliation with any member of a terrorist organization, or that he personally engaged in violent acts. The court concluded that the prisoner did not present an unusually high risk of escape or harm to others, any involvement that the prisoner had with the former Liberian dictator, Charles Taylor, occurred several years ago and was not the basis of his criminal conviction, and the prisoner's release into the general population would have minimal impact on guards, other inmates, and prison resources. (Special Housing Unit, Metropolitan Correctional Center, New York)

U.S. District Court
CUSTODY LEVEL
POLICY/PROCEDURE
RECLASSIFICATION
TRANSFER

U.S. v. Jones, 869 F.Supp.2d 373 (E.D.N.Y. 2012). After a defendant, convicted of racketeering and racketeering conspiracy, conspiracy to distribute marijuana, use of a firearm in furtherance of the distribution conspiracy, and four instances of small-scale marijuana distribution, but found not guilty of charges relating to a murder, was sentenced, he filed a motion challenging the decision of the federal Bureau of Prisons (BOP) to classify his security level as "high" and designate him for incarceration at a high-security facility. The district court held that the remedy for the inmate's alleged misclassification lay primarily with the BOP. The court noted that the classification and designation of inmates is a matter within BOP's sole discretion. According to the court, although a district court has habeas jurisdiction to address the execution of a sentence, it does not have jurisdiction over a habeas petition challenging the petitioner's classification by the Bureau of Prisons. (United States Penitentiary, Big Sandy, Kentucky)

U.S. District Court
DUE PROCESS
EQUAL PROTECTION
POLICY/PROCEDURE
RACIAL
DISCRIMINATION

U.S. v. Maricopa County, Ariz., 915 F.Supp.2d 1073 (D.Ariz. 2012). The United States filed an action against a county, the county sheriff's office, and the sheriff in his official capacity, relating to treatment of Latinos, including jail detainees, and asserting claims for violations of the Fourth Amendment, retaliation in violation of the First Amendment, violations of equal protection and due process, and discrimination on the basis of race, color, or national origin in violation of Title VI and the Violent Crime Control and Law Enforcement Act. The defendants filed motions to dismiss. The district court denied the county's motion, and granted the sheriff and sheriff's office motions in part and denied in part. The court held that the sheriff's office was an entity that was not capable of being sued in its own name. The court held that the allegations stated a claim under Title VI for disparate impact discrimination, stated a claim for retaliation in violation of the First Amendment, and that the allegations satisfied the requirements for pleading the municipal liability of the county. According to the court, allegations by the United States, that officers from the county sheriff's office routinely and unlawfully targeted Latinos through pretextual traffic stops, crime suppression sweeps, and worksite raids, and that as a result Latinos were far more likely to be deprived of their constitutional rights than non-Latinos, stated a claim for disparate impact discrimination under Title VI by programs or activities receiving federal financial assistance. The court found that allegations that the county sheriff's office and the sheriff conducted jail operations in English and provided inadequate language assistance to the large jail population of Latino inmates who were limited English proficient (LEP) individuals, thereby denying the Latino LEP inmates meaningful access to jail programs such as sanitary needs, food, clothing, legal information, and religious services, stated a claim for disparate impact discrimination under Title VI by programs or activities receiving federal financial assistance. (Maricopa County Sheriff's Office, Sheriff Joseph M. Arpaio, Arizona)

U.S. District Court
AIDS- Acquired Immune
Deficiency Syndrome
CUSTODY LEVEL
HOMOSEXUALS

Way v. Johnson, 893 F.Supp.2d 15 (D.D.C. 2012). A District of Columbia inmate brought an action against wardens, an investigator, federal agencies, and other officials, alleging failure to investigate, and that his removal from a drug treatment program was discrimination based on his homosexuality and HIV-positive status. The district court granted the defendants' motion to dismiss. The court held that the inmate failed to exhaust administrative remedies in either of the two prisons in which he was housed as to removal from the drug treatment program or a change of housing, as required by the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA), where the inmate did not file any grievance in the first prison, and only filed an informal grievance form at the second prison. The court noted that the inmate did not appeal upon the response from the warden at the second prison. (United States Parole Commission, Secure Residential Treatment Program, Court Services and Offender Supervision Agency for the District of Columbia)

U.S. Appeals Court
DUE PROCESS
POLICY/PROCEDURE
TRANSFER

Westefer v. Neal, 682 F.3d 679 (7th Cir. 2012). Past and present inmates in the custody of the Illinois Department of Corrections (IDOC), who had been incarcerated in a supermax prison, brought a § 1983 action against IDOC officials and employees, alleging that defendants violated their right to procedural due process by employing unconstitutionally inadequate procedures when assigning inmates to the supermax prison, and seeking injunctive and declaratory relief. The district court granted injunctive relief, and the defendants appealed. The appeals court vacated and remanded with instructions. The appeals court held that the scope and specificity of the district court's injunction exceeded what was required to remedy a due-process violation, contrary to the terms of the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) and cautionary language from the Supreme Court about remedial flexibility and deference to prison administrators. The court held that the IDOC's ten-point plan should be used as a constitutional baseline, revising the challenged procedures and including a detailed transfer-review process. According to the court, this would eliminate the operational discretion and flexibility of prison administrators, far exceeding what due process required and violating the mandate of the PLRA. The court found that, under the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA), injunctive relief to remedy unconstitutional prison conditions must be narrowly drawn, extend no further than necessary to remedy the constitutional violation, and use the least intrusive means to correct the violation of the federal right. The court noted that informal due process, which is mandatory for inmates transferred to a supermax prison, requires some notice of the reasons for the inmate's placement and enough time to prepare adequately for the administrative review. The court found that, to satisfy due process regarding inmates transferred to a supermax prison, only a single prison official is needed as a neutral reviewer, not necessarily a committee, noting that informal due process requires only that the inmate be given an opportunity to present his views, not necessarily a full-blown hearing. Similarly, the informal due process does not necessarily require a written decision describing the reasons for an inmate's placement, or mandate an appeal procedure. (Closed Maximum Security Unit, Tamms Correctional Center, Illinois)

2013

U.S. District Court
PRETRIAL DETAINEES
SEGREGATION

Allah v. Milling, 982 F.Supp.2d 172 (D.Conn. 2013). A pretrial detainee brought an action against prison officials, asserting claims for violation of the Eighth Amendment and his due process rights under the Fourteenth Amendment based on his placement in an administrative segregation program. The officials moved for summary judgment on the due process claims. The district court denied the motion, finding that summary judgment was precluded by several fact issues. The court held that a genuine issue of material fact existed as to whether the decision by prison officials to place the pretrial detainee, who had previously been in an administrative segregation program before being discharged from the correctional facility, in administrative segregation immediately upon his readmission for a subsequent offense, was for a punitive purpose or was based on a legitimate non-punitive purpose. The court found that a fact issue existed as to whether the restrictions imposed upon the detainee during his confinement in administrative segregation, including handcuffs and leg shackles, constituted punishment. (Garner Correctional Institution, Connecticut)

U.S. District Court
CELL ASSIGNMENT
FAILURE TO PROTECT
SEPARATION

Alsobrook v. Alvarado, 986 F.Supp.2d 1312 (S.D.Fla. 2013). A state prisoner who was seriously injured in a fight with his cellmate brought a § 1983 action against a warden, corrections officers, prison nurse, the prison's healthcare provider, and the Secretary of the Florida Department of Corrections. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motions in part and denied in part. The court held that the prisoner sufficiently alleged that a corrections officer was deliberately indifferent to a risk of serious harm posed by the cellmate, in violation of the Eighth Amendment, where: (1) the prisoner alleged that his cellmate told the officer that he would become violent if the prisoner was not removed from the cell; (2) the prisoner requested to be separated from his cellmate; (3) the officer did nothing in response to this information; and (4) that a fight ensued, which resulted in serious injuries to the prisoner. (South Florida Reception Center, Florida)

U.S. Appeals Court
DUE PROCESS
EQUAL PROTECTION
MEDICAL CARE
MENTALLY ILL
SUICIDE

Belbachir v. County of McHenry, 726 F.3d 975 (7th Cir. 2013). The administrator of the estate of a female federal detainee who committed suicide in a county jail filed suit against the county, county jail officials, and employees of the medical provider that had a contract with the county to provide medical services at the jail, alleging violation of the detainee's due process rights and Illinois tort claims. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of all county defendants. The administrator appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The appeals court found that the jail inmate who was detained by federal immigration authorities pending her removal hearing was in the same position as a lawfully arrested pretrial detainee. The court noted that a pretrial detainee was entitled, pursuant to the due process clause, to at least as much protection during her detention as convicted criminals were entitled to under the Eighth Amendment-- namely protection from harm caused by a defendant's deliberate indifference to the inmate's safety or health. The court asserted that persons who have been involuntarily committed are entitled, under the due process clause, to more considerate treatment during detention than criminals whose conditions of confinement are designed to punish. The court found that the alleged conduct of a clinical social worker at the county jail who interviewed the detainee, in noting that the detainee suffered from a major depressive disorder, hallucinations, acute anxiety, and feelings of hopelessness, but allegedly failing to report those findings to the jail guards or any other jail staff or to recommend that the detainee be placed on a suicide watch or receive mental health treatment, amounted to deliberate indifference to the detainee's risk of suicide, in violation of the detainee's due process rights. The court held that a nurse manager employed by the medical provider was not deliberately indifferent to the detainee's risk of suicide, as would violate the detainee's due process rights, where the nurse manager treated the detainee for panic attacks and anxiety, and recommended that she be given a cellmate and transferred to a medical treatment area at the jail, both of which were done, and there was no showing that the nurse manager knew that the detainee was suicidal. According to the court, the county sheriff's and county jail director's failure to provide annual training to jail staff on how to recognize the risk of suicide in detainees, and their failure to implement a suicide prevention policy, did not render the county liable under § 1983 for the detainee's suicide during her detention at the jail, absent a showing that such failures caused the detainee's suicide. (McHenry Co. Jail, Ill.)

U.S. District Court
CUSTODY LEVEL
RECLASSIFICATION

Brooks v. U.S. Dept. of Justice, 959 F.Supp.2d 1 (D.D.C. 2013). A federal prisoner brought an action against the Department of Justice (DOJ) alleging violations of the Privacy Act. DOJ moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion. The court held that a constitutional claim arising from alleged violations of the Privacy Act was not cognizable. The court also found that the prisoner could not maintain an action under the Privacy Act seeking reassessment of his custody classification by BOP and a designation to a lower security facility, based on alleged errors in information in the presentence investigation report (PSI) that had been prepared in connection with his prior offense, which BOP allegedly relied on in deeming him ineligible for designation to a lower security facility. The court noted that BOP had exempted the Inmate Central Records System and the files maintained therein from the substantive provision of the Act regarding its recordkeeping obligations. (U.S. Dept. of Justice, Bureau of Prisons)

U.S. District Court
CELL ASSIGNMENT
DOUBLE CELLING

Brown v. Massachusetts, 950 F.Supp.2d 274 (D.Mass. 2013). An inmate brought an action under § 1983 for deliberate indifference to his health, against corrections facility officers and a superintendent. The officers and superintendent moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part, and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the inmate's complaints about another inmate who had violent tendencies being placed in his cell, and corrections officers' refusal to move him, were able to be grieved within the meaning of the provision of the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) that required the exhaustion of administrative remedies for grievable complaints. According to the court, summary judgment was also precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the corrections officers were aware they exposed the inmate to a serious risk of harm by placing another inmate who had violent tendencies in his cell, and by refusing to separate the two after the first inmate explained to the officers that he feared for his safety. Summary judgment was also precluded due to fact issues as to whether the inmate's complaint to the corrections officers that he did not feel safe with another inmate who had been placed in his cell, would trigger the inmate's clearly established right to be free from violence at the hands of other prisoners. (Essex County Corrections Facility, Massachusetts)

U.S. Appeals Court
GANGS
CLASSIFICATION
CRITERIA
DUE PROCESS
REGULATIONS

Castro v. Terhune, 712 F.3d 1304 (9th Cir. 2013). A state inmate brought an action challenging his validation as an "associate" of a recognized prison gang on due process grounds. The district court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment. The appeals court reversed and remanded. On remand, the district court again entered summary judgment for the defendants. The appeals court again reversed and remanded. Following a bench trial on remand, the district court granted the inmate prospective relief, requiring prison officials to determine whether an inmate was a gang associate under a new validation procedure. After officials validated the inmate as a "prison-gang associate" for a second time, the district granted the defendants' motion to terminate the case. The inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the California prison regulation relating to validation of inmates as prison gang affiliates was not facially vague. The court found that the district court erred by not evaluating whether "some evidence" supported the inmate's validation, but because the record contained "some evidence" that inmate was involved with a gang, remand was not warranted. (SHU at Pelican Bay State Prison, California)

U.S. District Court
CELL ASSIGNMENTS
PRETRIAL DETAINEES

Davis v. Pickell, 939 F.Supp.2d 771 (E.D.Mich. 2013). A pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against a sheriff, undersheriff, and deputies, alleging various claims, including excessive force. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The detainee had been booked into a holding cell at the jail and then he was removed from the multi-prisoner cell and taken to a single-inmate "safety cell." He alleges that during the transfer, deputy sheriffs subjected him to excessive force in the course of removing his jacket and shoes. The district court found that "[T]he videotape provides substance to those allegations." The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the deputies' use of force against the detainee shocked the conscience, whether the deputies maliciously used force, and whether the use of force on the detainee was outrageous conduct. (Genesee County Jail, Michigan)

U.S. District Court
FAILURE TO PROTECT
GANGS
PROTECTIVE CUSTODY

Dunn v. Killingsworth, 984 F.Supp.2d 811 (M.D.Tenn. 2013). A prisoner brought a § 1983 action against prison officials, alleging that the officials violated his Eighth Amendment rights by not providing him with adequate protection from gang-related violence. The district court conducted an initial review of the prisoner's complaint, pursuant to the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA). The court held that the prisoner's allegations: (1) that a gang member threatened his personal safety; (2) that the prisoner's family paid other inmates for the prisoner's personal safety; (3) that the prisoner repeatedly requested to be placed in protective custody; and (4) that prison officials denied such requests, were sufficient to state the serious deprivation prong of his claim for violation of his Eighth Amendment rights. The court also found that the prisoner's allegations that prison officials denied his requests for protection despite the stabbing of prisoners and a guard at the prison, and that prison officials failed to take any effective steps to provide better protection for all inmates, were sufficient to state a deliberate indifference prong of his claim for violation of his Eighth Amendment rights. (South Central Correctional Center, Tennessee)

U.S. District Court
FAILURE TO PROTECT HARASSMENT
HOMOSEXUALS
EQUAL PROTECTION
SEPARATION

Fletcher v. Little, 5 F.Supp.3d 655 (D.Del. 2013). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against a prison official, alleging that the official failed to protect him from an attempted rape by a known sexual offender and that she discriminated against him based on his sexual orientation as a homosexual. The prisoner filed motions to compel, for appointment of counsel, for partial summary judgment, and for a preliminary injunction, and the official filed a motion for summary judgment. The district court denied the prisoner's motions and granted the official's motion. The court held that the prison official was not deliberately indifferent to the risk that the prisoner would be assaulted by a cellmate because of the prisoner's homosexuality, where the official did not ignore the prisoner's concern. The court noted that before the assault, the official had the prisoner and cellmate removed from their cell and separately interviewed them. Each reported they feared the other, the official instructed them to "stop bickering" or face time in isolation, they agreed to stop and were returned to the cell, and when the official conducted a check 30 minutes later, the prisoner and cellmate were asleep in their beds. The court found that the prison official's alleged statements to the homosexual prisoner, including a comment that because he was a "gay man," he should expect harassment from other inmates who had "not been with a woman in a long time," and that he should "man-up and stop coming to jail," did not support an equal protection claim, no matter how offensive or derogatory the alleged statements were, because they were merely verbal abuse. (James T. Vaughn Correctional Center, Delaware)

U.S. District Court
CIVIL COMMITMENT
SEGREGATION
DUE PROCESS

Grohs v. Yatauro, 984 F.Supp.2d 273 (D.N.J. 2013). A civilly-committed resident at a special treatment unit (STU) operated by the New Jersey Department of Corrections (NJDOC) brought action against NJDOC officials, alleging violations of his substantive due process rights under § 1983. The district court held that the resident's claims against the officials in their official capacities were barred by sovereign immunity. The court held that the resident's allegations adequately pled the officials' personal involvement in his complaint that: (1) there were visibly leaking steam pipes in a special treatment unit (STU) for which trash cans were used to collect water; (2) NJDOC officials personally toured STU; (3) STU received numerous written complaints from residents about inadequate hot water; and (4) an STU assistant administrator told the resident that defective piping valves were too expensive to repair. The court found that the officials were subject to liability under § 1983 in their individual capacities. The court held that NJDOC officials were not entitled to qualified immunity from the civilly committed resident's § 1983 conditions of civil commitment claim under the Due Process Clause, arising from inadequate hot water at a special treatment unit (STU) in which he was housed. (Special Treatment Unit, Avenel, Middlesex County, New Jersey)

U.S. Appeals Court PUNITIVE
SEGREGATION
DUE PROCESS
LIBERTY INTEREST
SEGREGATION

Hardaway v. Meyerhoff, 734 F.3d 740 (7th Cir. 2013). A state prisoner who had spent six months in segregation as punishment for a disciplinary misconduct charge which was later expunged, filed a § 1983 action, alleging that the segregation violated his due process rights. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the prisoner's placement in disciplinary segregation in a cell with a solid metal door and a confrontational cell mate for 182 days, with only weekly access to the shower and the recreation yard, did not amount to atypical and significant hardships, as required to establish a deprivation of the prisoner's due process liberty interests, where the prisoner was not deprived of all human contact or sensory stimuli. The court found that the state prison officials were entitled to qualified immunity for their conduct in placing the prisoner in disciplinary segregation, as the disciplinary segregation did not violate any clearly established right. (Menard Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
DUE PROCESS
EQUAL PROTECTION
POLICY/PROCEDURE
RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

Hernandez v. Cate, 918 F.Supp.2d 987 (C.D.Cal. 2013). An Hispanic state inmate, whose ethnicity was classified as "other," brought an in forma pauperis civil rights action against California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation (CDCR) officials, alleging, among other things, that the officials discriminated against him on basis of his race, in violation of his equal protection and due process rights, and that the officials violated his Eighth Amendment right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment. The officials moved to dismiss the complaint for failure to state claim. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that state prison officials applied a suspect racial classification to Hispanic inmates, who were ethnically classified as "other," when the officials placed those inmates on modified program status in lockstep with the lockdown of Mexican inmates, while non-Hispanic inmates who associated with the Mexican inmates or disruptive inmates of other ethnic groups were not subjected to same lockstep treatment. According to the court, prison policies were not narrowly tailored to control prison disturbances, as required to survive strict scrutiny of the § 1983 equal protection claim brought by Hispanic inmate. The court held that the state prison warden's authority and discretion to justify modified programs imposed on the Hispanic inmate and to deny the inmate relief at the administrative level were sufficient to show the warden's personal involvement in the alleged deprivations of the inmate's equal protection and Eighth Amendment rights so as to subject the warden to supervisory liability under § 1983. The court found that state prison officials were not entitled to qualified immunity from the § 1983 equal protection claim brought by the Hispanic inmate where it would have been clear to a reasonable official that it was unlawful to place the inmate on a modified program on the basis of his race, ethnicity, or national origin. (Ironwood State Prison, California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation)

U.S. District Court
CELL ASSIGNMENT
MEDICAL CARE
SMOKING

Mearin v. Swartz, 951 F.Supp.2d 776 (W.D.Pa. 2013). State inmates, proceeding pro se, brought an action against prison officials and employees, alleging that exposure to environmental tobacco smoke (ETS) violated the Eighth Amendment, as well as asserting First Amendment retaliation claims. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the prisoners' allegations were sufficient to plead they were exposed to unreasonably high levels of environmental tobacco smoke (ETS), as required to state a § 1983 claim for violations of the Eighth Amendment against various prison officials and employees. One prisoner alleged that he was exposed to constant smoking by cellmates, inmates in neighboring cells, and by corrections officers and staff, which resulted in his suffering from constant coughs, headaches, chest pains, shortness of breath, vomiting, and fatigue. A second prisoner alleged that he was constantly exposed to second hand smoke by other inmates and employees while in certain housing, which resulted in his suffering from constant headaches, coughs, dizziness, breathing difficulties, and burning sensations in his chest. The prisoners alleged that officials and employees had actual knowledge of their exposure to ETS and of the risks of harm to the prisoners' health, but failed to rectify conditions and to enforce the prison's zero tolerance smoking policy. The court found that the prisoners' allegations that they had made requests to unit managers to be housed with non-smoking cellmates, that the managers had knowledge of the prisoners' need to be housed with non-smokers, that the managers denied the requests, that the prisoners suffered various health conditions from exposure to smoke, and that the prisoners submitted grievances about smoke exposure, were sufficient to state a § 1983 claim against case managers for violations of the Eighth Amendment. (State Correctional Institution at Greene, Pennsylvania)

U.S. District Court
DUE PROCESS
MEDICAL CARE
PRETRIAL DETAINEES

Nelson v. District of Columbia, 928 F.Supp.2d 210 (D.D.C. 2013). A detainee brought a § 1983 claim against the District of Columbia arising from his stay in jail. The defendant moved to dismiss and the district court granted the motion. The court held that denial of one telephone call and access to stationery during the detainee's five-day stay in a "Safe Cell," which was located in the jail's infirmary, did not implicate his First Amendment right of free speech or right of access to courts. The court found that the detainee's alleged exposure to "dried urine on the toilet seat and floor" and garbage during his five-day stay, along with the denial of a shower, did not rise to the level of a Fifth Amendment due process violation. According to the court, placement of detainee in a Safe Cell was not motivated by a desire to punish the detainee, but rather by a nurse's desire to attend to the detainee's ailments after his "legs and back gave out" twice. The court noted that denial of the detainee's request to have the cell cleaned was for the non-punitive reason that the detainee would not be in the cell that long. (D.C. Jail, District of Columbia)

U.S. District Court
SEGREGATION
PRETRIAL DETAINEES
DUE PROCESS

Potts v. Moreci, 12 F.Supp.3d 1065 (N.D.Ill. 2013). A pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against a county, employees of the county jail in their individual capacities, and a sheriff, in his individual and official capacities, alleging retaliation in violation of his First Amendment rights, deprivation of his procedural due process and equal protection rights, denial of access to the courts, municipal liability, and statutory indemnification. The sheriff moved to dismiss the claims asserted against him. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court found that the detainee who allegedly was placed in a segregation unit at the county jail without adequate grounds and without an opportunity to contest such placement stated a claim for a procedural due process violation against the sheriff, in his individual capacity, under § 1983. The court noted that the sheriff's personal responsibility for the detainee's placement in segregation could be assumed in determining whether the detainee adequately pleaded the claim, and the detainee also sufficiently alleged the sheriff's knowledge of the detainee's allegedly unconstitutional confinement in segregation by asserting that the sheriff attended periodic meetings at which the detainee's confinement was discussed, which permitted the inference that sheriff knew about the challenged conduct and facilitated, approved, condoned, or turned a blind eye to it. (Cook County Jail, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
CELL ASSIGNMENT
CLASSIFICATION
EQUAL PROTECTION
FAILURE TO PROTECT
MEDICAL CARE
MENTALLY ILL
RACIAL DISCRIMINATION
WORK

Randle v. Alexander, 960 F.Supp.2d 457 (S.D.N.Y. 2013). An African-American state inmate with a history of serious mental illness brought an action against officials of the New York State Department of Corrections and Community Supervision (DOCCS), correctional officers, and mental health personnel, alleging under § 1983 that the defendants were deliberately indifferent to his serious medical needs and that he was retaliated against, in violation of his First Amendment rights, among other claims. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the correctional officers' alleged actions in forcing the inmate to fight a fellow inmate, and threatening to beat the inmate with a baton and engage in a joint cover-up if the two inmates did not "finish" their fight within a specified area of the prison, which ultimately resulted in the fellow inmate sustaining fatal injuries in the fight, had no legitimate penological purpose, and was far afield of the species of force employed to restore or maintain discipline. The court held that the alleged actions reflected indifference to inmate safety, if not malice toward the inmate, as supported the inmate's § 1983 Eighth Amendment failure to protect claim. According to the court, the alleged forced fight between the inmate and a fellow inmate, orchestrated, condoned, and covered up by correctional officers was an objectively serious violation of the inmate's Eighth Amendment right to reasonably safe conditions of confinement, and the intent evinced by such activity was, at the very least, one of indifference to inmate safety, supporting the inmate's § 1983 Eighth Amendment conditions of confinement claim against the officers.

The court held that the African-American state inmate's allegations in his complaint that a correctional officer arranged inmates in his company so that white inmates were close to officers' posts, whereas black inmates were placed further away, that white inmates were given superior jobs, that the officer's efforts in forcing a fight between the inmate and a fellow inmate were done purposefully for his amusement because both inmates were black, and that the officer's treatment of the inmate and other black inmates was motivated by his intent to discriminate on the basis of race and malicious intent to injure inmates, stated a § 1983 equal protection claim against the officer. The court ruled that the correctional officers were not entitled to qualified immunity from the inmate's § 1983 Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment claims because inmates had a clearly established right to remain incarcerated in reasonably safe conditions, and it was objectively unreasonable to threaten inmates until they agreed to fight each other in front of prison officials. The court found that the inmate stated an Eighth Amendment inadequate medical care claim against mental health personnel. The inmate alleged that he had a history of serious mental illness, that his symptoms increased following a forced fight with a fellow inmate, that the inmate attempted suicide on three occasions, two of which required his hospitalization, that prison mental health personnel evidenced deliberate indifference to his medical needs, as they recklessly disregarded the risk the inmate faced as result of special housing unit (SHU) confinement, and that the inmate was confined to SHU despite a recommendation that he be placed in a less-restrictive location. (Green Haven Correctional Facility, Protective Custody Unit, New York State Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
CELL ASSIGNMENT
FAILURE TO PROTECT
LOWER BUNK
MEDICAL CARE

Robinson v. Phelps, 946 F.Supp.2d 354 (D.Del. 2013). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against prison officials alleging excessive force and failure to protect. The district court held that the prisoner stated cognizable and non-frivolous claims for excessive force, failure to protect, and denial of medical care. The prisoner alleged that on one occasion a sergeant assaulted him and that a lieutenant arrived during the assault and that he sustained injuries but was denied medical care by these officers and other prison personnel, that another sergeant shoved and pushed him when he was taken to a medical grievance hearing, making his injuries worse, that this sergeant shoved him to the ground while escorting him to the shower, and then dragged him when he could not get up, requiring that he be taken away by stretcher, and that other officers later choked him until he lost consciousness. The court found that the prisoner also stated cognizable and non-frivolous Eighth Amendment claims against a prison physician for denial or delay of medical treatment; the prisoner alleged that after he was assaulted by a corrections officer, he was seen by the physician, who would not prescribe pain medication and advised the prisoner that he would be x-rayed within seven to ten days, but the x-rays were not taken for a month and a half, and he alleged that some months later he was taken to an outside facility for a magnetic resonance imaging (MRI) of the neck and back. According to the court, the prisoner's allegations were sufficient to state an Eighth Amendment claim that the physicians denied his requests for medically necessary accommodations. The prisoner alleged that medical officials did not authorize his housing on a lower bunk and, as a result, he slept on the floor, that an officer later moved him to an upstairs cell even though he knew that the prisoner required lower housing due to his neck and back injuries, and that the prisoner showed the officer a memo from a superior officer indicating the prisoner needed the housing, (James T. Vaughn Correctional Center, Delaware)

U.S. District Court
DUE PROCESS
POLICY/PROCEDURE
SEGREGATION

Royer v. Federal Bureau of Prisons, 933 F.Supp.2d 170 (D.D.C. 2013). A federal prisoner brought an action against Bureau of Prisoners (BOP), alleging classification as a "terrorist inmate" resulted in violations of the Privacy Act and the First and Fifth Amendments. The BOP moved for summary judgment and to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that BOP rules prohibiting contact visits and limiting noncontact visits and telephone time for federal inmates labeled as "terrorist inmates", more than other inmates, had a rational connection to a legitimate government interest, for the purpose of the inmate's action alleging the rules violated his First Amendment rights of speech and association. According to the court, the prison had an interest in monitoring the inmate's communications and the prison isolated inmates who could pose a threat to others or to the orderly operation of the institution. The court noted that the rules did not preclude the inmate from using alternative means to communicate with his family, where the inmate could send letters, the telephone was available to him, and he could send messages through others allowed to visit.

The court found that the inmate's assertions that the prison already had multiple cameras and hypersensitive microphones, and that officers strip searched inmates before and after contact visits, did not establish ready alternatives to a prohibition on contact visits for the inmate and limits on phone usage and noncontact visits due to being labeled as a "terrorist inmate." The court noted that increasing the number of inmates subject to strip searches increased the cost of visitation, and microphones and cameras did not obviate all security concerns that arose from contact visits, such as covert notes or hand signals.

The court held that the inmate's allegations that he was segregated from the prison's general population for over six years, that he was subject to restrictions on recreational, religious, and educational opportunities available to other inmates, that contact with his family was limited to one 15 minute phone call per week during business hours when his children were in school, and that he was limited to two 2-hour noncontact visits per month, were sufficient to plead harsh and atypical conditions, as required for his Fifth Amendment procedural due process claim. According to the court, the inmate's allegations that he was taken from his cell without warning, that he was only provided an administrative detention order that stated he was being moved due to his classification, that he was eventually told he was classified as a "terrorist inmate," that such classification imposed greater restrictions upon his confinement, and that he was never provided with a hearing, notice of criteria for release from conditions, or notice of a projected date for release from conditions were sufficient to plead denial of due process, as required for his claim alleging violations of the Fifth Amendment procedural due process. (Special Housing Units at FCI Allenwood and USP Lewisburg, CMU at FCI Terre Haute, SHU at FCI Greenville, Supermax facility at Florence, Colorado, and CMU at USP Marion)

U.S. Appeals Court
LENGTH OF SEGREGATION
DUE PROCESS

Selby v. Caruso, 734 F.3d 554 (6th Cir. 2013). A prisoner brought a civil rights action against a state prison and its personnel, alleging violation of his due process rights. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The appeals court held that: (1) the prisoner's confinement in administrative segregation for 13 years was sufficiently atypical as to give rise to a protected due process liberty interest; (2) a factual issue existed as to whether the prisoner received meaningful periodic reviews and whether state prison officials' decision to continue the prisoner's confinement in administrative segregation for nearly 13 years was supported by "some evidence"; (3) the defendant state prison and prison personnel could not be granted qualified immunity at the summary judgment stage on the prisoner's civil rights claim alleging violation of his due process rights; and (4) the prisoner's First Amendment religious freedom claim was deemed abandoned. The court noted that a reasonable prison official should have known that the prisoner could not be confined in administrative segregation for pretextual reasons. (Marquette Branch Prison, Michigan Department of Corrections.)

U.S. District Court
TRANSSEXUAL
FAILURE TO PROTECT

Shaw v. District of Columbia, 944 F.Supp.2d 43 (D.D.C. 2013). A former pretrial detainee, a transgender woman, who underwent sex reassignment surgery and had her sex legally changed to female, brought an action against the United States Marshals Service (USMS), USMS marshals, District of Columbia, a police chief, and police officers, alleging under § 1983 that the defendants violated her Fourth Amendment rights in connection with her arrests, and asserting claims under the District of Columbia Human Rights Act and tort law. The police chief, officer, and USMS defendants moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The district court held that the USMS marshals were not entitled to qualified immunity from the unlawful search claim, where a reasonable officer would have known that a cross-gender search of a female detainee by male USMS employees that included intimate physical contact, exposure of private body parts, and verbal harassment, all in front of male detainees and male USMS employees, in the absence of an emergency, was unreasonable. The court also found that the USMS marshals and the police officer were not entitled to qualified immunity from a § 1983 Fifth Amendment conditions of confinement claim brought by the pretrial detainee, arising from the defendants' actions in holding the detainee with male detainees and otherwise treating her as if she were male. According to the court, a reasonable officer would know that treating the female detainee as the detainee was treated exposed her to a substantial risk of serious harm, and, therefore, would know that those actions violated the detainee's due process rights. (District of Columbia Metropolitan Police Department, Sixth District Police Station and MPD's Central Cellblock, and United States Marshals Service)

U.S. Appeals Court
CLASSIFICATION
CRITERIA
SEPARATION
DUE PROCESS
REGULATIONS

Smith v. Sangamon County Sheriff's Dept., 715 F.3d 188 (7th Cir. 2013). A pretrial detainee filed suit under § 1983 against a sheriff's department to recover for injuries sustained when he was severely beaten by another inmate housed in a maximum-security cellblock. The district court entered summary judgment for the sheriff's department, and the detainee appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the detainee failed to establish that the security classification policy used by the sheriff's department to assign inmates to cellblocks within the jail was deliberately indifferent to inmate safety in violation of his due-process rights. The court noted that: (1) the detainee presented no evidence that the classification policy created a serious risk of physical harm to inmates, much less that the sheriff's department knew of it and did nothing; (2) the attack by the detainee's cellmate was not enough to establish that the policy itself systematically exposed inmates like the detainee to a serious risk of harm; and (3) it was unclear that a policy strictly segregating those accused of nonviolent crimes from those accused of violent crimes would do a better job of ensuring inmate safety than the multiple-factor classification system used by the sheriff's department. The detainee claimed that the Department's approach to classifying inmates for cellblock placement ignored serious risks to inmate safety because the security classification policy fails to separate "violent" from "nonviolent" inmates and thus fails to protect peaceful inmates from attacks by inmates with assaultive tendencies. The appeals court described the classification practices: "A classification officer interviews each new detainee and reviews a range of information, including the inmate's age, gender, gang affiliation, medical concerns, current charge, criminal history, behavioral and disciplinary history within the jail, and any holds due to parole violations. Pursuant to standards recommended by the American Correctional Association, the classification policy assigns point values within these categories, with higher point values corresponding to lower security risks." (Sangamon County Detention Facility, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
CELL ASSIGNMENT TRUSTY
WORK

Spencer v. Jackson County, Mo., 738 F.3d 907 (8th Cir. 2013). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against county detention center employees, alleging violation of his First Amendment rights. The district court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment. The inmate appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by issues of material fact as to: (1) the inmate's First Amendment retaliation claim against a supervisor; (2) First Amendment retaliation claims arising from the inmate's transfer to another housing module; and (3) claims arising from the alleged obstruction of the inmate's access to a grievance process. The court found a dispute of material fact as to whether a program supervisor was motivated by the lawsuit the inmate had previously filed against her, when she removed the inmate from a trustee program almost immediately after he reminded her about his having filed the suit, resulting in his loss of access to income, work opportunities, and housing advantages as well as other privileges.

A fact issue was found as to whether the 53-year old inmate would have been transferred from a housing module for older inmates to a module that housed younger and more violent offenders, but for his use of the grievance process. The inmate had been approved for the detention center's Inmate Worker Program (IWP), also known as the "trustee program." Inmates in the trustee program received job assignments within the detention center and were paid for each shift, with an opportunity to earn more for additional work. They also received a number of privileges and incentives. They were housed in a trustee module and were eligible for late nights, weekend contact visitation rewards, and access to popcorn, soda, and a movie player. One of inmate's work assignments was in the kitchen, where inmates received extra food and may have one meal per work day in the break room area. (Jackson County Detention Center, Missouri)

U.S. District Court
LOWER BUNK
MEDICAL CARE

Staples v. U.S., 948 F.Supp.2d 1 (D.D.C.2013). A federal prisoner brought a pro se action against the United States and several employees of the Bureau of Prisons, alleging violations of the Eighth Amendment. The district court held that the inmate stated Eighth Amendment violations with his allegations that: (1) two corrections officers at the federal prison ignored the his medical restriction, which required him to sleep on a lower bunk bed; (2) the officers told the prisoner to sleep on a top bed or to sleep on the floor; (3) he was forced to sleep on the floor and suffered unnecessary physical pain in his back and left hip; and (4) his condition was ignored. The prisoner alleged that the conditions continued for over two weeks in spite of his complaints. (Federal Correctional Institution Schuylkill, Minersville, Pennsylvania)

U.S. District Court
CLASSIFICATION
EQUAL PROTECTION
LENGTH OF SEGREGATION
LIBERTY INTEREST
SEGREGATION
SEX OFFENDERS

Tavares v. Amato, 954 F.Supp.2d 79 (N.D.N.Y. 2013). An inmate who had recently been released from the custody of a county jail filed a pro se suit against a sheriff and jail administrator, claiming his First Amendment rights were violated by his inability to access a law library and to engage in religious worship while confined in involuntary protective custody (IPC). The inmate also alleged that he was discriminated against and placed in IPC because he was a sex offender, in contravention of the Equal Protection Clause, and that his conditions of confinement violated the Eighth Amendment. Both sides moved for summary judgment. The district court denied the plaintiff's motion, and granted the defendants' motion in part and denied in part. The court held that: (1) there was no evidence of injury, as required to support a claim for violation of the First Amendment's right of access to the courts; (2) there was no evidence that the inmate had firmly held religious beliefs, as required to support a claim for violation of his First Amendment's right to free exercise of religion; (3) confinement of the inmate in administrative segregation for 132 days was not cruel or unusual punishment, in violation of the Eighth Amendment; and (4) the inmate's initial five-day segregation, for purposes of a determining a housing classification, was insufficient to establish a liberty interest.

But the court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact: (1) as to whether the county jail had a rational basis for housing inmates with sex offender criminal histories in administrative segregation, rather than with the general prison population; (2) whether there was a violation of the Equal Protection Clause; and (3) on the officials' claim for qualified immunity.

According to the court, there was no evidence that the inmate suffered any type of actual injury as a result of receiving only one trip to the facility's law library during his 132-day confinement in involuntary protective custody (IPC). The court found that the inmate's claims, even if proven, that jail officials confined him in administrative segregation for 132 days, for 23 hours each day, only allowing him to shower during his one hour long recreation period, prohibiting him from wandering around outside of his cell, and forcing him to pick and choose which amenities he wanted to avail himself to given his limited amount of time outside of his cell, did not amount to cruel or unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth Amendment, since the officials' actions involved no specific deprivation of any human need. (Montgomery County Jail, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
LOWER BUNK
MEDICAL CARE

Withers v. Wexford Health Sources, Inc., 710 F.3d 688 (7th Cir. 2013). A prisoner brought a § 1983 action against a variety of health professionals employed by or under contract to a state prison, alleging deliberate indifference to his medical needs in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The district court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The appeals court held that a genuine issue of material fact existed as to whether a nurse who allegedly let the prisoner who was suffering from back pain to climb a ladderless bunk bed, resulting in his fall from the bunk bed, was deliberately indifferent to the prisoner's medical needs, precluding summary judgment. (Danville Correctional Center, Illinois)

2014

U.S. District Court
HANDICAPPED INMATE

Blossom v. Dart, 64 F.Supp.3d 1158 (N.D.Ill. 2014). A disabled detainee in a county jail brought an action against a county and a county sheriff, asserting a § 1983 claim for deprivation of his Fourteenth Amendment rights and alleging violations of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) and the Rehabilitation Act. The sheriff filed a motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim. The district court denied the motion. The court held that the disabled detainee, who suffered injuries due to the lack of accommodation for his disability, sufficiently alleged that the sheriff had personal knowledge of, or involvement in, the alleged deprivation of his Fourteenth Amendment rights, so as to state a § 1983 claim against the sheriff in his individual capacity. The detainee alleged that the sheriff acquired personal knowledge of the fact that disabled prisoners assigned to a certain jail division had sustained injuries because shower and toilet facilities were not equipped with appropriate grab bars, toilet seats, and shower seats, and the detainee alleged that despite revising the jail's housing assignment policy for detainees who used wheelchairs, the sheriff refused to revise the policy for other disabled detainees. The court also found that the detainee sufficiently alleged that there was an official policy allowing disabled detainees to be housed in non-accessible housing units that continued to exist despite the knowledge that the policy had caused serious injuries to disabled detainees. (Cook County Jail, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEGREGATION
SOLITARY CONFINEMENT
DUE PROCESS
REVIEW PRIVILEGES

Brown v. Oregon Dept. of Corrections, 751 F.3d 983 (9th Cir. 2014). A state prison inmate brought a pro se § 1983 action against the Oregon Department of Corrections alleging that prison officials violated his due process rights by housing him in an intensive management unit without periodic, meaningful review of his status. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the inmate's 27-month confinement in an intensive management unit deprived him of a due-process protected liberty interest, but the inmate's due-process protected liberty interest in periodic, meaningful review of his status was not clearly established, and thus prison officials were entitled to qualified immunity. The court noted that the inmate experienced an atypical and significant hardship in that he was subjected to solitary confinement for over 23 hours each day, with almost no interpersonal contact, and he was denied most privileges afforded to inmates in the general population. (Snake River Correctional Institution, Oregon)

U.S. Appeals Court
CELL ASSIGNMENT

Caldwell v. Warden, FCI Talladega, 748 F.3d 1090 (11th Cir. 2014). A federal prisoner who was assaulted and stabbed by his cellmate filed a pro se Bivens action against federal corrections officers, alleging deliberate indifference to a substantial risk of serious harm. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the officers. The prisoner appealed, and counsel was appointed to represent prisoner. The appeals court vacated and remanded, finding that fact issues precluded summary judgment, and that the officers were not entitled to qualified immunity. The court found a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the federal prison officers had actual subjective knowledge that the federal prisoner faced a substantial risk of serious harm from the cellmate, who had a known history of violence, before the officers placed the prisoner in the cell with the cellmate, where he was assaulted and stabbed. The court noted that they had a known history of violence and had already threatened the prisoner's safety by setting their locked cell on fire. (FCI–Talladega, Alabama)

U.S. District Court
FAILURE TO PROTECT HANDICAPPED INMATE
MENTALLY ILL

Cox v. Massachusetts Dept. of Correction, 18 F.Supp.3d 38 (D.Mass. 2014). A mentally disabled state prisoner brought an action against a state department of correction (DOC) and various officials, alleging violations of the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments, Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), and Massachusetts Declaration of Rights. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court found that the prisoner's grievance alleging he was improperly classified, resulting in a sexual assault, provided the DOC with sufficient notice to investigate, and therefore, the prisoner's claims under the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) were administratively exhausted. The prisoner alleged that the DOC did not keep him safe and that he was mentally challenged. According to the court, the prisoner's allegations that he was sexually assaulted by other inmates, that he suffered other abuses, that prison officials knew of the risk of harm to the prisoner, that his history of mental illness was well-documented, and that officials were responsible for policies, procedures, and training that led to his injury were sufficient to state a § 1983 claim against the officials for violations of the Eighth Amendment, and a claim under the Massachusetts Civil Rights Act, absent allegations of threats, intimidation, or coercion by officials. The court held that the prisoner's allegations that prison officials knew of his disability, that medical professionals encouraged staff to provide appropriate housing to prevent the prisoner from being targeted by other inmates, and that he was sexually assaulted after failure to provide appropriate housing were sufficient to state a failure to accommodate claim under the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA). (Massachusetts Department of Correction, Old Colony Correctional Center)

U.S. Appeals Court
GANGS
SEX OFFENDERS

Danser v. Stansberry, 772 F.3d 340 (4th Cir. 2014). A federal inmate who was attacked in a recreation cage brought a Bivens action alleging that officials were deliberately indifferent to his safety. The district court denied the officials' motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity. The officials appealed. The appeals court vacated and remanded with instructions. The court held that a corrections officer did not disregard an excessive risk to the safety of the inmate in violation of the Eighth Amendment when he placed the inmate, a convicted sex offender, in a recreation cage with a fellow inmate, a violent gang member, and left the recreation area unsupervised, during which time the gang member attacked the inmate. According to the court, the officer was not aware that the inmate was a sex offender or that he was required to check prison databases in which that information was contained, there were no orders issued requiring that the inmate and gang member be separated from each other, and the officer's dereliction of duty in leaving the recreation area did not constitute anything other than negligence. (Federal Correctional Institution, Butner, North Carolina)

U.S. District Court
GANGS

Facey v. Dickhaut, 91 F.Supp.3d 12 (D.Mass. 2014). A prisoner at a state correctional institution filed a pro se § 1983 action against corrections officials, alleging that the officials knowingly placed him in danger by assigning him to a housing unit where he was violently attacked by members of a rival gang, in violation of his Eighth Amendment right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment. Both parties filed motions to strike, and the officers moved for summary judgment. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by issues of fact as to whether corrections officials knew that the prisoner faced a substantial risk of serious harm, and whether the officials violated clearly established rights (Souza–Baranowski Correctional, Massachusetts)

U.S. Appeals Court
GANGS
SEGREGATION
TRANSFER

Griffin v. Gomez, 741 F.3d 10 (9th Cir. 2014). A state inmate filed a petition for a writ of habeas corpus challenging his placement in a security housing unit (SHU). After the writ was issued, the district court ordered the state to release the inmate from segregated housing conditions, and the state appealed. The appeals court vacated, reversed, and remanded. The appeals court held that the district court abused its discretion by finding that the state had violated its order issuing a writ of habeas corpus requiring the state to release the inmate from the facility's security housing unit (SHU). According to the court, the state subsequently placed the inmate in the facility's administrative segregation unit (ASU) and then in another facility's SHU. The court noted that the inmate had been released into federal custody before the order was issued, his placement in ASU after he was released from federal custody pending evaluation of his gang status was standard procedure, and the inmate was validated as an active gang member and placed in other SHU. According to the court, the district court improperly impeded state prison management. (Pelican Bay State Prison, California)

U.S. District Court
MENTALLY ILL
POLICY/PROCEDURE
SEGREGATION
SUICIDE
DUE PROCESS
LIBERTY INTEREST
PUNITIVE
SEGREGATION PRIVILEGES

Houston v. Cotter, 7 F.Supp.3d 283 (E.D.N.Y. 2014). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against corrections officers and a county, alleging a due process violation in connection with his placement on a suicide watch while incarcerated at a county correctional facility. The parties filed cross-motions for summary judgment. The district court denied the motions, finding that summary judgment was precluded by fact issues as to whether a protected liberty interest was implicated. The inmate alleged that the county had a policy or custom permitting classification officers to keep an inmate on suicide watch as a form of punishment, after mental health personnel had deemed a continued suicide watch unnecessary. The inmate remained on suicide watch for eight days after a psychiatrist and a social worker recommended his removal from the suicide watch. The court also found a genuine dispute of material fact as to whether the inmate's conditions of confinement while he was placed on suicide watch imposed an atypical and significant hardship on him in relation to the ordinary incidents of prison life, such that it implicated a protected liberty interest. While on suicide watch, officials took away the inmate's clothing and required him to wear a suicide-safe garment-- a sleeveless smock made of a coarse, tear-resistant material and Velcro. He was not allowed to wear underwear, socks, or any other undergarment with the smock. He was housed in a stripped cell in the Behavioral Modification Housing Unit. The cell contained a bare mattress and a blanket made out of the same coarse material as the smock. Corrections officers situated immediately in front of the Plexiglass cell window constantly supervised the inmate. According to the county, suicide watch inmates have access to the yard, a plastic spoon, a rubberized pen, the law library, showers, razors, and medical and mental health services, but the inmate claimed that he had no showers, telephone calls, prescription medications, food, or access to the law library while in the BMHU. (Suffolk County Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
MENTAL HEALTH
SEGREGATION

Keith v. DeKalb County, Georgia, 749 F.3d 1034 (11th Cir. 2014). The administrator of the estate of a pretrial detainee who was murdered by a fellow inmate in a jail's mental health unit brought an action against a county, the county sheriff, and correctional officers, alleging under § 1983 that the defendants violated the detainee's substantive due process rights. The district court denied the sheriff's motion for summary judgment based on the doctrine of qualified immunity. The sheriff appealed. The appeals court reversed. The court held that while a correctional officer on duty at the time the detainee was murdered by a fellow inmate may have acted contrary to jail policy by using a cell phone within the jail, the administrator of the detainee's estate failed to show that the use of personal cell phones within the jail was a widespread problem or that the county sheriff was aware that officers routinely violated the policy and failed to correct the problem.

The court found that the sheriff was entitled to qualified immunity on the § 1983 due process claim that he was deliberately indifferent to the safety of the detainee, in failing to segregate mental health inmates with violent histories from those with nonviolent histories and by failing to separate mental health inmates charged with a violent crime from those charged with a nonviolent crime. According to the court, even if the sheriff violated the detainee's due process rights, it was not clearly established that he had a constitutional obligation to disregard the medical expertise of mental health contractors he hired to ensure that inmates' mental health was tended to. The court also found that the administrator of the estate of the detainee failed to show that the county sheriff was subjectively aware that the jail's policy of requiring detention officers to alert mental health staff when relocating mental health inmates to different cells within the same pod was disregarded on a widespread basis, as would have subjected the sheriff to supervisory liability under § 1983.

The court found that a prior isolated incident in which a pretrial detainee was killed by another inmate when the two were placed in the same cell in the jail's mental health pod did not provide requisite notice to the county sheriff that training provided to detention officers was constitutionally deficient, as would subject the sheriff to liability under § 1983 with respect to claims arising from the subsequent murder of a pretrial detainee by a fellow inmate in the same pod. (DeKalb County Jail, Georgia)

U.S. District Court
LIBERTY INTEREST

Little v. Municipal Corp., 51 F.Supp3d 473 (S.D.N.Y. 2014). State inmates brought a § 1983 action against a city and city department of correction officials, alleging Eighth Amendment and due process violations related to conditions of their confinement and incidents that occurred while they were confined. The defendants moved to dismiss for failure to state a claim. The district court granted the motion, finding that: (1) the inmates failed to state a municipal liability claim; (2) locking the inmates in cells that were flooding with sewage was not a sufficiently serious deprivation so as to violate the Eighth Amendment; (3) the inmates failed to state an Eighth Amendment claim based on the deprivation of laundry services; (4) the inmates failed to state that officials were deliberately indifferent to their conditions of confinement; (5) the inmates' administrative classification did not implicate their liberty interests protected by due process; and (6) cell searches did not rise to the level of an Eighth Amendment violation. The court noted that the cells flooded with sewage for up to eight-and-a-half hours, during which they periodically lacked outdoor recreation and food, was undeniably unpleasant, but it was not a significantly serious deprivation so as to violate the inmates' Eighth Amendment rights. According to the court, there was no constitutional right to outdoor recreation, and the inmates were not denied food entirely, but rather, were not allowed to eat during periods of lock-down. (N.Y. City Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
MENTAL HEALTH
HANDICAPPED INMATE

Meeks v. Schofield, 10 F.Supp.3d 774 (M.D.Tenn. 2014). A state prisoner, who allegedly suffered from paruresis, a mental anxiety disorder that made it difficult to urinate without complete privacy, brought an action against the Commissioner of the Tennessee Department of Correction, its Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) officer, a housing unit supervisor, a grievance board chairman, and a warden, asserting § 1983 claims for First Amendment retaliation and violation of his right to privacy, and alleging violations of the ADA and Title VII. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The court held that the prisoner failed to establish retaliation claims against the ADA officer, the housing unit supervisor, and the warden. The court found that the prisoner, who was assisting other inmates with their legal work, was not engaged in "protected conduct," as required to establish a First Amendment retaliation claim against the housing unit supervisor, where the prisoner was not authorized to help other inmates with legal work, and thus was in violation of department policy. According to the court, the state prison's decision to remove exterior bathroom doors and refusal to put at least one door back to accommodate the prisoner, who allegedly suffered from paruresis, a mental anxiety disorder that made it difficult to urinate without complete privacy, was not intentionally discriminatory and did not violate the ADA.

The court held that the transfer of the prisoner to a medical housing unit did not result in denial of access to prison programs and services available to the general population, so as to support an ADA claim of discrimination on the basis of a perceived disability. The court noted that the transfer was intended to accommodate the prisoner's complaints about bathroom doors being removed in the general housing unit, and the prisoner was allowed to continue his prison job, have access to the law library, and participate in the same activities he was allowed to participate in while he was housed with the general population. (Lois M. DeBerry Special Needs Facility, Tennessee)

U.S. District Court
RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

Sherley v. Thompson, 69 F.Supp.3d 656 (W.D.Ky. 2014). A state prisoner filed a pro se § 1983 action against the Commissioner of the Kentucky Department of Corrections (DOC), a prison warden, and other prison officials, alleging that his conditions of confinement violated his Eighth Amendment rights, that he was deprived of medical treatment in violation of the Eighth Amendment, and was subjected to race discrimination in violation of the Equal Protection Clause. The district court dismissed the case, in part. The court held that the prisoner stated claims against the warden and prison administrators for violation of his equal protection rights and his conditions of confinement. According to the court, the prisoner stated an Eighth Amendment claim against one prison nurse by alleging that the nurse failed to provide him with appropriate medical treatment for ant bites he sustained, due to his inability to pay for treatment. The prisoner alleged that the prison had a policy or custom of segregating blacks and non-blacks, and that prison officials refused to place him in a non-black cell to get away from pests in his cell. The court held that the administrators allowed ants to infest his cell for weeks and that as a result, he received ant bites that caused him to scratch until his skin was broken due to severe itching, in violation of his conditions of confinement rights under § 1983 and the Eighth Amendment. (Little Sandy Correctional Complex, Green River Correctional Complex, Kentucky)

U.S. District Court
FAILURE TO PROTECT
CELL ASSIGNMENT
GANGS
SEPARATION

Thornton v. Jackson, 998 F.Supp.2d 1365 (N.D.Ga. 2014). An inmate and his wife brought a § 1983 action against various prison employees and officials, alleging violations of the Eighth Amendment, as well as negligence and intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED). The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The court held that the inmate, who was housed at the prison as a visiting-inmate while testifying against another member of the inmate's gang, was not incarcerated under conditions posing a substantial risk of harm, as required to establish the objective requirement for his § 1983 claim against various prison officials and employees. The inmate alleged violation of the Eighth Amendment after he was assaulted by three other inmates. The inmate claimed that his different color jumpsuit identified him as snitch and as a target for violence. The court noted that the prison's inmates did not have a history of attacking visiting inmates, the prison had an order requiring the inmate be kept separate from one other inmate, but did not require protective custody or isolation, the inmate did not have problems with anybody for seven days, and the inmate saw some other inmates talking and reported that he suspected that they were talking about him, but he did not hear what they were saying. (Fulton County Jail, Atlanta)

U.S. Appeals Court
LIBERTY INTEREST
MENTALLY ILL
SOLIARY CONFINEMENT
SPECIAL NEEDS

Townsend v. Cooper, 759 F.3d 678 (7th Cir. 2014). An inmate suffering from a significant mental illness brought a § 1983 action against prison officials, claiming that imposition of a behavior action plan in response to the inmate's disruptive behavior and threats of suicide violated his Fourteenth Amendment due process rights, deprived him of the minimal civilized measure of life's necessities and exhibited an indifference to his serious medical needs in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The district court granted summary judgment for the prison officials and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, vacated in part, and remanded. The court held that the behavior action plan resulted in an atypical and significant hardship compared to ordinary prison life, and thus, the inmate had a liberty interest in not being placed on the plan sufficient to support his Fourteenth Amendment due process challenge against the prison officials, where the plan involved removal of the inmate's personal property from his cell, provision of a bag lunch, provision of a paper gown, and limited access to toiletries. The court found that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether prison officials acted in disregard of a substantial risk of serious harm to the inmate, and a fact issue as to whether the behavior action plan was imposed for safety reasons or as a disciplinary measure.

The court found that prison psychologists were not deliberately indifferent to the serious medical needs of the inmate when they placed the inmate on the behavior action plan, where the psychologists repeatedly visited the inmate, regularly adjusted the inmate's access to property that he could use to harm himself, and repeatedly placed the inmate on observation status to ensure his safety when he was suicidal. (Green Bay Correctional Institution, Wisconsin)

U.S. Appeals Court
SOLIARY CONFINEMENT
LENGTH OF SEGREGATION
LIBERTY INTEREST

Wilkerson v. Goodwin, 774 F.3d 845 (5th Cir. 2014). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against prison officials, asserting procedural due process violations relating to his lengthy and continuing incarceration in solitary confinement. The district court denied the officials' motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity. The officials appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the prisoner's solitary confinement constituted an atypical and significant hardship in relation to the ordinary incidents of prison life, such that a due-process liberty interest in avoiding the deprivation arose. The court noted that the prisoner's incarceration in solitary confinement was approaching an extraordinary 39 years, including 35 years before his transfer to the current prison, the prisoner's solitary confinement was effectively indefinite, and restrictions during solitary confinement were severe, including cell isolation for 23 hours per day, limited physical exercise, and limited human contact. (David Wade Correctional Facility, Louisiana)

2015

U.S. Appeals Court
TEMPERATURE

Ball v. LeBlanc, 792 F.3d 584 (5th Cir. 2015). Death row inmates brought a § 1983 action against a state department of corrections and state officials, seeking declaratory and injunctive relief based on allegations that heat in the prison violated the Eighth Amendment, the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), and the Rehabilitation Act (RA). Following a bench trial, the district court sustained the Eighth Amendment claims, rejected the disability claims, and issued a permanent injunction requiring the state to install air conditioning throughout death row. The department and officials appealed and the inmates cross-appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, vacated and remanded in part. The court held that: (1) the district court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence of, or relying on heat index measurements of death-row facilities; (2) the district court did not clearly err in finding that heat in death-row cells posed a substantial risk of serious harm to inmates and that prison officials were deliberately indifferent to the risk posed to death-row inmates by the heat in prison cells; (3) housing of death-row inmates in very hot prison cells without sufficient access to heat-relief measures violated the Eighth Amendment; (4) inmates were not disabled under ADA or RA; and (5) permanent injunctive relief requiring the state to install air conditioning throughout death-row housing violated the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA), where acceptable remedies short of facility-wide air conditioning were available. (Department of Public Safety and Corrections, Louisiana State Penitentiary)

U.S. District Court CROWDING ADA- Americans with Disabilities Act SANITATION FLOOR-SLEEPING	Bell v. Lindsay, 116 F.Supp.3d 511 (D. Md. 2015). A pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action alleging that officers used excessive force when arresting him, in violation of the Fourth Amendment, and that prison employees subjected him to overcrowded conditions of confinement and manifested deliberate indifference to his medical needs, in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The defendants moved to dismiss for failure to state claim. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the detainee: (1) failed to state a conditions of confinement claim based on overcrowding; and (2) failed to state a claim under Title II of Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), absent allegations that the detainee was disabled, that he was denied any benefit of prison’s services, programs, or activities, and that any such exclusion or denial was by reason of his disability. According to the court, the detainee’s allegations that he was placed into a holding room at the prison with 25 to 30 inmates without a toilet or sink and forced to sleep on the floor failed to state a § 1983 Fourteenth Amendment conditions of confinement claim, absent allegations that the detainee was in the holding room for any substantial period of time, or that employees were personally involved in the violation of detainee’s constitutional rights. (George W. Hill Correctional Facility, Maryland)
U.S. District Court CELL ASSIGNMENT PRETRIAL DETAINEES	Bloom v. Toliver, 133 F.Supp.3d 1314 (N.D. Okla. 2015). A pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against a jail’s administrator, shift supervisors, detention officer, and county sheriff, alleging violations of his Fourth, Eighth, and Fourteenth Amendment rights in connection with an attack on him by another inmate while being transferred from a holding cell to a segregation cell. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the jail shift supervisor who made the decision to move the pretrial detainee from a holding cell to a segregation cell did so with a desire to punish the detainee, in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment’s due process clause. The supervisor admitted that there were cells other than the one where the detainee was moved, and testified that his intent in moving the detainee “was to discipline [the detainee] Bloom,” and that placement in any of the other cells “wouldn’t have been disciplinary.” The court also found that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the jail’s detention officer violated the pretrial detainee’s Fourteenth Amendment right to be protected from substantial risks of assault from other inmates by moving him from the holding cell to a segregation cell in which another inmate was being held.(Creek County Criminal Justice Center Oklahoma)
U.S. District Court SEPARATION MEDICAL CARE	Brown v. Moore, 93 F.Supp.3d 1032 (W.D. Ark. 2015). An inmate, proceeding pro se and in forma pauperis, brought a § 1983 action against a sheriff and jail officials, alleging that his constitutional rights were violated. The defendants filed a motion for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by an issue of fact as to whether the inmate’s being housed with a prisoner who had a staph infection constituted deliberate indifference. The court held that summary judgment on the inmate’s First Amendment claim was precluded by material issues of fact as to how many newspapers were distributed at the jail, how they were distributed, whether they were available on a daily basis, and who distributed the newspapers. (Boone County Detention Center, Arkansas)
U.S. District Court PRETRIAL DETAINEES SEPARATION	Cano v. City of New York, 119 F.Supp.3d 65 (E.D.N.Y. 2015). Pretrial detainees temporarily housed in a booking facility brought an action against a city and city officials under § 1983 alleging deliberate indifference to detainee health in violation of the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The defendants moved for summary judgment and the district court granted the motion. The court held that: (1) temporarily subjecting detainees to overcrowded jail cells was not deliberate indifference; (2) failure to provide sleeping equipment, such as beds, cots, pillows, blankets, or bedding was not deliberate indifference; (3) availability of only one toilet for 24 hours in each overcrowded holding cell was not deliberate indifference; (4) alleged failure to provide food and water was not deliberate indifference; (5) police officers were not subjectively aware of a risk to the detainees; (6) police officers did not act with punitive intent; (7) placement of pretrial detainees in jail cells with alleged rodent and insect infestations was not deliberate indifference; (8) placement of pretrial detainees in jail cells with alleged violent offenders that had limited police supervision, allegedly leading to fights, thefts, and bullying, was not deliberate indifference to detainee health; and (9) alleged exposure of pretrial detainees to extreme hot or cold temperature conditions in unventilated jail cells was not deliberate indifference to detainee health that would violate the right to provision of adequate medical treatment under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The court noted that the detainees were not kept in the cells for more than 24 hours, and were not harmed by the alleged overcrowding. (Brooklyn Central Booking, City of New York Police Department, New York)
U.S. Appeals Court DOUBLE-CELLING SEPARATION	Castro v. County of Los Angeles, 797 F.3d 654 (9th Cir. 2015). An arrestee brought an action against a county, its sheriff’s department, and two officers under § 1983 for violation of his Fourth Amendment right to be protected from harm by other inmates, arising out of an attack against the arrestee by another arrestee with whom he was jailed. A jury returned a verdict for the arrestee, and the district court denied the defendants’ motion for judgment as a matter of law. The defendants appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part and reversed in part. The court held that: (1) the right of inmates to be protected from attacks by other inmates was established with sufficient clarity to guide a reasonable officer; (2) substantial evidence supported the jury’s determination that the officer was deliberately indifferent to a substantial risk of serious harm to the arrestee; (3) sufficient evidence supported the jury’s determination that the officer’s deliberate indifference was the actual and proximate cause of harm to the arrestee; (4) sufficient evidence supported the jury’s determination that the supervising officer was aware of, but disregarded, the risk to the arrestee posed by the other inmate; (5) the design of a jail by a municipality is the result of a series of deliberate choices that render the design a formal municipal policy for the purposes of municipal liability under § 1983; (6) arrestee failed to establish that the county had actual knowledge of a risk of harm from the design of the jail, as required to establish liability under § 1983; and (7) the award of future damages to the arrestee was supported by the record. The jury returned a verdict for the arrestee on all counts and awarded him $2,605,632 in damages. The parties later stipulated to $840,000 in attorney fees,

$18,000 in punitive damages.

The arrestee had been placed in a “sobering cell” after his arrest for public drunkenness and was seriously injured by another drunken inmate in the sobering cell. When the other inmate was admitted, staff determined that he posed a threat to officers, requiring supervision by two officers at all times. The other arrestee was placed in the same cell as the plaintiff, even though the jail policy was to place combative inmates in a separate cell, and separate cells were available but left unused on the night of the incident. The court noted that the arrestee submitted billing records from his cognitive assistant and his treating psychologist and a chart detailing the charges for medical expenses he already had incurred, and proffered several medical experts who testified to his need for ongoing medical care. (Los Angeles Sheriff’s West Hollywood Station, California)

U.S. District Court
CELL ASSIGNMENT
FAILURE TO PROTECT
SEPARATION

Cotta v. County of Kings, 79 F.Supp.3d 1148 (E.D.Cal. 2015). An inmate’s mother, individually and as representative of the inmate’s estate, as well as the prisoner’s two daughters, brought an action against a county, and county jail officials, alleging that inadequate safety at the jail violated the inmate’s constitutional rights and ultimately led to his death when he was killed by a cellmate. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that: (1) the inmate’s due process right to protection from violence was violated; (2) the jail’s staffing policy on the night the inmate was murdered was not lacking, such that any need to remedy the staffing policy was not obvious; (3) an official’s decision to house the inmate together with the cellmate was a ministerial determination that was not entitled to immunity; (4) an official did not breach her duty of care to protect the inmate from any foreseeable harm; and (5) summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the county’s lack of a policy requiring its employees to report safety risks was the cause of the inmate’s murder and whether the county’s conduct shocked the conscience. (Kings County Jail, California)

U.S. Appeals Court
CUSTODY LEVEL
WORK
CELL ASSIGNMENT

Estate of Johnson v. Weber, 785 F.3d 267 (8th Cir. 2015). The estate of a state prison guard who was murdered by inmates who attempted to escape brought a § 1983 action in state court against various prison officials and the state department of corrections (DOC), alleging constitutional violations. The action was transferred to federal court. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants and the estate appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that state prison officials did not shock the conscience or act with deliberate indifference by housing two prisoners with violent criminal pasts, one with a history of multiple escapes and one with a history of planning an escape, in a medium security environment, and giving them job assignments which allowed the prisoners to move within the prison, and thus, the officials did not violate the substantive due process rights of the prison guard who was murdered by prisoners during their attempted escape. The court noted that the prisoners had no history of violence or threats while incarcerated before the murder, and one prisoner had worked in the prison for many years without creating any known threat of harm to any guard. (South Dakota State Penitentiary)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEGREGATION

Goguen v. Allen, 780 F.3d 437 (1st Cir. 2015). A pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against correctional officers, claiming that the defendants inflicted punishment on him without due process of law and retaliated against him for filing grievances, in violation of his rights under the First, Eighth, and Fourteenth Amendments. The district court denied summary judgment to the defendants on qualified immunity grounds. The defendants appealed. The appeals court dismissed the appeal. The court held that the district court’s determination that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to the motivations of the corrections officers in assigning a pretrial detainee to administrative segregation precluded granting the officers’ motion for a sovereign immunity-based summary judgment was not subject to appellate review, where the officers on appeal did not raise any purely legal issues that called into question the denial of their summary judgment motion based on qualified immunity, but rather raised challenges to the plaintiff’s evidence and recitation of facts. (Somerset County Jail, Maine)

U.S. Appeals Court
RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

Harrington v. Scribner, 785 F.3d 1299 (9th Cir. 2015). An African-American inmate brought a § 1983 action against state prison officials, alleging that a race-based lockdown at the prison violated his equal protection rights, and that he suffered injuries related to shower restrictions in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The district court entered judgment on a jury verdict in favor of the officials. The inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The court noted that racial classifications in prisons are immediately suspect and subject to strict scrutiny, for equal protection purposes, which requires the government to prove that the measures are narrowly tailored to further a compelling government interest. The court found that the jury instructions erroneously diluted the narrow tailoring requirement for the strict scrutiny test that applied to the race-based Equal Protection claim. (California State Prison–Corcoran)

U.S. District Court
CELL ASSIGNMENT
DOUBLE CELLING
MEDICAL CARE

Hendrick v. Wexford Health Sources, Inc., 141 F.Supp.3d 393 (D. Md. 2015). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against prison officials, medical staff, and the corporation that provided medical services to a prison, alleging that his reassignment from a single cell to a double cell in contravention of his medical needs violated his Eighth Amendment rights. The medical staff and corporation moved to dismiss or for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The court held that the prisoner’s allegations were insufficient to state a § 1983 claim against the private corporation that provided medical services to the prison, where the prisoner alleged no specific conduct by the corporation and did not allege a custom or policy of the corporation that resulted in a deprivation of his constitutional rights. The court found that medical providers did not act with deliberate indifference to serious medical needs of the prisoner, who suffered from papilledema and pseudotumor cerebri, by returning him to a double cell instead of a single cell as he requested, and thus did not violate the prisoner’s Eighth Amendment rights. The court noted that the medical director believed that having a cellmate would make the prisoner safer given his history of blacking out, there was no indication that the prisoner’s prior placement in a single cell was an absolute medical necessity, there was no indication that the prisoner’s cellmates threatened him or caused him any harm, and the prisoner’s subjective concerns for his safety

U.S. Appeals Court SOLITARY CONFINEMENT	were insufficient to show an excessive risk to his health and safety. (North Branch Correctional Inst., and Wexford Health Sources, Inc., Maryland) Incumaa v. Stirling, 791 F.3d 517 (4th Cir. 2015). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against the acting director of a state department of corrections, alleging violations of the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA) and Fourteenth Amendment procedural due process in his placement in solitary confinement for 20 year following his participation in a riot. The inmate was a member of the Nation of Gods and Earths (“NOGE”), also known as the “Five Percenters.” Prison policy required the inmate to renounce his affiliation with NOGE as a condition of being released from segregation. The inmate asserted that NOGE was a religion and that he was being asked to renounce his religion in order to be released from solitary confinement, in violation of RLUIPA. The district court granted the director’s motion for summary judgment and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The appeals court held that the prison policy did not force the inmate to choose between continued adherence to his religion or release from solitary confinement. But the court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the prison’s review process for inmates in solitary confinement was adequate. The court noted that the inmate was subject to near-daily cavity and strip searches, he was confined to a small cell for all sleeping and waking hours, aside from 10 hours of activity outside the cell per month, he was denied educational, vocational, and therapy programs, the inmate was socially isolated, and confinement was indefinite. (South Carolina Department of Corrections)
U.S. Appeals Court RELIGION CELL ASSIGNMENT	Jehovah v. Clarke, 798 F.3d 169 (4th Cir. 2015). A Christian inmate brought a § 1983 action against the Commonwealth of Virginia and various employees and contractors of the Virginia Department of Corrections (VDOC), alleging that the defendants violated his free exercise rights under the First Amendment and the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA) by prohibiting him from consuming wine during communion, requiring him to work on Sabbath days, and assigning him non-Christian cellmates. Following dismissal of some claims, the district court granted the defendants’ motion for summary judgment. The inmate appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by fact issues regarding the wine ban. The court also found that the inmate stated an RLUIPA claim based on cell assignment, a First Amendment claim based on cell assignment, and an Eighth Amendment deliberate indifference claim. The court noted that the inmate alleged that he was required to share a cell with a particular inmate who subjected him to “anti-Christian” rhetoric, and that he was “burdened, mocked, and harassed” on account of his religious views by being housed in a cell with that inmate. (Sussex I Prison, Waverly, Virginia)
U.S. District Court CIVIL COMMITMENT	Karsjens v. Jesson, 109 F.Supp.3d 1139 (D. Minn. 2015). Patients civilly committed to the Minnesota Sex Offender Program (MSOP) brought an action against various officials and employees of the MSOP pursuant to § 1983, asserting Fourteenth Amendment due process clause challenges to the Minnesota statute governing civil commitment and treatment of sex offenders. The district court granted the patients’ motion for class certification and granted in part and denied in part the officials’ motion to dismiss. After a bench trial, the court held that: (1) the patients had standing to bring a class action; (2) the statute was unconstitutional on its face; and (3) the statute was unconstitutional as applied. According to the court, each patient was harmed by not knowing whether he continued to meet the criteria for commitment through regular risk assessments, each patient was harmed by the program’s structural problems that resulted in delays, patients were deprived of their right to liberty, and a favorable decision would likely redress their injuries. The court noted that no patient had been released from MSOP in over 20 years and MSOP failed to initiate the petitioning process when it was aware that individual patients were likely to meet statutory discharge criteria. (Minnesota Sex Offender Program)
U.S. Appeals Court CUSTODY LEVEL TRANSFER	King v. Zamiara, 788 F.3d 207 (6th Cir. 2015). A prisoner brought an action against prison officials under § 1983, alleging First Amendment retaliation arising from his transfer to a higher security prison due to his participation in a state-court class action against the prison officials. After a bench trial, the district court found in favor of the prison officials. The appeals court reversed with respect to three officials. On remand, the district court entered judgment in favor of the prisoner and ordered compensatory damages and attorney fees, but denied the prisoner’s request for punitive damages and injunctive relief. Both parties appealed. The appeals court vacated and remanded. The court held that: (1) the district court properly awarded prisoner compensatory damages; (2) the district court’s award of compensatory damages to equal $5 a day for each day he was kept in a higher security prison was not a reversible error; (3) the district court relied on an incorrect legal standard in concluding that the prisoner was not entitled to punitive damages; (4) the prisoner was not entitled to injunctive relief requiring the department of corrections to remove certain documents from his file that allegedly violated his due process rights; and (5) the district court abused its discretion in failing to charge up to 25% of the attorney fees awarded to the prisoner against his compensatory damages award. (Conklin Unit at Brooks Correctional Facility, Chippewa Correctional Facility, Michigan)
U.S. District Court CLASSIFICATION CRITERIA DUE PROCESS SEGREGATION	Linton v. O’Brien, 142 F.Supp.3d 215 (D. Mass. 2015). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against the Commissioner of the Massachusetts Department of Corrections and prison officials, alleging that prison personnel violated his due process, equal protection, and 8th Amendment rights by not providing rehabilitative educational programs that awarded good time credits. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion, dismissing the complaint. The court held that prison officials’ refusal to allow the inmate, who was housed in a disciplinary unit, an opportunity to participate in educational and rehabilitative programs in order to earn good time credits to reduce his sentence, did not violate the inmate’s due process rights. According to the court, the inmate did not demonstrate that the officials’ exercise of discretion to not provide good time credit opportunities to inmates in a disciplinary unit constituted an imposition of an atypical and significant hardship not normally within range of confinement expected for an inmate serving an indeterminate term. The court noted that the exercise of discretion by the Department of Corrections in imposing different classifications upon inmates, with respect to restricting the ability of an inmate housed in a prison disciplinary unit to earn good time credits to reduce his sentence, did not lack a rational basis, was not otherwise based on suspect classification, and thus did not violate the inmate's equal protection rights. The court found that the DOC had a legitimate public purpose in allocating limited resources available for earned good time credit programs to inmates who were motivated to make best use of them by improving their chances for successful return to society and as an inducement to control and reduce those inmates' tendencies towards violence. (MCI—Cedar Junction, Massachusetts)

U.S. District Court
DOUBLE CELLING/
BUNKING

Perry v. Dickhaut, 125 F.Supp.3d 285 (D. Mass. 2015). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against prison officials and a prison nurse, asserting Eighth Amendment claims for excessive force in attempting to double-bunk the prisoner. The district court granted the motions in part and denied in part. The court held that prison officials did not act with deliberate indifference to the risk of serious harm from prisoner violence, as would violate the Eighth Amendment, by repeatedly double-bunking the prisoner in a cell with another prisoner. According to the court, there was no evidence that the officials knew or should have known that the prisoner and his cellmates were enemies, and making an exception to the double-bunk system for one inmate simply because he was purposefully disruptive would pose substantial risks for the overall management of prison. (Souza-Baranowski Correctional Center, Massachusetts)

U.S. District Court
MENTALLY ILL

Shorter v. Baca, 101 F.Supp.3d 876 (C.D. Cal. 2015). A pretrial detainee brought an action against a county, sheriff, and deputies, alleging under § 1983 that the defendants denied her medical care, subjected her to unsanitary living conditions, deprived her of food, clean clothes, and access to exercise, and conducted overly invasive searches. The detainee had been classified as mentally ill and housed in a mental health unit at the detention facility. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to what policies governed classification of pretrial detainees who were mentally ill. The court found that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether jail conditions imposed on the detainee, including permitting the detainee, who was incarcerated for 32 days, to shower only three times, only permitting the detainee outside of her cell for recreation on one occasion, failing to clean her cell, failing to provide the detainee with clean clothing, and depriving the detainee of food, amounted to punishment. (Century Regional Detention Facility, Los Angeles County, California)

U.S. Appeals Court
RACIAL DISCRIMINATION
CELL ASSIGNMENT
RELIGION

Walker v. Beard, 789 F.3d 1125 (9th Cir. 2015). A state prisoner brought an action against prison officials challenging their classification of him as eligible to occupy a prison cell with an individual of a different race, alleging that such placement would interfere with his religious practice as an Aryan Christian Odinist, violating his rights under the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA) and the First Amendment. The district court held that the prison officials' actions did not violate the prisoner's rights. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that: (1) the Aryan Christian Odinist warding ritual was a "religious exercise" under RLUIPA; (2) prison officials' classification of the state prisoner under a housing policy substantially burdened the prisoner's ritual; (3) prison officials' compliance with constitutional restrictions on racial segregation in prisons was a compelling governmental interest under RLUIPA; (4) prison officials' refusal to exempt the prisoner from the housing policy's classification scheme was the least restrictive means of furthering a compelling interest, and thus the officials' actions did not violate the prisoner's rights under RLUIPA; and (5) prison officials' interest in complying with the Equal Protection Clause was reasonably related to legitimate penological interests, and thus the officials' refusal to exempt the state prisoner from the housing policy's classification scheme did not infringe on the prisoner's rights under the Free Exercise Clause of the First Amendment. (California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation)

2016

U.S. Appeals Court
MENTALLY ILL
CELL ASSIGNMENT
TRANSFER

Saylor v. Nebraska, 812 F.3d 637 (8th Cir. 2016). A state inmate filed a § 1983 action alleging that prison officials retaliated against him by transferring and reclassifying him, that the transfer and classification review process violated his due process rights, and that officials were deliberately indifferent to his post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD). The district court denied the officials' motion for summary judgment, and they appealed. The appeals court reversed. The court held that the prison's medical officials were not deliberately indifferent to the inmate's post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD), in violation of Eighth Amendment, despite the inmate's contention that treatment that occurred after his treating psychiatrist left the prison rose to the level of cruel and unusual punishment. The court noted that officials attempted to provide the inmate with another psychiatrist at the facility, ultimately found him another psychiatrist at a different facility, continued medication as they saw fit within their independent medical judgment, and gave him his requested private cell.

The court found that the officials' decision to transfer the inmate to another facility and to place him in administrative segregation was not in retaliation for his complaints about his medical care, in violation of the First Amendment, where the reason for the transfer was to provide the inmate with necessary psychiatric care after his treating psychiatrist's contract with the state ended and the inmate refused to meet with the facility's other psychiatrist. The court noted that the inmate was placed in administrative segregation because he refused to share a cell within any other prisoners, and there were no other private cells. (Nebraska Department of Correctional Services, Nebraska State Penitentiary, Tecumseh State Correctional Institution)

U.S. District Court
SEGREGATION
LENGTH OF SEGREGATION

Szubielski v. Pierce, 152 F.Supp.3d 227 (D. Del. 2016). A state prisoner, acting pro se and in forma pauperis (IFP), brought a § 1983 action against prison officials, relating to his continuing classification for solitary confinement. At the screening stage of the case, the district court held that the prisoner stated a First Amendment retaliation claim against a prison warden and an Eighth Amendment claim regarding conditions of confinement. The prisoner complained of 24-hour cell confinement, limited recreation, extreme social isolation, environmental deprivation, limited telephone calls, and limited visits. The prisoner suffered from schizophrenia, severe manic depression, and an anxiety disorder. The court found that the prisoner's allegations that the prison warden retaliated against him after a civil rights advocacy organization filed a lawsuit challenging solitary confinement of prisoners, by keeping the prisoner in solitary confinement despite a classification committee's reclassification of the prisoner for medium-security housing, stated a First Amendment retaliation claim. According to the court, the prisoner's allegations that his continued solitary confinement, which had already lasted nine years, involved extreme social isolation, inadequate medical care, limited recreation, and environmental deprivation, stated a claim the under the Eighth Amendment regarding conditions of confinement. (James T. Vaughn Correctional Center, Delaware)

SECTION 9: CONDITIONS OF CONFINEMENT

Detention and Corrections Caselaw Catalog All Rights Reserved
CRS Inc, 925 Johnson Dr., Gettysburg PA 17325 (717) 338-9100 www.correction.org/

The following pages present summaries of court decisions which address this topic area. These summaries provide readers with highlights of each case, but are not intended to be a substitute for the review of the full case. The cases do not represent all court decisions which address this topic area, but rather offer a sampling of relevant holdings.

The decisions summarized below were current as of the date indicated on the title page of this edition of the Catalog. Prior to publication, the citation for each case was verified, and the case was researched in Shepard's Citations to determine if it had been altered upon appeal (reversed or modified). The Catalog is updated annually. An annual supplement provides replacement pages for cases in the prior edition which have changed, and adds new cases. Readers are encouraged to consult the Topic Index to identify related topics of interest. The text in the section entitled "How to Use The Catalog" at the beginning of the Catalog provides an overview which may also be helpful to some readers.

The case summaries which follow are organized by year, with the earliest case presented first. Within each year, cases are organized alphabetically by the name of the plaintiff. The left margin offers a quick reference, highlighting the type of court involved and identifying appropriate subtopics addressed by each case.

1944

U.S. Appeals Court
RIGHTS RETAINED Coffin v. Reichard, 143 F.2d 443 (6th Cir. 1944). A prisoner retains all rights of an ordinary citizen except those expressly, or by necessity taken from him by law. (United States Public Health Service Hospital, Lexington, Kentucky)

1970

U.S. District Court
ISOLATION Davis v. Lindsay, 321 F.Supp. 1134 (S.D. N.Y. 1970). Incarceration in isolation and under certain circumstance violates the eighth amendment. (City Jail, New York)

U.S. District Court
BEDDING
KITCHEN Hamilton v. Schiro, 338 F.Supp. 1016 (E.D. La. 1970). Fact that mattresses issued to inmates were not cleaned contributes to court's finding of constitutional violation. Unsanitary condition of jail kitchen contributes to court's finding of constitutional violation. (Orleans Parish Prison, Louisiana)

U.S. District Court
ISOLATION
DORMITORIES LABOR
RACIAL DISCRIMINATION
PROGRAMS
TRUSTY SYSTEM Holt v. Sarver, 309 F.Supp. 362 (E.D. Ark. 1970). State prisoners challenged conditions and practices in the state prison system. The district court held that conditions and practices in the Arkansas penitentiary system, including a trusty system whereby trustees ran the prison, open barracks system, conditions in isolation cells, and absence of a meaningful rehabilitation program, were such that confinement of persons in the system amounted to cruel and unusual punishment prohibited by eighth and fourteenth amendments. Forced uncompensated labor of state convicts did not violate thirteenth amendment. The Arkansas system of working convicts was not "slavery" in the constitutional sense of term. To the extent that unconstitutional racial discrimination was being practiced in state prison system, such discrimination was to be eliminated. The fourteenth amendment prohibits racial discrimination within prisons, and the prohibition extends to racial segregation of inmates. Confinement in an otherwise unexceptional penal institution is not unconstitutional simply because institution does not operate a school, or provide vocational training or other rehabilitative facilities and services, but the absence of an affirmative program of training and rehabilitation may have constitutional significance where in the absence of such program conditions and practices exist which actually militate against reform and rehabilitation. Term "cruel and unusual punishment" cannot be defined with specificity. It is flexible and tends to broaden as society tends to pay more regard to human decency and dignity and becomes, or likes to think that it becomes, more humane. Generally speaking, punishment that amounts to torture, when it is grossly excessive in proportion to the offense for which it is imposed, or that is inherently unfair, or that is unnecessarily degrading, or that is shocking or disgusting to people of reasonable sensitivity is a "cruel and unusual punishment"; and punishment that is not inherently cruel and unusual may become so by reason of the manner in which it is inflicted. Elimination of a trusty system under which trustees had unsupervised power over other inmates was essential to the establishment of prison system meeting constitutional standards. (Arkansas Prison System)

1971

U.S. Supreme Court
CHALLENGES Wilwording v. Swenson, 404 U.S. 249 (1971) (Per Curiam). A state habeas corpus petition by inmates confined in maximum security at the Missouri State Penitentiary challenging conditions and disciplinary measures, but not seeking release, is dismissed. The inmates then brought a federal habeas corpus action. While state habeas corpus proceedings were exhausted, the District Court for the Western District of Missouri dismissed the complaint on the grounds that 28 U.S.C. Section 2254 had not been satisfied as the inmates had not invoked any of a number of possible state remedies. The Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed and the inmates petitioned the Supreme Court for a writ of certiorari. (Reversed and Remanded.)

HELD: The exhaustion requirement of 28 U.S.C. Section 2254 is merely an accommodation of the federal system designed to give the state an initial opportunity to pass upon and correct alleged violations of its prisoners' federal rights; and regardless of the remedy involved, Missouri courts have not granted a single hearing on conditions of confinement in state prisons. 404 U.S. at 250.

HELD: The inmates pleading challenging conditions of confinement may also be used to plead cases of action under 42 U.S.C. Section 1983 to which exhaustion of remedies does not apply. 404 U.S. at 251. (State Penitentiary, Missouri)

1972

U.S. District Court
BEDDING
LAUNDRY
CLOTHING

Hamilton v. Landrieu, 351 F.Supp. 549 (E.D. La. 1972). Every existing mattress shall be disposed of and new mattresses procured, replaced annually, and linen shall be laundered at least once a week. Court ordered that all prisoners be clothed in prison uniforms so that inmates could be readily distinguished from employees and visitors. Each defendant not having a change of clothing would be provided one. (Orleans Parish Prison, Louisiana)

U.S. District Court
STATE REQUIREMENTS

Taylor v. Sterrett, 344 F.Supp. 411 (N.D. Tex. 1972), reh'g denied, 420 U.S. 983 (1974). Where conditions of confinement do not meet the minimum requirements of state statutes, the court need not reach the subjective criteria of cruel and unusual punishment. (Dallas County Jail, Texas)

1974

U.S. District Court
STATE REQUIREMENTS

Campise v. Hamilton, 382 F.Supp. 172 (S.D. Tex. 1974), cert denied, 429 U.S. 1102 (1976). Sheriff knew or should have known that the prisoner was kept under inhumane conditions and is liable under Section 1983, which incorporates state standards. (Brazos County Jail, Texas)

1975

U.S. District Court PUNITIVE
SEGREGATION
MEDICAL CARE

Craig v. Hocker, 405 F.Supp. 656 (D. Nev., 1975). Prisoners brought action against the warden and others challenging various aspects of prison administration and the discipline of prisoners. The district court held: (1) that prisoners who were subject to disciplinary proceedings were entitled to certain due process rights; (2) that the classification process could not be equated with disciplinary proceedings for the purposes of due process; (3) that prisoners were entitled to access to courts and to the availability of certain legal material; (4) that prisoners were not being denied medical care and treatment; (5) that certain aspects of punitive segregation cells constituted cruel and unusual punishment; (6) that statutes providing for prison confinement of mentally ill persons for security reasons were unconstitutional; and (7) that the prisoners were not entitled to damages. (Nevada State Prison)

U.S. District Court
DINING

Dillard v. Pitches, 399 F.Supp. 1225 (C.D. Calif. 1975). Fact that jail had no dining hall to accommodate prisoners and that prisoners were thus forced to eat standing up in halls or in their cells contributes to court's finding of constitutional violation. (Los Angeles County Jail, California)

U.S. District Court
REMEDIES

Miller v. Carson, 401 F.Supp. 835 (M.D. Fla. 1975), aff'd, 563 F.2d 741 (5th Cir. 1977). Where it can be shown that prison conditions are so bad as to constitute cruel and unusual punishment, the relief to be afforded may properly include an order compelling the provision of basic rehabilitative services and facilities. (Duval County Jail, Florida)

1976

U.S. District Court
DEFENSES

Rodriguez v. Jiminez, 409 F.Supp. 582 (D. P.R. 1976). Inadequate resources can never be an adequate justification for the state's depriving persons of constitutional rights. (San Juan District Jail)

1977

U.S. Appeals Court
DEFENSES

Smith v. Sullivan, 553 F.2d 373 (5th Cir. 1977). Fiscal shortages are no defense to constitutional violations. (El Paso County Jail, Texas)

U.S. District Court
MEDICAL CARE
LEGAL ASSISTANCE

Ward v. Johnson, 437 F.Supp. 1053 (E.D. Vir. 1977). In an action by a state prisoner under the 1871 civil rights statute, the district court held that: (1) the prisoner's claims that he was unjustly transferred from one state prison to another, that his transfer was accomplished without approval of a central classification board, that his personal property was sent to his home and he had to purchase similar items from the prison commissary and that he was defamed by a correctional officer and threatened by a correctional officer, failed to state any claim cognizable in federal court; (2) in view of an uncontroverted affidavit by a person allegedly depriving the plaintiff of his right to legal assistance in prison, the affidavit explaining that use of the prison law library was permitted on a first come, first served basis, the prisoner's allegation of denial of access to legal assistance failed to state a claim for relief, and (3) questions of medical judgment are not subject to judicial review, and a prisoner cannot be the ultimate judge of what medical treatment is necessary and appropriate for him. States, not federal courts are supervisors of state prisons, and federal court will intervene only to protect constitutional interests. Under Virginia law, prisoners have no liberty interest in remaining in particular prison. (Virginia Department of Corrections)

1978

U.S. District Court
ISOLATION
CELLS

Bono v. Saxbe, 450 F.Supp. 934 (E.D. Ill., 1978). Prisoners confined in the control unit of the Marion Federal Penitentiary brought an action challenging the conditions of their confinement. The district court held that: (1) prisoners did not have a fundamental liberty interest in remaining in the general prison population but did have an interest protected by due process as a result of the prison's own rules; (2) placement of prisoners in the control unit, which was done for preventative and not punitive reasons, could not be based on the crime for which the prisoner was convicted or on the possibility of escape since every inmate in the Marion institution was a potential candidate for escape; (3) prisoners placed in the control unit were entitled to written notice of hearing, written reason, impartial decision making, and immediate and later periodic review; (4) prisoners were entitled to be told what affirmative actions they could take to expedite their release from the control unit, and (5) conditions of confinement in the control unit were not cruel and unusual punishment except for the use of closed-front cells. (Federal Penitentiary, Marion, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
DOUBLE CELLING
CELL CAPACITY
TOTALITY OF CONDITIONS
ISOLATION
CROWDING

Burks v. Walsh, 461 F.Supp. 454 (W.D. Missouri, 1978). Actions were brought seeking injunctive and declaratory relief on behalf of inmates at the Missouri State Penitentiary. After a trial limited to the issues of overcrowding and unsanitary conditions, the District Court held that: (1) triple celling inmates in 59.2-square-foot cells in the diagnostic center, in 65-square-foot cells in the administrative segregation unit, and in 66-square-foot cells in the adjustment unit, as well as double celling of inmates in 47.18-square-foot cells in the special treatment unit, constituted cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the eighth amendment, but (2) except in such instances, the conditions in the aggregate which presently existed at the State Penitentiary did not violate the cruel and unusual punishment clause of the eighth amendment.

In examining conditions of state penitentiary, the court's inquiry had to be limited to determining whether conditions at the penitentiary caused inmates to suffer deprivations of constitutional dimensions.

The eighth amendment's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment is not limited to specific acts directed at selected individuals, but is equally pertinent to general conditions of confinement; confinement itself will result in a finding of cruel and unusual punishment, however, only where confinement is characterized by conditions and practices so bad as to be shocking to the conscience of reasonably civilized people.

In determining whether conditions at the state penitentiary constituted cruel and unusual punishment, the district court had to be cautious not to place undue emphasis upon "design capacities" and minimum square footage mandates of other courts, nor were minimum square footage standards of various professional associations dispositive; furthermore, in applying the "totality of circumstances" approach to Missouri Penitentiary conditions, the relaxed amicable atmosphere generated by the prison administration had to tip scales in favor of the state in areas of doubtful constitutionality.

In the aggregate, and with certain exceptions regarding overcrowding in certain units, all conditions presently existing at Missouri State Penitentiary, including but not limited to conditions and qualities of individual cells, showers, toilets, dining halls, kitchen, windows, temperature, noise level, canteen, recreational areas, laundry service, ventilation systems, visiting room, pest control program, prison industries and other activities, are not intolerable in light of the modern conscience, or shocking to the conscience of the court, and thus do not violate cruel and unusual punishment clause of the eighth amendment.

The Missouri State Penitentiary is overcrowded but, because it has so much acreage within the walls, because of the many and varied activities available to inmates, and because of the relative freedom enjoyed by inmates to utilize recreational areas and the many activities available to them, the penitentiary, viewed as a whole, is not now so overcrowded as to be intolerable, inhumane, totally unreasonable in light of the modern conscience, or shocking to the conscience of the court.

Double celling of penitentiary inmates in 65-square-foot cells in administrative segregation unit was not intolerable, inhumane, totally unreasonable or shocking to the court's conscience where common areas of unit were very clean and sanitary, individual cells were reasonably clean and sanitary, and the unit was utilized to punish those inmates who committed serious offenses while confined in penitentiary.

Double celling of state penitentiary inmates in diagnostic unit cells measuring 59.2 square feet for period of one to five weeks did not violate the eighth amendment, in spite of the fact that inmates were confined to their cells for greater portion of day than were inmates in general population, where they could leave their cells three times daily for meals, once a week to go to canteen, once a week to go to movies, and once a week for two hours of gym and where, in addition, much of their time was occupied by meetings with caseworkers, taking a battery of tests and physical examinations. (Missouri State Penitentiary)

U.S. Supreme Court PUNITIVE
SEGREGATION

Hutto v. Finney, 437 U.S. 678 (1978), reh'g. denied, 439 U.S. 1122. Finding that conditions in the Arkansas prison system constitute cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the eighth and fourteenth amendments, a U.S. district court issued a series of detailed remedial orders. Two aspects of that relief were challenged on appeal to the Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals: 1) an order placing a maximum limit of thirty days on punitive isolation and 2) an award of attorney's fees to be paid out of the Department of Corrections' funds, based on the lower court's finding that officials had acted in bad faith in failing to remedy identified problems. The Eighth Circuit affirmed and certiorari from the U.S. Supreme Court was sought by state officials. (Affirmed.)

HELD: "[W]e find no error in the inclusion of a thirty day limitation on sentences to punitive isolation as a part of the district court's comprehensive remedy." 437 U.S. at 688.

NOTE: This holding was unquestionably based on the particular facts presented by this case, and it would be error to interpret this as the U.S. Supreme Court's position on length of punitive isolation. (Arkansas Prison System)

U.S. District Court
DOUBLE CELLING
CELL CAPACITY
MEDICAL CARE
CROWDING

M.C.I. Concord Advisory Bd. v. Hall, 447 F.Supp. 398 (D. Mass, 1978). In a civil rights action brought to challenge conditions of confinement at a state correctional institution, the district court held that: (1) plaintiff prisoners sustained the burden of proving that incarceration of inmates in protective custody cells, in awaiting action cells and in institutional holding cells violated eighth amendment standards, but (2) plaintiffs failed to sustain their burden of proving that double celling in one area and use of a hospital wardroom for a dormitory violated eighth amendment standards. Injunctive relief was granted in part.

An eighth amendment proscription against cruel and unusual punishment is flexible, drawing its meaning from evolving standards of decency that mark the progress of maturing society, and penal measures are to be evaluated against broad and idealistic concepts of dignity, civilized standards, humanity and decency.

An equal protection challenge to a policy under which inmates undergoing classification and placement at state institutions were single-celled in contrast to double celling during classification at one institution involved neither suspect classification nor fundamental interest, and a heavy burden rested with plaintiff prisoners to demonstrate that no rational justification existed for separate classification programs.

Nothing in the constitution requires prison officials to treat all inmate groups alike where differentiation may avoid institutional disruption or violence.

Actions of prison officials in separating newly admitted inmates and protective custody prisoners from the general prison population are subject to a basic due process requirement that such distinctions be rational rather than arbitrary or capricious, but, on record, the method of classifying inmates within this particular institution was not shown to be arbitrary or capricious.

Prisoners failed to sustain burden of proof that dormitory use of a hospital wardroom violated constitutional rights of inmates who slept therein and failed to show that use of the wardroom infringed on constitutional rights of inmates to adequate medical care. (M.C.I. Concord, Mass.)

1979

U.S. Supreme Court
DOUBLE CELLING CAPACITY
DEFENSES

Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520 (1979). Pretrial detainees confined in the Metropolitan Correction Center (MCC) in New York City challenged virtually every facet of the institution's conditions and practices in a writ of habeas corpus, alleging such conditions and practices violate their constitutional rights.

MCC is a federally operated, short-term detention facility constructed in 1975; Eighty-five percent of all inmates are released within sixty days of admission. MCC was intended to include the most advanced and innovative features of modern design in detention facilities. The key design element of the facility is the "modular" or "unit" concept, whereby each floor housing inmates has one or two self-contained residential units, as opposed to the traditional cellblock jail construction. Within four months of the opening of the twelve-story, 450 inmate capacity facility, this action was initiated.

The U.S. District Court for the Southern District of N.Y. enjoined no less than twenty practices at the MCC on constitutional and statutory grounds, many of which were not appealed. See, United States Ex Rel Wolfish v. Levi, 439 F.Supp. 114 (S.D.N.Y.). The Second Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed the district court decision, See, Wolfish v. Levi, 573 F.2d 118 (2d Cir. 1978), and reasserted the "compelling-necessity" test as the standard for determining limitations on a detainee's freedom.

The U.S. Supreme Court granted certiorari "to consider the important constitutional questions raised by [recent prison decisions] and to resolve an apparent conflict among the circuits." 441 U.S. at 524: Do the publisher-only rule, the prohibition on receiving packages from outside sources, the search of living quarters, and the visual inspection of body cavities after contact visits constitute punishment in violation of the rights of pretrial detainees under the due process clause of the fifth amendment?

HELD: "Nor do we think that the four MCC security restrictions and practices...constitute 'punishment' in violation of the rights of pretrial detainees under the due process clause of the fifth amendment." 441 U.S. at 560, 561.

REASONING: a. [T]he determination whether these restrictions and practices constitute punishment in the constitutional sense depends on whether they are rationally related to a legitimate nonpunitive governmental purpose and whether they appear excessive in relation to that purpose. 441 U.S. at 561.

b. Ensuring security and order at the institution is a permissible nonpunitive objective, whether the facility houses pretrial detainees, convicted inmates, or both...[W]e think that these particular restrictions and practices were reasonable responses by MCC officials to legitimate security concerns. [Detainees] simply have not met their heavy burden of showing that these officials have exaggerated their response to the genuine security considerations that activated these restrictions and practices. 441 U.S. at 561, 662.

CLOSING COMMENTS OF MAJORITY OPINION: "[T]he inquiry of federal courts into prison management must be limited to the issue of whether a particular system violates any prohibition of the constitution, or in the case of a federal prison, a statute. The wide range of 'judgment calls' that meet constitutional and statutory requirements are confided to officials outside of the judicial branch of government." 441 U.S. at 562.

GENERAL NOTES: The Court saw this case, a challenge to virtually every aspect of the operation of a state of the art detention facility, as an opportunity to clarify the judiciary's role in the operation of prisons. The five-four decision indicates there was no general consensus as to what that role is, or how it should be applied. No less than three possible standards of review are contained in the majority and dissenting opinions: 1) A "rational basis", subjective test; 2) A balancing of interests test; 3) An objective standard of review.

Despite J. Rehnquist's statement that "our analysis does not turn on the particulars of the MCC concept or design," the majority's reasoning frequently looks to that concept or design for justification of its positions. 441 U.S. at 525. Clearly, the "double-bunking" holding should be interpreted as applicable only to facilities where:

- a) Inmates are locked in their cells a maximum of eight hrs. a day and have access to a wide range of activities and programs; and
- b) No inmate is detained longer than sixty days.

Situations other than these likely will not fall within the strict holding on this issue. (Metropolitan Correction Center (MCC), New York)

U.S. District Court
SEPARATION DIVERSION

Doe v. Lally, 467 F.Supp. 1339 (D. Md. 1979). An inmate is entitled to be reasonably free from homosexual attack and to protection to maintain that freedom. The presence of such attacks on a regular basis violates the eighth amendment. Failure to separate the inmates in the diagnostic center from the general population inmates, which results in regular incidents of homosexual assault, borders on gross negligence and removes any good faith defense from the defendants. Since there is a new facility under construction, the court does not undertake to provide extensive relief, but does require the defendants to devise a plan to separate the diagnostic inmates from the institutional general population as much as practicable. While the court rejects a major order on classification in light of the impending new facility, it does require some attention to the classification process to attempt to avoid such attacks by preventing minimum security individuals from ever entering the facility and minimizing the length of stay in the facility. (Maryland Reception and Diagnostic Center)

U.S. District Court
CROWDING
CELLS
DORMITORIES

Feliciano v. Barcelo, 497 F.Supp. 14 (D.P.R. 1979). The institution is found to be overcrowded. The court orders that the housing shall immediately provide at least thirty-five square feet of space per inmate and that eventually, standards of seventy square feet per inmate in cells and fifty-five square feet per inmate in dormitories be implemented. (Correctional System, Puerto Rico)

State Appeals Court
ISOLATION
MEDICAL CARE
BEDDING

Pruitt v. Joiner, 395 N.E.2d 276 (1979). The Indiana Court of Appeals for the Third District has ruled that even where conditions of pretrial detention include "beatings, deprivation of food, detention in solitary cells without bedding, punishment without due process, and denial of medical care, visitation, and mailing privileges," the use of writ of habeas corpus is not a satisfactory method of obtaining relief. The court specifically refuted the broad use of habeas corpus in the federal system, which was argued by the appellants. "Indiana.. has not chosen to expand the interpretation, this state has taken the strict common law. By statute and judicial interpretation, this state has taken the strict common law position that habeas corpus may be used only to inquire into the legality of the cause of the restraint." Since the appellants did not challenge the legality of their restraint but rather the manner used to accomplish it, the court reversed the lower court decision.

In a dissenting opinion one of the three panel judges argued that such a separation of habeas corpus relief from due process considerations should not occur:

Not only has punishment been administered without a trial as required by due process of law, but the punishment administered here could be characterized as cruel and unusual even after trial and conviction...The petitioners are entitled to immediate relief from the Indiana courts. This is not a question of civil rights. It is a question of due process of law; under what conditions does a lawful executive commitment become unlawful as a violation of due process of law?

(Lake County Jail, Indiana)

1980

U.S. Appeals Court CHANGE OF CONDITIONS

Bono v. Saxbe, 620 F.2d 609 (7th Cir. 1980). While the institutional administration can change the conditions of confinement for administrative reasons as they see fit, they cannot incarcerate individuals under conditions which are violative of the eighth amendment regardless of whether the purpose is administrative or punitive. (Marion Federal Prison, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
EQUAL PROTECTION
WOMEN

Bukhari v. Hutto, 487 F.Supp. 1162 (E.D. Vir. 1980). The Court finds that the differences in programming and conditions between women's and men's facilities violates equal protection but pretermits any remedy. (Virginia Correctional Center for Women, Goodland)

U.S. Appeals Court
CELLS
DORMITORIES

Campbell v. Cauthron, 623 F.2d 503 (8th Cir. 1980). The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit ruled that the county jail shall provide 130-154 square feet of space for four inmates detained more than sixteen hours per day. The same space must be available where three are held, if they are detained more than one week. (Sebastian County Jail, Arkansas)

U.S. District Court
CROWDING

Capps v. Atiyeh, 495 F.Supp. 802 (D. Ore. 1980). The court suggests a five part test to determine whether overcrowding is unconstitutional:

1. The duration of prison confinement;
2. The degree to which the population exceeds the institution's design capacity;
3. The size of the living quarters and the number of hours that an inmate must spend therein;
4. The effects of the increased population on the prisoner's mental and physical health;
5. The relative permanency of the overcrowding.

The court finds the institution to be overcrowded and accepts the defendants' plan to relieve the overcrowding without necessarily endorsing any portion of it. (Oregon State Penitentiary)

U.S. District Court
MEDICAL CARE
FOOD

Green v. Ferrell, 500 F.Supp. 870 (S.D. Miss. 1980), rev'd, 664 F.2d 1292. A Mississippi District Court Judge had dismissed a suit brought by inmates of the Adams County, Mississippi Jail. On appeal, the higher court ordered the case to continue. The inmates challenged conditions at the jail, which was built in 1978 at a cost of $2,000,000. Among the inmate's complaints were cold food, inadequate medical care, improper mail regulations and unsatisfactory classification procedures. In addition, one inmate alleged that he received constitutionally inadequate medical care and offered a sworn affidavit from a physician in support of his claim. Regarding the general claims brought by the inmates, the court ruled in favor of the jail administration on every item.

The court also ruled that the inmate with the malpractice charge had failed to state a claim of constitutional significance. Notwithstanding the physician's affidavit, that the man had not received optimum medical care, the court ruled that the claim was not sufficient to confer jurisdiction. It stated that in order to confer jurisdiction on the court, the inmate was required to demonstrate nothing less than "deliberate indifference" to his medical needs. Estelle v. Gamble 429 U.S. 97 (1976). The court further noted that the standard used in civil rights claims is higher than that for medical malpractice claims.

The disciplinary procedure complied with due process. There is no constitutional right for jail inmates who only lose privileges to have any disciplinary system whatsoever. (Adams County Jail, Mississippi)

U.S. District Court
SANITATION
FIRE SAFETY
VENTILATION
WINDOWS

Hutchings v. Corum, 501 F.Supp. 1276 (W.D. Mo. 1980). Class action is brought challenging the constitutionality of numerous conditions and practices at the county jail. The district court held that: (1) prison authorities' failure to immediately evacuate inmates from any sewage contaminated cell, pending thorough cleaning of cell, violated constitutional rights of inmates subject to that condition; (2) deficiencies in jail, including lack of fire escape, absence of windows, lack of necessary fire doors, and limited number of fire extinguishers amounted to constitutionally intolerable conditions. Prison conditions for an unconvicted person are to be judged against due process standards of the fifth and fourteenth amendments and conditions within the penal institution which are unconstitutional for the convicted person under eighth amendment review are likewise an abridgment of due process guarantees afforded unconvicted persons.

The claim that financial restrictions have prevented improvements in jail conditions is not a defense to constitutional violations.

Although lights were left on all night in the county jail, and there was a high noise level at night, such were not per se unconstitutional conditions, since inmates could sleep during the day, and there was no indication that inmates had developed psychological or physiological problems.

An entirely inadequate ventilation system at the county jail constituted a constitutionally intolerable living condition.

Deficiencies in the county jail, including lack of fire escapes, absence of windows, lack of necessary fire doors, and limited number of fire extinguishers amounted to constitutionally intolerable conditions.

Failure of county jail authorities to provide each inmate one hour per day of exercise outside cells was a constitutionally intolerable condition. (Clay County Jail, Missouri)

U.S. District Court
SEPARATION

Morris v. Travisono, 499 F.Supp. 149 (D. R.I. 1980). The court held that: (1) prior consent judgment establishing regulations governing disciplinary, classification, and mail procedures at state prisons would not be vacated, either on basis of reversal or prior judgment upon which the consent judgment was allegedly based or on basis of claimed changes in factual circumstances; (2) evidence established that violations of such regulations occurred in the officials' failure to devise treatment and rehabilitation plan for inmate, in officials' failure to provide the prisoner with certain privileges due an inmate classified in category in which the prisoner was classified, and the officials' employment of inappropriate criteria in continuing to classify the prisoner in such category; and (3) prison officials' failure to enumerate more specific criteria than that contained in the prior consent judgment in order to evaluate the prisoner's classification status did not deny the prisoner due process of law. The use of segregation, per se, does not violate the eighth amendment even where the period of segregation for a particular inmate extends into years. (Adult Correctional Institution, Rhode Island)

U.S. District Court
HEARING IMPAIRED

Pyles v. Kamka, 491 F.Supp. 204 (1980). [A qualified sign language interpreter is to be provided upon request, or if it otherwise appears necessary, to]: (1) any hearing impaired inmate in any Adjustment Team hearing or in any disciplinary matter; (2) to any hearing impaired inmate in the provision of any medical, psychological or psychiatric care; (3) to any hearing impaired inmate in the provision of any counseling, or in any on-the-job training program, vocational training program or educational program. (House of Corrections, Maryland)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEPARATION
THREATS

Streeter v. Hopper, 618 F.2d 1178 (5th Cir. 1980). Racial tensions were purportedly running high at the Georgia State Prison, and an inmate committee was formed to negotiate with officials to bring about changes. The two plaintiffs were named to the committee. Subsequently, negotiations broke down, and the prison chapel was set on fire. Officials at the prison later received information that the plaintiffs had ordered the fires, and they were placed in administrative segregation. The two inmates filed a lawsuit challenging their segregation. They later asked the court to transfer them to another prison, allegedly because their lives were in danger. The district court ordered their transfer, and in this opinion, its judgment was affirmed. The U.S. Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals stated that in cases like this, trial courts should proceed with caution. In this case, however, there was testimony that a prison officer with a reputation for violence among the inmates had threatened the two plaintiffs. The two men also claimed to have received threats from other inmates and from other officers. The appellate court ruled that under these circumstances, the transfer was proper. (State Prison, Reidsville, Georgia)

U.S. District Court POPULATION
CROWDING
MEDICAL CARE
SANITATION FACILITIES
REMEDIES

West v. Lamb, 497 F.Supp. 989 (D. Nev. 1980). The latest round of litigation concerning conditions at the Las Vegas Central Detention Facility and Annex resulted in a court ordered reduction in the prisoner population. The United States District Court for Nevada began hearing complaints about conditions at these facilities after a class action suit was filed in August, 1977. In a series of inquiries since that time, the court has heard from experts in the field of detentions and corrections. These experts inspected the jails and reported that brutal, depraved, cruel, uncivilized and inhuman treatment of the inmates was occurring. The experts found severe overcrowding, racial segregation, poor morals among correction officers and inmates alike, regularly occurring homosexual attacks, inadequate health care, unsanitary conditions, inadequate food services, no recreational, religious, educational or exercise facilities and poor visitation facilities. After reviewing this information, the court stated that if there were any other correctional facilities available in southern Nevada it would close down the subject jails. The court found the jails unfit for human habitation and deemed it doubtful that they could be made fit without gutting and rebuilding. The court stated that a delicate balance must be maintained between public safety and the confining of inmates in as humane conditions as possible. It held that public safety must always come first and that the lives and safety of inmates are secondary. The court then ordered that the inmate population be reduced from 500 to 178 and that jail officials attain this goal within 180 days. The court then cautioned state judges not to enlarge the population by ordering prisoners to be housed in the jail after the limit had been reached. (Las Vegas Central Detention Facility and Annex, Nevada)

1981

U.S. Appeals Court PUNITIVE
SEGREGATION
CELL CAPACITY LIGHT
TOILETS
SHOWERS
MEDICAL CARE
BEDDING

Chavis v. Rowe, 643 F.2d 1281 (7th Cir. 1981). Reversing a dismissal granted by a federal district court, the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit held that the failure of a disciplinary review board to provide an inmate with exculpatory evidence relating to the charges against him amounted to an actionable violation of his right to due process. The court also ruled that the inmate's allegations of the conditions to which he was exposed during six months in segregation raised a valid claim of cruel and unusual punishment. The U.S. Court of Appeals of the Seventh Circuit held that failure to provide the inmate with the polygraph results tending to exonerate him was an actionable violation of his constitutional right to due process. The court also noted that failure of the disciplinary committee to inform the inmate in writing of its reasons for finding him guilty amounted to a separate, actionable violation of his due process rights. Finally, the court stated that the inmate's eighth amendment claims of cruel and unusual punishment arising from his confinement in segregation should not have been dismissed, even though he did not specifically allege bad faith in his complaint. The inmate made the following allegations, which if proven would amount to cruel and unusual punishment: confinement in a 5x7 foot cell with four other residents; inadequate bedding, light, toilet facilities, and showers; insufficient access to legal materials, medical and dental care and food. The court thus reversed the district court's order of dismissal and reinstated the case. (Statesville Correctional Center, Joliet, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
PLUMBING
CROWDING

Heitman v. Gabriel, 524 F.Supp. 622 (W.D. Mo. 1981). Plumbing conditions are cited. In this case against the Buchanan County Jail, the United States District Court ordered that no inmate is to be assigned to a cell used as a communal toilet, and ordered the jail's plumbing to be cleaned and repaired. The court also found that the jail was overcrowded considering all of the conditions, particularly the plumbing and the lack of out-of-cellblock exercise. (Buchanan County Jail, Missouri)

U.S. District Court
CROWDING
REMEDIES

Hendrix v. Faulkner, 525 F.Supp. 435 (N.D. Ind. 1981), cert. denied, 104 S.Ct. 3587 (1983), aff'd, 715 F.2d 269. The conditions of overcrowding at the Indiana State Prison constitute a violation of the eighth amendment in light of the physical plant and limits on staffing. Therefore, prison officials were required to take immediate action to ameliorate the conditions. Contributing to the limited time out of the cell is a sheer number of inmates. There was testimony that some inmates had not had outside recreation in five months. However, other conditions at the prison did not rise to the level of constitutional violations. (Indiana State Prison)

U.S. Appeals Court
SANITATION
SEGREGATION
CROWDING
FOOD
TOTALITY OF CONDITIONS

Jones v. Diamond, 636 F.2d 1364 (5th Cir. 1981). Prisoners being held in county jail bring action challenging conditions of their confinement and seeking damages for violation of their civil rights. The United States District Court for the Southern District of Mississippi entered judgment generally favorable to county officials, and prisoners appealed. On rehearing, 594 F.2d 997, the court of appeals, Alvin B. Rubin, Circuit Judge, held that racial segregation of prisoners, overcrowding, unsanitary conditions, inadequate diet, failure to control or segregate violent prisoners, confinement of pretrial detainees, administration of discipline, and censorship of mail constituted violations of prisoners' constitutional rights. The court determined that conditions of confinement were unconstitutional under the eighth amendment or fourteenth amendment, the court did not assay separately each of the institutional practices but looked to the totality of conditions. Further, the court concluded that it was limited to enforcing constitutional standards rather than assuming superintendence of jail administration. (Jackson County Jail, Pascagoula, Mississippi)

U.S. District Court
CROWDING
REMEDIES

Mercer v. Griffin, 30 CrL 2253 (1981). A consent decree entered nearly a year earlier concerning the improvement of conditions at the Chatham County (Georgia) Jail "has been all but ignored," according to the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of Georgia. The court postponed a contempt adjudication but issued specific orders concerning overcrowding and other issues, stating:

The patience of the plaintiffs and the court has apparently only permitted further deterioration in conditions which were already deplorable. The time for patience is at an end. In the event that Sheriff Griffin fails to meet the deadlines [imposed in this order], the court will be compelled to remove the jail from his control. Should it be shown that the county commissioners have failed to provide adequate resources to permit meeting these fundamental requirements, the court will similarly be compelled to act. I do not relish these responsibilities. The jail is in the first instance the responsibility of elected officials. I have no wish to remove this public facility from the control of representatives of the taxpayers who must in any event support it. Nor do I have any wish to expose the defendants to the political embarrassment of removal from their official duties. Nonetheless, the court has its own duty to the citizens of the community, including those who find themselves incarcerated. That duty will be fulfilled.

(Chatham County Jail, Georgia)

U.S. Supreme Court
DOUBLE CELLING POPULATION CELLS
SANITATION
SAFETY
STAFFING
TOTALITY OF CONDITIONS

Rhodes v. Chapman, 101 S.Ct. 2392 (1981). In a remarkable 8 to 1 decision, the Supreme Court upheld double celling at the Southern Ohio Correctional Facility at Lucasville. The maximum security facility was built in the early 1970's with gymnasiums, workshops, school rooms, day room, two chapels, a hospital ward, a commissary, a barber shop and a library. Outdoors, there is a recreation field, visitation area and library. The physical plant itself is a topflight first-class facility. Each cell is sixty-three square feet in area and contains a bed or bunk bed measuring thirty-six by eighty inches, a cabinet nightstand, a wall-mounted sink with hot and cold water, a flushable toilet and a built-in radio. One wall of each cell is barred. Day rooms are open from 6:30 a.m. until 9:30 p.m., and inmates may pass between these rooms and their cells for a ten minute period each hour. At the time of the trial, the facility housed 2,300 inmates, two-thirds of whom were serving life or long-term sentences. Some 1,400 men were double celled.

Despite the favorable nature of the plant's design, the district court found that double celling constituted cruel and unusual punishment. The Supreme Court reversed, noting: "No static test can exist by which courts determine whether conditions of confinement are cruel and unusual, for the Eighth Amendment must draw its meaning from the evolving standards of decency that mark the progress of a maturing society." Applying those principles to this institution, the court found that the evidence did not support a conclusion that the eighth amendment was violated. The majority said:

The double celling made necessary by the unanticipated increase in prison population did not lead to deprivations of essential food, medical care or sanitation. Nor did it increase violence among inmates or create other conditions intolerable for prison confinement. Although job and educational opportunities diminished marginally as a result of double celling, limited work hours and delay before receiving education do not inflict pain, much less unnecessary and wanton pain; deprivations of this kind simply are not punishment.

The Court continued, "We would have to wrench the eighth amendment from its language and history to hold that delay of these desirable aids to rehabilitation violates the Constitution." Three justices, Brennan, Blackmun and Stevens, authored a concurring opinion. It attempted to list some of the things which would determine whether a facility has such poor conditions as to violate the eighth amendment. Those conditions are:

-Physical plant conditions: lighting, heat, plumbing, ventilation, living space, noise levels, and recreation space.

-Sanitation: control of vermin and insects, food preparation, medical facilities, lavatories and showers, clean places for eating, sleeping and working

-Safety: protection from violent, deranged or diseased inmates, fire protection and emergency evacuation.

-Staffing: trained and adequate guards and other staff, and avoidance of placing inmates in positions of authority over other inmates.

This majority of justices cautioned that sixty-three square feet of cell space is not enough for two men. Such conditions, they noted, are a clear signal to legislative officials that additional facilities must be constructed or inmate populations reduced by other means. The justices did state, however, that cramped facilities are not unconstitutional per se.

NOTE: This decision dealt with long-term convicted inmates, not short-term persons in county and city jails. In some circumstances, pretrial detainees who are still presumed innocent until convicted have greater rights, such as access to lawyers and courts. On the other hand, because of the short periods of confinement, a jail facility does not need as elaborate areas for recreation, libraries, exercise and other services, as required for the longer term population of prisons. (Southern Ohio Correctional Facility, Lucasville)

U.S. District Court
DOUBLE CELLING
CROWDING
REMEDIES
TOTALITY OF CONDITIONS

Smith v. Fairman, 528 F.Supp. 186 (C.D. Ill. 1981), rev'd, 690 F.2d 122 (7th Cir. 1982) cert. denied, 103 S.Ct. 2125 (1983). Officials at the Pontiac, Illinois State Penitentiary had been ordered by a federal district court to end the practice of placing two inmates in a cell designed many years ago to house only one person. The order came as a result of an action filed by numerous former inmates and one current inmate of the institution, seeking to challenge the prison's policy of punishing inmates who refused to accept a cell with another inmate. The district court heard a great deal of evidence on the issue of double celling at Pontiac. A number of prisoners also testified, describing the problems resulting from the double celling, such as attacks by other cell mates, loss of property, and difficulty in practicing their religion. The court made a lengthy comparison between the conditions at Pontiac and those in Rhodes v. Chapman, 101 S.Ct. 2392 (1981). The court indicated that in Rhodes, a case in which double celling was approved, the conditions were markedly different. The facility in Rhodes was new, relatively quiet and modern, and the inmates were permitted to be out of their cells on a regular basis. In this case, the prison was old and noisy, and the cells were small.

Furthermore, a number of the inmates were required to spend practically all of their waking hours in their cells. The district court noted that Rhodes made clear the point that prisoners need not be free of discomfort. However, the court said, "deplorable and sordid conditions cannot be tolerated." The court noted that the conditions were so bad at Pontiac that even the prison's own medical director testified that the punishment meted out to prisoners was cruel and unusual. Summing up, the court said: "...the inescapable conclusion is that the Pontiac Correctional Center is overcrowded, antiquated and has inadequate facilities to provide significant and constructive correctional programs to the inmates." The court then ordered submission of a detailed plan calling for the eventual end of the double celling practices at Pontiac. On appeal, the double celling was allowed. (State Penitentiary, Pontiac, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
CROWDING
REMEDIES
DORMITORIES

Vazquez v. Gray, 523 F.Supp. 1359 (S.D. N.Y. 1981). Court outlines a response to overcrowding. The United States District Court found the Westchester County Jail overcrowded and determined that the proper method of determining a remedy was to examine the causes of the overcrowding. The court considered and rejected orders which reduce bail or set a population limit for the institution. Instead, it ordered:

- 1) that no mattresses be placed on the floor for sleeping,
- 2) that no more than two persons be confined in a cell,
- 3) that the use of day rooms for housing for more than five days be prohibited, and that the court be advised where individuals are kept in such housing for more than forty-eight hours.

The court approved using dormitories as long as the use complied with state regulations and as long as the use of the dormitories did not deviate from the plan which they provided to the court. The court refused to enter a comprehensive order regarding the general conditions of the institution until the provisions of the initial order had time to be implemented. (Westchester County Jail, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEPARATION
PRETRIAL
DETAINEES

Villanueva v. George, 659 F.2d 851 (1981). A majority of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit, sitting en banc, ruled that the allegations of a pretrial detainee raised a legitimate factual issue as to the constitutionality of the conditions to which he was subjected during his pretrial confinement. The court found, therefore, that the trial judge should have presented the case to the jury rather than directed the verdict against the plaintiff. The circuit court found that the jury might have concluded that the conditions of confinement were punitive in nature. Since the due process clause prohibits the punishment of persons prior to a judgment of conviction, plaintiff Robert Villanueva would have to persuade the jury that punitive conditions existed during his pretrial detention. According to the decision:

The question of whether there is sufficient evidence of the defendants' punitive intent is one for the jury. Moreover, the jury may 'infer that the purpose was punishment from the fact that the condition either bore no reasonable relation to a legitimate goal or exceeded what was necessary for attaining such a goal...'

Putnam v. Gerloff, 639 F.2d 415 at 420 (8th Cir. 1981). See also Bell v.

Wolfish, 441 U.S. at 539. There is evidence in this record from which the jury could have reasonably concluded that Villanueva's conditions of confinement were unnecessarily excessive and bore no reasonable relation to a legitimate governmental interest...We emphasize that our decision is not based solely on the fact that Villanueva was confined in a cell measuring six feet by six feet, see Rhodes v. Chapman, 29 CrL 3061 (1981). It is rather based upon the totality of the circumstances, including cell size, time spent in the cell, lack of opportunity for exercise or recreation, general sanitary conditions, and the fact that the appellant's past behavior demonstrated an ability to be confined under less restrictive conditions without incident.

In dicta the court suggests that the classification procedure which resulted in the plaintiff's being placed in segregation while awaiting trial was valid. The procedure took into account the nature of the crime charged and particularly whether the crime was violent or aggressive, the prisoner's desire to remain in a particular classification, the psychological state of the individual and other similar factors. (St. Louis County Adult Correctional Facility, Missouri)

1982

U.S. District Court
JUVENILES
TOTALITY OF CONDITIONS
SEPARATION
REMEDIES

D.B., et al. v. Graham Tewksbury, et al., 545 F.Supp. 896 (D. Ore. 1982). A federal district court judge in Oregon rules in a class action suit brought by Oregon Legal Services on behalf of children confined in the Columbia County Correctional Facility (CCCF). Judge Helen J. Frye held that it is unconstitutional to hold children in adult jails, whether they are accused status offenders or are alleged to have committed crimes. Judge Frye first ruled that the conditions at CCCF constituted punishment, citing a failure by the jail to provide any form of work, exercise, education, recreation, recreational materials, adequate hygiene, minimal privacy, adequate diet or medical care, emergency health service, "treatment of emotionally disturbed children who panic in a jail setting," or visits with families. The twenty-three page opinion cited numerous other deprivations.

Judge Frye indicated that the decision as to whether these conditions are punishment was "simple," since the director of the Columbia County Juvenile Department, Graham Tewksbury, "has stated expressly that he intends to punish children" held in the jail. The court cited Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520 (1979), stating that the due process clause of the fourteenth amendment requires that a pretrial detainee not be punished.

However, Judge Frye went further and ruled that the confinement of children, whether status offenders or accused of committing crimes, in any adult jail is unconstitutional:

...[T]o put such a child [status offender] in a jail--any jail--with its criminal stigma--constitutes punishment and is a violation of that child's due process rights under the fourteenth amendment...

Would it be constitutionally permissible to lodge children accused of committing crimes [in modern, 'enlightened' kinds of jails]?...Due process - or fundamental fairness - does not guarantee to children all the rights in the adjudication process which are constitutionally assured to adults accused of committing crimes. For example, children are not entitled to a jury trial, to indictment by grand jury, or to bail. In lieu of these constitutional rights, children are not to be treated or considered as criminals...

Juvenile proceedings, in the State of Oregon as elsewhere, are in the nature of a guardianship imposed by the state as parens patriae to provide the care and guidance that under normal circumstances would be furnished by the natural parents. It is, then, fundamentally fair constitutional - to deny children charged with crimes, rights available to adults charged with crimes if that denial is offset by a special solicitude designed for children. But when the denial of constitutional rights for children is not offset by a 'special solicitude' but by lodging them in adult jails, it is fundamentally unfair. When children who are found guilty of committing criminal acts cannot be placed in adult jails, it is fundamentally unfair to lodge children accused of committing criminal acts in adult jails...

The supervisors at jails are guards - not guardians. Jails hold convicted criminals and adults charged with crimes...A jail is not a place where a truly concerned natural parent would lodge his or her child for care and guidance. A jail is not a place where the state can constitutionally lodge its children under the guise of parens patriae.

To lodge a child in an adult jail pending adjudication of criminal charges against that child is a violation of that child's due process rights under the fourteenth amendment to the United States Constitution.

Since this decision, all children have been removed from CCCF. However, Oregon state law permits placement of juveniles in adult facilities under certain circumstances. (Columbia County Correctional Facility, Oregon)

U.S. Appeals Court
DOUBLE CELLING
CROWDING

Glynn v. Auger, 678 F.2d 760 (8th Cir. 1982). Double-celling is not cruel and unusual punishment. The eighth Circuit Court of Appeals held that the double-celling of an Iowa Men's Reformatory (IMR) prisoner did not violate the ex post facto clause. The court also found that the policy did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment. After reaching the highest level of a prison incentive program, the prisoner was housed in a single cell in a remodeled housing unit of the prison. Due to an increase in the number of inmates, officials began double-celling a portion of the building. When the plaintiff objected to this procedure, he was given the choices of being double-celled, being single-celled in a smaller cell with no loss of privileges or being placed in a lower level cell with reduced privileges. The inmate brought suit contending that the double-celling was an ex post facto increase in his punishment. The district court disagreed, finding that the action was not a punishment. The inmate then appealed. The Circuit Court agreed with the lower court, stating: "The constitutional prohibition against ex post facto law was designed to secure substantial personal rights against arbitrary and oppressive legislative action, and not to obstruct mere alteration in conditions deemed necessary for the orderly infliction of humane punishment." Malloy v. South Carolina, 237 U.S. 180, 35 S.Ct. 507 (1915). The appeals court also found that the double-celling did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment. (Iowa Men's Reformatory)

U.S. District Court
CROWDING REMEDIES
DEFENSES

Gross v. Tazewell County Jail, 533 F.Supp. 413 (W.D. Vir. 1982). The prison inmates' constitutional rights are violated as a result of overcrowding in a county jail. When injunctive relief was necessary to arrest the violations of constitutional rights, good faith on the part of the prison officials was no defense. The fact that state law prohibited or failed to authorize a party to alleviate a wrong did not excuse a continuing violation of fundamental guarantees. The U.S. District Court for the western district of Virginia entered an injunction against crowding in the Tazewell County Jail, finding significant differences between jails and prisons relative to overcrowding. Responding to claims by officials that the transfer of the jail inmates would only result in overcrowding elsewhere, the court answered:

It is simply not appropriate to lump all inmates into an abstract category and assert that overcrowding exists everywhere...A comparison of inmates versus available beds is not the true index of unconstitutional overcrowding. The manifestations of such overcrowding in daily life must be considered. Hite v. Leeke, 564 F.2d 670 (4th Cir. 1976). It is abundantly clear that extreme overcrowding in a local jail is of greater practical effect and constitutional consequence than in a larger institution or a common road camp. Simply stated, all overcrowding is not equal. Perhaps more importantly, the local jail houses a high percentage of pretrial detainees...As a matter of common sense and fundamental fairness, the criminal justice system must ensure that pretrial detainees are not housed in more deprived circumstances than those accorded to convicted persons. Without doubt, the oppressive conditions of the instant case do not withstand the stricter degree of scrutiny which must necessarily be applied in situations involving pretrial detainees. Overcrowding in a local jail cannot be quantitatively equated with overcrowding in a state penal institution.

(Tazewell County Jail, Virginia)

U.S. District Court
DOUBLE CELLING
PLUMBING
SANITATION
MEDICAL CARE
SEPARATION WOMEN
REMEDIES

Grubbs v. Bradley, 552 F.Supp. 1052 (M.D. Tenn. 1982). Conditions at several institutions are cited. Prisoners in the Tennessee correctional system brought action against the state challenging the constitutionality of the conditions of confinement in several of Tennessee's adult penal institutions. The United States District Court held that certain conditions of confinement and practices amounted to cruel and unusual punishment, including: double-celling of inmates in certain units of the state penitentiary and the Nashville Regional Correctional Center; confinement of any inmate for more than one week in a cell not equipped with hot water; confinement in Block D of the Brushy Mountain Prison and the Main Building at the Nashville Center; the failure to maintain minimum sanitary conditions in food storage, preparation and service areas at certain facilities; the failure to protect inmates at several facilities; the failure to provide minimally adequate medical care for prisoners; the confinement of inmates in segregation status for more than one week without any opportunity for exercise at the prison for women. A federal master was ordered and master plans were required. A classification system may be required. While there is no constitutional right to a classification system, where the absence of such a system substantially contributes to violence in the institution, such a system may be required. Here, the court notes that the classification system is virtually meaningless since cell and work and even institutional assignments are not really made on the basis of other than available space. The court finds that inmates do not have a right to participate in the classification decision since that is a matter of administrative discretion. Inmates have no constitutional claim to any particular security classification, but if proof shows a sufficient connection between an improper classification system and the violation of a constitutionally protected right, such as the right to be free from excessive violence, there may be just cause for court intervention. (Tennessee Correctional System)

- State Court
BEDDING
CLOTHING
MEDICAL CARE
HYGIENE
- Hickson v. Kellison, 296 S.E.2d 855 (W.Vir. 1982). County jail conditions are unconstitutional. General conditions at the Pocahontas County Jail were found to violate constitutional standards by a federal district court, noting that the jail failed to provide the inmates with personal hygiene supplies, bedding and towels, adequate clean clothing, communication materials for writing, visitation facilities, adequate medical care and outdoor exercise. The court stated that the legislature required counties to maintain jails at reasonable and acceptable standards. (Pocahontas County Jail, West Virginia)
- U.S. Appeals Court
TOTALITY OF CONDITIONS
LIGHTING
FIRE SAFETY
FOOD
SANITATION VENTILATION
PLUMBING
MEDICAL CARE
REMEDIES
- Hoptowit v. Ray, 682 F.2d 1237 (9th Cir. 1982). Eighth amendment violations cannot be based on "totality of conditions." In an opinion discussing the Washington State Penitentiary, the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals held that certain conditions in the facility are unconstitutional.
- The court held that an eighth amendment violation may not be based solely on a combination of conditions, if none of the conditions would be unconstitutional if viewed alone.
- The lower court had found that lighting was substandard, plumbing was unsatisfactory, fire prevention was substandard, food service did not meet public health standards, that there was evidence of vermin infestation, and that ventilation was inadequate. The court of appeals accepted these findings, but noted that none of these conditions standing alone would be unconstitutional, thus reversing the lower court's order to improve those conditions. The court of appeals did find that the level of violence was unconstitutional, and that the medical care did not meet constitutional standards, but rejected the district court's remedies. (Washington State Penitentiary)
- U.S. District Court
CELLS
PLUMBING
- Lyons v. Papantoniou, 558 F.Supp. 4 (E.D. Tenn. 1982), aff'd, 705 F.2d 455 (6th Cir. 1982). Transfer from one county jail to another does not violate constitutional rights. Since the federal constitution did not secure the right of an inmate to be confined in any particular jail, the federal district court did not have reason to review the transfer. The inmate's temporary twenty-four hour confinement in the latter jail in a cell lacking adequate bathroom facilities and cigarettes did not amount to cruel and unusual punishment. (Carter County Jail, Tennessee)
- U.S. District Court
POPULATION
REMEDIES
- Mobile Co. Jail Inmates v. Purvis, 551 F.Supp. 92 (S.D. Ala. 1982), aff'd, 703 F.2d 580 (11th Cir. 1973). Defendants are found in contempt for failing to reduce population. The court found the defendants in contempt for failing to comply with the requirements of a court order by reducing the population of the Mobile County Jail and established a daily fine of $5,000 for each day the defendants are out of compliance with the order. (Mobile County Jail, Alabama)
- 1983
- U.S. District Court
CROWDING
REMEDIES
- Inmates of Allegheny Co. Jail v. Wecht, 565 F.Supp. 1278 (W.D. Penn. 1983). Compliance with a three year old order to improve conditions is ordered. A federal court in Pennsylvania found that correctional officials had not completely complied with an order issued three years ago to correct poor conditions within the prison. While not citing the officials for contempt since they had attempted in good faith to comply with parts of the order, the court appointed a monitor to keep it advised of continued compliance. The major problems yet to be corrected were: inadequate access to the law library for female inmates, lack of facilities for recreation and exercise, and overcrowding. Although the intent to construct a new facility was announced, reduction of the jail population was ordered over the following months. (Allegheny County Jail, Pennsylvania)
- State Court
TOILETS
PLUMBING
- Michaud v. Sheriff of Essex County, 458 N.E.2d 702 (Mass. 1983). Court orders inmates out of cells until toilets and sinks are installed. Cells in several Massachusetts jails are not to be used until flushing toilets and hand-washing sinks with hot and cold running water are installed, according to a state court ruling. Existing toilet facilities in the cells consist of metal or plastic buckets without lids, shared by several inmates. Emptied only once daily, inmates are subject to continually smelling the odor of their wastes. The cells are not to be used until the ordered improvements are made. (Essex County Jail and House of Corrections, Lawrence, Massachusetts)
- U.S. Appeals Court
JUVENILES
ISOLATION
- Santana v. Collazo, 714 F.2d 1172 (1st Cir. 1983), cert. denied, 104 S.Ct. 2352 (1983). Juveniles who are incarcerated involuntarily do not have constitutional right to rehabilitative treatment or training; conditions of solitary confinement warrant scrutiny. An opinion by the United States Supreme Court in a class action suit against juvenile camps in Puerto Rico clarified the rights of juvenile inmates.
- A district court ruling concerning the "right to treatment" and the length of time which could be spent in isolation was prompted by a class action suit of juvenile residents of the Mayaguez and Maricao Juvenile Camps in Puerto Rico. The United States Supreme Court addressed the first issue in the case and offered guidelines for considering the appropriateness of isolating juveniles.

The Court noted that several lower courts had found that juveniles who were involuntarily incarcerated had a right to rehabilitative treatment. The Court characterized one basis for these decisions as the interpretation of the Supreme Court's decision in Jackson v. Indiana, 406 U.S. 715 (1972). Lower courts have reasoned that the state's authority over delinquent juveniles derives from its parens patriae interest in their welfare, indicating a beneficent purpose for confinement.

A second basis for lower court decisions characterized by the Supreme Court was the fact that the juvenile justice system denies certain due process safeguards, which have been found constitutional because the purpose of incarceration is rehabilitative, not punitive. The courts indicated that the compensating factor for denial of due process was thought to be the provision of rehabilitation.

In this decision, the Supreme Court found both reasonings questionable. The Court found that states may legitimately confine juveniles solely to protect society from them and suggested that even without treatment, removing a juvenile from a dangerous or unhealthy environment may be a legitimate exercise of the state's parens patriae authority.

The Court ruled that, while rehabilitative training is no doubt desirable and sound as a matter of policy, plaintiffs have no constitutional right to that training.

In the second issue, the Court was not willing to say that the isolation practices at the camps were unconstitutional. It noted that the Supreme Court had already determined that there is no simple test for determining whether conditions of confinement are cruel and unusual.

The Court indicated that a more important consideration in this instance was that the juvenile defendants, who have not been convicted of crimes, have a due process interest in freedom which entitles them to closer scrutiny of their conditions of confinement than that accorded to convicted criminals. The state acquires the right to punish an individual only after it has tried and convicted him as a criminal.

The Court remanded the case to the district court for consideration of whether the isolation employed at Mayaguez is reasonably related to any legitimate governmental objective. (Mayaguez Industrial School, Puerto Rico)

U.S. Appeals Court
CROWDING
REMEDIES
DOUBLE CELLING
TOTALITY OF CONDITIONS

Union County Jail Inmates v. Di Buono, 713 F.2d 984 (1983), cert. denied, 104 S.Ct. 1600 (1983). Overcrowded conditions are found unconstitutional. Litigation challenging severe overcrowding at the Union County Jail in New Jersey resulted in a finding by a federal district court and its special master that the overcrowded conditions at the jail were unconstitutional. The most serious concern of the court was placement of inmates on mattresses on the floor of one man cells. Rejecting the state corrections commissioner's request to resolve the problem by double bunking, the district judge ordered the convicted inmates removed from the jail and into the state prison system to which they had been sentenced (537 F.Supp. 1009).

In reversing the district court's prohibition against double bunking, the Third Circuit Court of Appeals ruled that under the "totality of the circumstances," the double bunking proposal would satisfy the constitutional prohibitions against the punishment of pretrial detainees and against cruel and unusual punishment of sentenced prisoners.

In reaching its decision, the Third Circuit relied on Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520 (1979), in which the Supreme Court held that while detainees may not be punished, there is no punishment where confinement conditions serve legitimate nonpunitive purposes and are not excessive in relation to those purposes. In addition, the court must inquire as to whether the conditions cause inmates to endure "genuine privations and hardship over an extended period of time."

Both courts concluded that overcrowding served two legitimate purposes: effective management of a detention facility during a statewide prison overcrowding emergency and the interests of state and local government in not releasing inmates into the streets. However, the circuit disagreed with the lower court's finding that conditions would still violate the due process rights of detainees because of sheer lack of space and because the totality of conditions would in any event be unconstitutional.

According to the appeals court, double bunking would resolve the "totality" issue by providing adequate space for sleeping and would allow for reclaiming large recreation areas, permitting each inmate one hour of exercise each day in the larger space. The circuit claimed that this recreation period would offset the "cramped and overcrowded conditions" of the remaining fifteen waking hours, during which square footage per inmate varies from thirty-one to thirty-three and one half square feet. The Circuit Court was further persuaded that such conditions were not unconstitutional because they were convinced that the majority of detainees are confined for no more than sixty days, an assertion disputed by some local parties. (Union County Jail, New Jersey)

1984

U.S. District Court
REMEDIES
DEFENSES

Alberti v. Heard, 600 F.Supp. 443 (S.D. Tex. 1984). Federal district court orders minimum staffing plan for Texas jail. After establishing the existence of constitutional violations, resulting in the lack of protection for prisoners housed at the Harris County Central Jail in Houston, the court ordered the sheriff to implement a new staffing plan requiring a minimum of two staff per quadrant and visual inspections at least every hour. The county had been previously ordered to correct the deficiencies at the jail, and the court did not accept their defense that there were no funds for additional staff.

The plaintiffs cited high levels of violence and sexual assaults at the jail as a result of the condition and design of the facility, inadequate supervision, unreliable communication systems and lack of staff. (Harris County Jail, Texas)

U.S. Appeals Court
CROWDING
REMEDIES
MEDICAL CARE

McElveen v. Prince William County, 725 F.2d 954 (4th Cir. 1984), cert. denied, 105 S.Ct. 88. $210,000 is awarded to inmates held in jail. A federal jury awarded $210,000 to approximately 7,000 inmates held in the Prince William County (Virginia) jail between August 1980 and January 1982. Two months before, the jury had found that the facility was unconstitutionally crowded, exceeding at times its inmate capacity by 400 percent. Witnesses had testified that the facility lacked medical care and security and was unsafe. Pretrial detainees are to receive $170,000 of the award, with the remaining funds to be divided among the sentenced prisoners held at the jail.

Meanwhile, the county has filed its own case against Virginia state corrections officials, claiming that a chronic backlog of prisoners awaiting transfer to state facilities contributed to the jail crowding. The jury had rejected county claims during the class action suit that state officials should accept or share liability, after U.S. District Judge Richard L. Williams ruled that state employees are immune under the eleventh amendment from civil damages in their role as officials. The court continued them in the case as individuals, but instructed the jury that they were entitled to claim they had acted in good faith. (Prince William County Jail, Virginia)

U.S. District Court POPULATION
BEDDING
MEDICAL CARE
REMEDIES

Monmouth County Correctional Institution Inmates v. Lanzaro, 595 F.Supp. 1417 (D. N.J. 1984). Federal court sets cap on New Jersey county jail population and orders relief for prisoners. After an extensive review of the conditions at the Monmouth County jail the U.S. District Court for the District of New Jersey has concluded that both pretrial and sentenced inmates are being denied constitutional rights. The court placed a cap on the population of the jail and ordered relief in the areas of physical conditions, bedding, recreation, medical care, classification and visiting. (Monmouth County Correctional Institution, New Jersey)

U.S. District Court POPULATION
PRETRIAL
DETAINEES

Tyler v. United States, 602 F.Supp. 476 (E.D. Mo. 1984). Court praises city officials for reducing pretrial population. A U.S. district court noted that although the City of St. Louis initially violated its order to limit the number of prisoners housed in the city jail, subsequent actions purged the city of its contempt of court responsibility.

An earlier order set limits on the city jail capacity. When excess prisoners were housed at other facilities, the court stated that those facilities must also meet the constitutional conditions ordered for the city jail. The court noted that staff levels at the city jail were maintained at a time when other city agencies were reducing their force, and efforts to expedite processing of cases showed the willingness of the city to comply with the court order. As a result, the pretrial population was steadily decreased, as was reliance on other facilities to house overflow populations. (St. Louis City Jail, Missouri)

1985

State Supreme Court
REMEDIES
PRETRIAL
DETAINEES

Attorney General v. Sheriff of Suffolk County, 477 N.E.2d 361 (Mass. Sup. Jud. Ct. 1985). Facility plans are modified. In an earlier consent decree county officials had agreed to construct a new jail to house pretrial detainees in response to overcrowding. Subsequently a single justice approved modifications of the decree (ordering a seventeen story instead of a thirteen story facility). The Massachusetts Supreme Court found that the action of the single justice was appropriate and did not violate the principle of separation of power. (Suffolk County Jail, Massachusetts)

State Supreme Court
CROWDING

Cleveland v. Goin, 703 P.2d 204 (Ore. Sup. Ct., 1985). Prisoner ordered back to jail in county of trial. The plaintiff was transferred to a jail in another county because, according to the sheriff, his jail was overcrowded. After examining records and logs, the court determined that jail occupancy had not exceeded the limit set by federal court. As a result, the prisoner was ordered housed in the jail in which his upcoming trial would be held. (Clatsop County Jail, Oregon)

U.S. District Court
CONDITIONS
OVERCROWDING

Dohner v. McCarthy, 635 F.Supp. 408 (C.D.Cal. 1985). Inmates brought a class action suit against the director of California Department of Corrections and the prison superintendent to challenge the constitutionality of conditions of confinement, and some inmates moved for certification of subclasses. The district court held that: (1) conditions for certification of subclasses were not satisfied; (2) double-celling, overcrowding, medical care, sanitation, food, clothing, and safety did not violate the eighth amendment; and (3) no alleged liberty interest in medical and mental health treatment, entitlement to work credits, or visitation rights was violated. Cells housing two inmates, despite the design for one inmate which contained about eleven and one-half square feet per person when the extra bed was lowered, which required the inmates to crawl over beds to travel from one end of the cell to the other, but which were adequately cleaned and ventilated, which had windows, which had a desk and storage area, and which had noise within tolerable levels were not unfit for human habitation, and, thus, the cell itself satisfied the requirements of prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment.

The factors relevant in assessing pain inflicted by a minimally sized cell for the purposes of cruel and unusual punishment clause includes the following: characteristics of prison population; prison staff's morale; amount of time the inmate has to spend in the cell each day; opportunities available for activities outside the cell; and the ability of the prison staff to be flexible and responsive to individual needs and problems created by double-celling.

The amount of time that the inmates are able to spend away from the cells is a critical factor in determining whether conditions of confinement involve wanton and unnecessary infliction of pain in violation of the cruel and unusual punishment clause. The permanence of double-celling of inmates in cells designed for a single inmate is a factor to be considered together with the size of the cells and the opportunities for inmates to leave the cells during the normal routine of the prison life in determining whether double-celling constitutes cruel and unusual punishment. (California Men's Colony, California)

U.S. Appeals Court
DOUBLE BUNKING
CROWDING
REMEDIES

Duran v. Elrod, 760 F.2d 756 (7th Cir. 1985). Appeals court modifies consent order- allows double bunking of prisoners. In 1983 Cook County entered into a consent agreement concerning crowding and conditions of confinement at the jail. The agreement called for a halt to putting two prisoners in small (sixty-four square foot) cells in the facility. Later, the County asked for a modification of the order due to rapid growth in the jail population. The district court not only denied the request but placed a cap on the number of prisoners which could be housed. As a result, the county was ordered to release pretrial detainees in reverse order of the size of their bonds. The cap was affirmed by the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals (713 F.2d 292).

A study which was completed by the county showed that many of the released detainees became fugitives or were rearrested for subsequent crimes. Based on the study, the county again sought relief from the district court; the motion was again denied. However, a majority of the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals disagreed with the lower court and allowed double occupancy of the cells. The appeals court criticized the county for "foot-dragging" in its compliance efforts and for destroying its credibility with the lower court. The majority noted, however, that double bunking in sixty-four square foot cells is clearly constitutional. Denying the motion, they argued, would punish the citizens of the county rather than the governmental entity; the public interest in protection against the release of the accused criminals outweighs the inmates' expectations under the original consent decree. (Cook County Jail, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
SANITATION TOILETS
BEDDING HEATING
FOOD
MEDICAL CARE

Goodson v. City of Atlanta, 763 F.2d 1381 (11th Cir. 1985). Detainee awarded $50,000 damages for conditions of detention. The plaintiff was held as a rape suspect in the Atlanta jail. A jury concluded that he was subjected to unconstitutional conditions of confinement (sanitation, toilet facilities, medical care, lack of bedding, lack of heating, roach infested food). The jury believed that the city of Atlanta and the jail administrator knew of these conditions and had even made public statements to the media that the jail was "unfit for human habitation". Concluding that the administrator had failed to properly train and supervise staff, they held him liable for $5,000 damages, and held the city liable for $45,000 compensatory damages. (Atlanta City Jail, Georgia)

U.S. Appeals Court
PRETRIAL
DETAINEES

Hamm v. DeKalb County, 774 F.2d 1567 (11th Cir. 1985), cert. denied, 475 U.S. 1096. Eleventh circuit finds Wolfish statement inadequate for determining pretrial detainee conditions. The court asserted that the standard established in Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520 (1979), does not produce a clear result when applied to a jail's provision of basic needs such as food, living space and medical care. The Wolfish test, developed for pretrial detainees in a federal detention center, asks if conditions are reasonable and related to a legitimate governmental objective, and whether conditions amount to "punishment." The court concluded that pretrial conditions be evaluated under the same standard that has been developed for eighth amendment analysis of conditions for convicted offenders

As many county and city jails hold both detainees and convicted prisoners, applying the two separate standards necessarily requires courts to become "...enmeshed in the minutia of prison operations," which the Supreme Court has warned against. Therefore, in addition to requiring pretrial conditions and practices to serve a legitimate governmental purpose, the court also held that jails must furnish the detainees with a reasonably adequate diet and living space, and with reference to medical needs that they must not be deliberately indifferent to detainee's serious medical needs. (DeKalb County Jail, Georgia)

U.S. Appeals Court
USE OF FORCE
CLOTHING
FOOD

Hazen v. Pasley, 768 F.2d 226 (8th Cir. 1985). Prisoners brought action against state officers and the county sheriff for wrongful taking of property and constitutionally impermissible conditions of confinement and sought damages for excessive use of force allegedly employed by one state officer at the time of the arrest. The United States District Court entered the final judgment in favor of the defendants, and the prisoners appealed.

The court ruled that while the father and son were both incarcerated in the jail, they were improperly denied clothing and food provisions. Although requiring the pretrial detainees to wash and dry their own clothes was not unconstitutional, forcing them to remain partially unclothed while waiting for their clothes to finish laundering was improper. They were not provided enough calories as required for an adequate diet, resulting in weight loss and mildly diminished health. Each was awarded $100.00. (Phelps County Jail, Missouri)

U.S. Appeals Court
CONDITIONS
CROWDING
SANITATION
VENTILATION
PLUMBING
LIGHT

Hoptowit v. Spellman, 753 F.2d 779 (9th Cir. 1985). Inmates brought an action challenging conditions of confinement in a state prison system. On remand, 682 F.2d 1237, the United States District Court entered judgment finding conditions in violation of the eighth amendment and ordered relief; the state appealed. The court of appeals held that: (1) the change of administration, resulting in defendants named in the action either leaving office or changing positions, did not warrant reopening the record on remand; (2) inadequate lighting, vermin infestation, substandard fire prevention, and safety hazards in the prison violated minimum requirements of the eighth amendment; and (3) the order for relief was overbroad in requiring provision of adequate food and clothing where there were no findings of inadequate food and clothing.

Adequate lighting is one of the fundamental attributes of adequate shelter required by the eighth amendment. The evidence that the lighting at the state prison was so poor that it was inadequate for reading, caused eyestrain and fatigue and hindered attempts to insure that basic sanitation was maintained supported the district court's conclusion that the lighting violated the eighth amendment.

The plumbing at the state prison which was in such disrepair as to deprive inmates of basic elements of hygiene and which seriously threatened inmates' physical and mental well-being amounted to cruel and unusual punishment under the eighth amendment.

Vermin infestation at the state prison, considered in light of unsanitary conditions such as standing water, flooded toilets and sinks, and dank air, was unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain proscribed by the eighth amendment.

The prisoners have a right not to be subjected to an unreasonable threat of injury or death by fire and need not wait until actual casualties occur in order to obtain relief from such conditions. Substandard fire prevention at the state prison which endangered inmates' lives violated the eighth amendment.

Lack of adequate ventilation and air flow which undermined the health of prison inmates and the sanitation of the prison violated the minimum requirement of the eighth amendment.

Persons involuntarily confined by the state have a constitutional right to safe conditions of confinement. Safety hazards found throughout the state prison's occupational areas, which were exacerbated by prison's inadequate lighting and which seriously threatened the safety and security of the inmates, created unconstitutional infliction of pain. The failure to provide adequate cell cleaning supplies in light of overall squalor at the state prison violated the eighth amendment. (State Penitentiary, Washington)

U.S. District Court
CROWDING
REMEDIES

Inmates of Allegheny County Jail v. Wecht, 612 F. Supp. 874 (D.C. Pa. 1985). Use of police lockup to relieve jail crowding brings lockup under provisions of court order. Attempting to lower its jail population to meet a court ordered cap, officials transferred prisoners to a police lockup. The court found that housing female prisoners for several days (seventeen days in one instance) in a facility designed for only a few hours of detention, violated the court order. The court concluded that use of the lockup was an attempt by the county to avoid a court ordered choice between providing constitutionally adequate facilities or releasing prisoners and paying a fine for each one so released. The court decreed that once an inmate is judicially committed to jail he/she cannot be kept in the lockup for more than twelve hours. (Allegheny County Jail, Pennsylvania)

U.S. Appeals Court
REMEDIES

Madison County Jail Inmates v. Thompson, 773 F.2d 834 (7th Cir. 1985). Appeals court does not reinstate jury verdict for $500,000 damages; nominal damages upheld. Having convinced a federal jury that conditions at the jail were substandard, they awarded damages of between ten to thirteen dollars per day to plaintiff prisoners in this class action suit. The award would have exceeded $500,000. The trial court entered a judgment reducing the award to nominal damages. On appeal, the Seventh Circuit concurred with the jury finding of unconstitutional conditions, but concluded that "the plaintiffs failed to present evidence which would support a finding of consequential injury to the class as a whole." The majority refused to permit damages, citing the courts reluctance in Doe v. District of Columbia, 697 F.2d 1115 (CADC 1983), "to grant money damages to a class of prisoners in mass that includes many prisoners who are causing the conditions complained of and who will not cooperate to correct them." (Madison County Jail, Indiana)

U.S. District Court
CROWDING
PLUMBING
SANITATION
FOOD
FIRE SAFETY

Miles v. Bell, 621 F.Supp. 51 (D.C.Conn. 1985). The focus of this complaint was overcrowding, particularly in the housing unit, which once consisted of open dormitories. Pretrial detainees brought a class action suit primarily alleging that the overcrowded dorms increased the spread of disease among them and were psychologically harmful because of the stress, lack of control over their areas and lack of privacy. Most of the plaintiffs' proof on the issue was based on comparisons between illness rates in dormitories and other housing methods such as cubicles or single or double cells. Testimony did show higher levels of complaints and a higher level of illness among inmates housed in the open dorms. A doctor testified that the installation of cubicles could correct many of these problems. In fact, the defendants had corrected the situation by installing cubicles, rendering much of the pretrial detainees' complaint moot. The cubicles mitigate the spread of disease, as well as afford privacy, testified the doctor. He said that the decrease in stress would likely improve both the physical and mental states of the inmates. Although there was no testimony as to what effect the cubicles had on ventilation, the court found no violation on the matter. The barriers were likely to decrease the effects of smoking and body odor of other inmates. The inmates complained of drafts if windows were left open and of stifling heat if left closed. The living units made up of cubicles were not challenged by the inmates.

The court also found no constitutional violation in that the number of toilets and showers did not conform to the standards set by the American Correctional Association (ACA) and by the American Public Health Association (APHA). The ACA advised one toilet and shower facility for every eight inmates, and the APHA advised one toilet for every eight inmates and one shower for every fifteen inmates. The defendants provided one toilet for every ten to fifteen inmates, and one shower for every fourteen to twenty-four inmates, depending on the housing unit. These figures were nearly twice that advised. Still, the court found no violation absent a showing that waiting in line led to either physical or mental problems. Sanitary conditions were not challenged.

Although there were certain violations of the health code in the food service in that maggots and weevils were occasionally found, the court found no constitutional violation. With regards to recreational opportunities, the inmates had enough forms of exercise and equipment available regularly.

For security reasons and for the safety of a correctional officer, he is not permitted to carry a key to the exterior doors in the housing units if he is working alone. The inmates claim this and staff shortages would prevent them from evacuating in case of a fire. The court found no violation, since the correctional officer does carry keys to exit doors that empty into adjoining units. A door in the laundry room that was supposed to be one hour fire resistant according to code, did not amount to a constitutional violation. Finally, the court found no violation in the unannounced entry into the dorms by female correctional officers, who occasionally see unclothed inmates.

(Federal Correctional Institution at Danbury, Connecticut)

1986

U.S. Appeals Court
EQUAL PROTECTION
PRETRIAL
DETAINEES

Anela v. City of Wildwood, 790 F.2d 1063 (3rd Cir. 1986), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 949. Female detainees confined overnight were denied fourteenth amendment rights; city could be held liable for conditions. Nine females and one male, ages seventeen to twenty, were arrested at 11:15 p.m. by city police for loud radio playing. The male arrestee was able to post bail and was released. The females were held until 11:00 the following morning. The females filed suit, alleging that their confinement in cells without drinking water, food or mattresses violated their constitutional rights. The federal district court dismissed several counts prior to trial and directed a verdict against the plaintiffs following a trial.

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit held that: (1) the district court properly denied the plaintiffs' motion to reopen the case and did not err in its directed verdict for the individual defendants on the plaintiffs' denial of equal protection claim; (2) the district court erred in dismissing the plaintiffs' fourth amendment claims on the ground of collateral estoppel; (3) the city is responsible for the use of a bail schedule in violation of a rule of the New Jersey Supreme Court; (4) the conditions of confinement to which the non-disruptive, non-violent, non-alcoholic women were subjected constituted privation and punishment in violation of the fourteenth amendment; and (5) the city may be held liable under Monell for the conditions of confinement, even if the practices with respect to jail conditions were followed without formal city action, because it appears that they were the norm and had become acceptable standard and practice for the City. (City of Wildwood, New Jersey)

U.S. District Court
EQUAL PROTECTION
CONDITIONS

Canterino v. Wilson, 644 F.Supp. 738 (W.D. Ky. 1986). Female inmates brought action for relief concerning conditions of their confinement, disparate treatment of men and women incarcerated in state prisons, and denial of vocational training and educational opportunities. After the state was ordered to supply female prison law library facilities equivalent to those provided to male prisoners, increase the amount of non-program time the library was open, and provide the equivalent of a half time attorney to assist inmates in areas of demonstrated need, the state moved to alter or amend orders concerning the access to courts issue. The district court held that inmate legal assistance was necessary to provide equal opportunities to female inmates, since past unavailability of legal resources prevented females from gaining legal assistance experience comparable to that of male writ-writers. (Correctional Institution for Women, Kentucky)

U.S. District Court
CROWDING
REMEDIES

Inmates of Occoquan v. Barry, 650 F.Supp. 619 (D.D.C. 1986). A class of inmates confined at state medium security facilities brought a federal civil rights action seeking declaratory and injunctive relief for deprivation under color of state law of fifth and eighth amendment rights. The district court held that overcrowding and systemically deficient conditions constituted cruel and unusual punishment justifying equitable relief.

Overcrowding and systemically deficient conditions at state medium security institutions constituted cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the eighth amendment justifying equitable relief of imposition of cap on a number of inmates at each facility and requirement of periodic reports indicating what steps were being taken to address deficiencies. The court ruled:

"Accordingly, the Court will order that by June 1, 1987, the population of Occoquan I, II, and III shall not exceed a total of 1,281 inmates, with specific caps set for each dormitory. This total is based on a formula providing each inmate a total of 95 square feet of floor space for sleeping and day room purposes. If defendants provide all inmates with opportunities for work, vocational education or other meaningful programs to eliminate enforced idleness among the inmates, the Court will entertain a motion to modify the square footage formula to 85 square feet per prisoner. In connection with the establishment of a population cap at Occoquan, the Court will also order the defendants to provide the Court with a written report by January 15, 1987, indicating precisely how they propose to comply with the population cap."

The plaintiffs contend that an excessive inmate population, deficiencies in environmental health and safety, food services, and mental health care, alone or in combination, violate their rights guaranteed by the United States Constitution.

The classification of inmates is essential for the prison security. One critical function of classification is the efficient identification of violent, aggressive inmates and those in need of psychiatric care, so that they can be separated from the rest of the population. See, e.g., Palmigiano v. Garrahy, 443 F.Supp. 956 (D.R.I.1977). The classification system at Occoquan appears to be dangerously overtaxed by the crush of inmates in need of classification.

Idleness among inmates results in a variety of problems, including heightened tension, frustration, and violence. The lack of adequate programs can also have an adverse impact on inmates' chances for parole. There was no disagreement among the expert penologists that inmates should be engaged in some productive enterprise, properly supervised. Nonetheless, enforced idleness presents a major problem at Occoquan.

The correctional officers do not supervise properly the sleeping areas of the dormitories. Correctional officers do not make patrols on a frequent and regular basis, nor are officers stationed in the rear of each dormitory so as to facilitate supervision of the living area when inmates are present.

Medical services experts agreed that deficiencies in the medical care delivery system at Occoquan exist which are likely to cause harm to the inmates. These deficiencies are systemic in nature, concerning staffing, facilities, and procedures. (Lorton Correctional Complex, District of Columbia)

U.S. District Court
CONDITIONS
VENTILATION
LIGHT

Jackson v. Gardner, 639 F.Supp. 1005 (E.D.Tenn. 1986). Inmates of a county jail brought a Section 1983 action challenging the constitutionality of conditions of confinement. After resolution of some of the conditions complained of, and stipulation as to others, the district court held that: (1) Prison conditions under which an average inmate was confined twenty-four hours a day in a physically dilapidated, insect infested, dimly lit, poorly ventilated area averaging under twenty square feet per inmate, without any available recreation or diversion other than some reading or letter writing, sharing a shower which might not have hot water with twelve to fourteen others, sharing a sink and toilet with three or four others, and possibly sleeping on an unsanitary floor, or within inches of a toilet, in clothing which may not have been recently washed, constituted cruel and unusual punishment; (2) In order for the county jail to provide constitutionally acceptable confinement, population at the main jail facility had to be reduced, regular out-of-cell recreation had to be provided, visitation increased, and fire escape plans had to be communicated to inmates and prominently displayed in corridors at all times. (Sullivan County Jail, Tennessee)

U.S. District Court
REMEDIES

Jackson v. Whitman, 642 F.Supp. 816 (W.D. La. 1986). A sheriff, a police jury and the State of Louisiana were in contempt of court for failing to comply with a consent decree which outlined remedial actions to be taken to rectify unconstitutional conditions at a parish jail. Numerous violations of the consent decree warranted fines of $7500 against the sheriff, $2500 against the police jury, and $2500 against the state, and fines of $1000 for any additional days that any defendant was not in substantial compliance with the court's orders. (Bienville Parish Jail, Louisiana)

U.S. District Court
HYGIENE
SANITATION
FIRE SAFETY
MEDICAL CARE

McClung v. Camp County, Tex., 627 F.Supp. 528 (E.D. Tex. 1986). District court rules against all prisoner claims in conditions of confinement suit against jail.

An inmate who had been incarcerated in a county jail brought action against the county and various county officials alleging that conditions in jail violated his constitutional rights. The federal district court held that: (1) evidence supported a finding that conditions placed on the inmate's physical exercise at the jail did not constitute a violation of inmate's constitutional rights; (2) evidence supported a finding that inmate's constitutional rights were not violated by alleged failure to provide clean bedding, clothing and toiletries; (3) evidence was sufficient to support a finding that jail fire safety conditions did not violate inmate's constitutional rights; and (4) administering insulin to a diabetic inmate three times daily rather than four times daily did not violate the inmate's rights.

Evidence that county jail cells had enough room for inmates to exercise, and that the inmate's health had not suffered during short periods he was confined in the jail supported the court's finding that conditions did not constitute a violation of inmate's constitutional rights.

Evidence that a fire in the jail which resulted in an inmate's hospitalization was started by another inmate and was not immediately reported was sufficient to support a finding that jail fire safety conditions did not violate the inmate's constitutional rights. (Camp County Jail, Texas)

U.S. District Court
CROWDING
CONDITIONS
REMEDIES

Palmigiano v. Garrahy, 639 F.Supp. 244 (D.R.I. 1986). Prison officials requested modification of a 1977 order which found that the prison conditions violated the eighth amendment. The district court held that: (1) subsequent United States Supreme Court decisions did not affect validity of a 1977 order finding unconstitutional prison conditions, and, thus, the 1977 order remained law of case, and (2) the totality of present prison conditions violated the eighth amendment. Request denied.

The district court's 1977 unappealed order which found violation of the eighth amendment based on totality of conditions in the prison that included overcrowding, idleness, inadequate environmental support system, and inadequate medical and mental health care remained consistent with subsequent decisions of the United States Supreme Court and, therefore, remained the law of the case requiring prison officials' compliance. Totality of the conditions at the prison which included overcrowding, prolonged confinement, inadequate medical and mental health care, and overextended staff affected basic health and safety of inmates, constituted cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the eighth amendment, and, therefore, did not justify reconsideration of the district court's 1977 order finding an eighth amendment violation despite some cleaning in prison. Palmigiano v. Garrahy, 443 F.Supp. 956; No Appeal was taken. (Adult Correctional Institution, Rhode Island)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEGREGATION
CROWDING

Reece v. Gragg, 650 F.Supp. 1297 (10th Cir. 1986). A pretrial detainee representing a class of all present and future pretrial detainees and sentenced inmates held in the county jail brought action seeking injunctive relief to require that operation of the jail under present conditions cease. The district court held that: (1) the current operation and condition of the county jail violated the due process clause of the fifth and fourteenth amendments and the eighth amendment's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment, and (2) due to unconstitutional conditions at the jail, an injunction was warranted, but would be stayed under conditions outlined by court.

To the extent that the county jail is unable to segregate pretrial detainees and sentenced inmates, the higher standard applicable under the due process clause, rather than the eighth amendment, must be met by the entire facility.

Jail overcrowding for the purpose of allowing the county to house more inmates without creating more jail space is an impermissible justification for resulting violations of due process and prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment. Severe overcrowding combined with lack of area for exercise, lack of separate dining area, inadequate ventilation, inadequate temperature control, and antiquated and unsanitary plumbing at the county jail violated due process clauses of the fifth and fourteenth amendments and ran afoul of the eighth amendment's proscription against cruel and unusual punishment. (Sedgwick County Jail, Kansas)

U.S. Appeals Court
CONDITIONS LIGHTS
CLASSIFICATION

Shelby County Jail Inmates v. Westlake, 798 F.2d 1085 (7th Cir. 1986). Conditions of the Shelby County Jail in Indiana did not violate the constitutional rights of inmates, says a U.S. Appeals Court. Inmates at the Shelby County Jail (SCJ) filed a suit alleging that the totality of conditions and practices at SCJ violated their constitutional rights. The inmates claimed the jail's twenty footcandles of illumination did not meet minimum standards. The county's expert, however, took readings in the courtroom which revealed eighteen footcandles at the judge's bench.

The inmates complained that they did not have any meaningful opportunity for outdoor exercise or activities. The county testified the inmates were allowed to play cards and board games, read books, ride exercise bikes, and were provided with American Medical Association booklets on indoor exercise.

The inmates contended that SCJ's classification system failed to adequately segregate pretrial and convicted prisoners, males and females, and juveniles and adults. The county rebutted. The inmates also alleged that inmates with emotional and medical problems were not segregated from the general population. The county testified otherwise, maintaining that incoming inmates were screened, and serious medical and emotional conditions were sent to the county hospital or mental health center.

The appeals court determined that the county presented sufficient evidence to support a finding that none of the conditions amounted to constitutional violations. (Shelby County Jail, Indiana)

U.S. District Court
CROWDING
PROGRAMS

Morales Feliciano v. Romero Bercelo, 672 F.Supp. 591 (D. P.R. 1986). According to a federal court, prison overcrowding, inmate idleness, and the threat of violence among inmates, combined with the continuous frustrations of reasonable expectation produced by administrative incompetence, resulted in an ascertainable psychological deterioration in the Puerto Rican prison population. The psychological deterioration inflicted on inmates in the prison system was an unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain in violation of prisoners' eighth amendment protections against cruel and unusual punishment. Insofar as the Puerto Rican prison administration was under a statutory duty to provide rehabilitative programs through which inmates could earn time credits towards early release, unavailability of any form of useful work, study or even recreation, where none of the physical conditions of confinement met constitutional standards, combined with continuous frustrations of reasonable expectations produced by administrative incompetence, inflicted serious psychological harm on inmates, which was independently cognizable under the Eighth Amendment. When inmates' opportunities to study or work within prison were taken away by irregularities in the classification system or the prison administration's inability to provide a safe environment, inmates were deprived of liberty interest implicating a statutorily created expectation that imprisonment could be shortened by work and study. Inmates of Puerto Rican jails were denied due process as a result of inefficient, inexperienced, and often incompetent social-penal counseling system, which had a severe negative impact on inmates' opportunities to establish eligibility for parole and to actually be heard in a timely manner by a parole board. Commingling of pretrial detainees with convicted prisoners, in conjunction with finding that conditions which prevailed in all institutions at which pretrial detainees were housed violated the Eighth Amendment rights of convicted inmates, was a sufficient basis for holding that pretrial detainees were being punished prior to conviction and that, therefore, they were deprived of liberty without due process of law. (Commonwealth of Puerto Rico)

U. S. District Court
REMEDIES

Ruiz v. McCotter, 661 F.Supp. 112 (S.D.Tex. 1986). The Texas Department of Corrections was in contempt of court for failure to afford sufficient single-occupancy cells, in failing to assign housing to prisoners according to their respective custody classifications, in failing to maintain a specified number of personnel, and to deploy staff in the housing areas, in failing to employ a substantial number of health care professionals, in failing to meet the needs of the physically handicapped, in failing to afford prisoners in administrative segregation appropriate housing facilities, and in failing to build and properly equip recreation yards and gymnasiums. On the whole, the court found, TDC had been habitually and inexcusably dilatory in complying with the orders in question. The court noted that contempt represents more than delay in performance or lack of perfection; it is, instead, failure to accomplish what was ordered in meaningful respects. Defendants may defeat finding of contempt by demonstrating that they employed, in good faith, utmost diligence in discharging their responsibilities. Prison inmates were not required to show that Texas Department of Corrections had violated the Eighth Amendment or to develop a method by which the Department could achieve compliance with consent decree in order to support a finding of contempt for violating the decree; rather, inmates were required to establish by clear and convincing evidence that the Department had inappropriately mixed custody classifications or had housed prisoners not in minimum custody status in dormitories, and had done both, in violation of stipulations forming bases for district court orders. Motions to modify so as to alleviate or eliminate conditions or restrictions imposed by prior court order require a clear showing of grievous wrong evoked by new and unforeseen conditions. Texas Department of Corrections' alleged change in philosophy to a belief that dormitories provide adequate, secure housing for women prisoners in medium and close custody classifications was not sufficient to require modification of stipulations incorporated in court orders requiring inmates to be housed with inmates of like classification, in light of the fact that certain women inmates had been moved to cell housing, and conflicting testimony regarding appropriateness of dormitory housing for women requiring medium or close custody. (Texas Department of Corrections)

1987

U.S. Appeals Court
CROWDING

Akao v. Shimoda, 832 F.2d 119 (9th Cir. 1987), cert. denied, 108 S.Ct. 1301. A Federal lawsuit alleging overcrowding was brought by three prisoners in Hawaii. Finding no eighth amendment violation, the lawsuit was dismissed by the district court. The decision was reversed by the U.S. Court of Appeals, which concurred that an allegation of overcrowding without additional cruel and unusual treatment does not state a claim. However, it found these prisoners had alleged more. The prisoners claimed that because of the increased population, there was "an increase in stress, tension, communicable diseases, and a high increase in confrontations between inmates." (Oahu Community Correctional Center, Hawaii)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEGREGATION

Bailey v. Shillinger, 828 F.2d 651 (10th Cir. 1987). After his voluntary transfer to a prison in another state, a Wyoming state prisoner who was serving a sentence for first degree murder murdered another prisoner and was returned to the Wyoming State Prison. The warden assigned him to a maximum security unit without a formal hearing. The prisoner filed a civil rights lawsuit against the warden, alleging his due process rights had been violated. He also charged that he was subjected to cruel and unusual punishment by being deprived of exercise and fresh air. The appeals court concluded that, because of the danger the inmate presented to other inmates and staff, the court concluded the warden was correct in assigning the inmate to maximum security. As to the cruel and unusual treatment charge, the court concluded that the one hour per day of exercise and fresh air was "restrictive" but did not violate the Eighth Amendment. (Wyoming State Prison)

U.S. District Court
SMOKE

Beeson v. Johnson, 668 F.Supp. 498 (E.D.N.C. 1987). A federal district court declined to hold that an inmate has a constitutional right to be housed in a smoke-free environment, but allowed his Federal Civil Rights lawsuit alleging that smoke aggravated his medical problems to proceed. (Central Prison, North Carolina)

U.S. District Court
REMEDIES
CROWDING

Benjamin v. Malcolm, 659 F.Supp. 1006 (S.D.N.Y. 1987). Temporary relief was granted to New York City correctional facilities to allow them to cope with the recent increase in population. However, "no further requests for modification will be granted regardless of foreseeable or unforeseeable problems which may arise." (Brooklyn House of Detention for Men and Queens House of Detention for Men)

U.S. Appeals Court
CROWDING
CELL CAPACITY

Cody v. Hillard, 830 F.2d 912 (8th Cir. 1987), cert. denied, 108 S.Ct. 1078. An inmate brought a class action under a civil rights statute complaining of overcrowding and substandard living conditions. The United States District Court for the District of South Dakota ordered an end to the practice of double-celling of inmates. Prison officials appealed. The Court of Appeals initially affirmed (799 F.2d 447). After granting a petition for rehearing en banc, the U.S. Court of Appeals, Eighth Circuit, held that the practice of double-celling did not evince the "wanton and unnecessary infliction of pain" necessary to constitute a violation of the Eighth Amendment. On appeal, prison officials contended that the trial court erred in finding that double-celling of inmates at the South Dakota State Prison (SDSP) violates the eighth and fourteenth amendments to the United State Constitution. They also claimed that the district court erred in using the "rated capacities" of the American Corrections Association (ACA) as a reference for measuring the permissible capacity of the prison under the eighth amendment. The appeals court reversed the district court's order with respect to double-celling, ruling that "...the record in this case falls far short of supporting the district court's conclusion that the line drawn by Rhodes has been crossed by double-celling at SDSP. Accordingly, there is no constitutional basis for the district court's remedial order with respect to double-celling." The court also noted that "We have found nothing in the record or the District Court's findings of fact to persuade us that our conclusions regarding double-celling generally should be different with regard to the protective custody area of the prison." (South Dakota State Penitentiary)

U.S. District Court
USE OF FORCE

Collins v. Ward, 652 F.Supp. 500 (S.D. N.Y. 1987). The district court held that a situation with which prison officials and employees by reason of threat posed to safety of staff and inmates, were justified in using tear gas to regain control over the inmate and free the other inmates held hostage without violating prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment. Officials were faced with an inmate, armed with bottles, scissors, a wrench and a mop wringer, who held a group of ailing inmates hostage in a prison hospital and threatened to kill any member of the prison staff who attempted to enter. Conditions of confinement, being part of the penalty that criminal offenders pay for their offenses against society, may constitute cruel and unusual punishment regardless of whether there is an express intent to inflict unnecessary pain. Conduct that does not purport to be punishment at all must involve more than ordinary lack of due care for prisoner's interest or safety in order to constitute cruel and unusual punishment.

Standards of obduracy and wantonness, not inadvertence or error in good faith, apply for determining cruel and unusual punishment whether conduct occurs in connection with establishing conditions of confinement, supplying medical needs, or restoring official control over a tumultuous cellblock.

The fact that alternative methods, other than tear gas, were available to subdue riotous prisoners did not mean that use of tear gas constituted cruel and unusual punishment when prison officials and employees otherwise acted in good faith and employed special precautions to minimize harmful effects of tear gas upon innocent bystanders. (Green Haven Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
CELLS

Feliciano v. Colon, 672 F.Supp. 627 (D. P.R. 1987). An order that would give inmates 35 square feet of living space was refused modification by a federal court. Issued eight years ago in Feliciano v. Barcelo, 497 F.Supp. 14 (D. P.R. 1980), was an order requiring that each inmate be provided with at least 35 square feet of living space. A federal court denied Puerto Rican prison authorities' request that it modify this order. Refusing to accept the argument that all persons presently incarcerated would present a danger to the community if released, the court stated that prison authorities had failed to explore alternatives which might include the transfer of inmates to federal prisons, temporary housing, or halfway houses. Since prison authorities did not notify the court of predictable problems in compliance when the inmate population had increased faster than earlier estimates and it became clear the estimates were too low, this did not justify modification of the order. (Puerto Rico System)

U.S. District Court
FOOD

Gabel v. Estelle, 677 F.Supp. 514 (S.D. Tex. 1987). Inmates suffered no denial of their constitutional rights when, as indicated in their civil rights lawsuit, they were furnished peanut butter sandwiches as the sole nourishment during a lockdown. Prison officials responded to a non-violent work strike of over 150 inmates by locking all striking inmates in their cells without notice or hearing. The court found that the lock-down was imposed upon all striking inmates without partiality and was the kind of action prison officials were entitled to take in response to a confrontation with an inmate. In addition, the court also found no constitutional violation on the mere basis of the inmates' "distaste" for peanut butter. It added that "the strike itself may have been the cause of the limited fare." (Wynne Unit, Texas Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
CROWDING
SANITATION
HYGIENE
LIGHT
VENTILATION

Gillespie v. Crawford, 833 F.2d 47 (5th Cir. 1987). Two Texas inmates filed a federal civil rights lawsuit when they contracted tuberculosis after allegedly being housed in crowded and unhealthy conditions, which included inadequate ventilation and lighting, and dirt and insect infestation. The inmates stated that they had repeatedly complained about these conditions, but that no corrective action was taken. The district court dismissed the lawsuit as "frivolous;" on appeal, the dismissal was overturned. According to the appeals court, that intent is not an element of a cause of action for eighth amendment claims alleging unconstitutional conditions of confinement. "Prison conditions," the court said, "may violate the eighth amendment even if they are not imposed maliciously or with the conscious desire to inflict gratuitous pain." The court also refused to bar the inmate's claim on the basis that a special master appointed in an earlier case, Ruiz v. Estelle, 688 F.2d 266 (5th Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 460 U.S. 1042 (1983), was monitoring the correction of prison conditions found in that suit to violate the eighth amendment. (Texas Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
ISOLATION
MEDICAL CARE

Judd v. Packard, 669 F.Supp. 741 (D.Md. 1987). After noticing that an inmate suffered from various illnesses and weight loss, prison officials put him in medical isolation on three separate occasions for testing, diagnostic and treatment purposes, including testing for exposure to AIDS. After testing positive for the HTLV-III antibody present in those exposed to AIDS, the inmate filed a federal lawsuit claiming that each placing of him in isolation was an act of discrimination on the basis of a handicap, i.e., a positive HTLV-III test, and consequently, a violation of his civil rights. The federal district court found that there was no claim under the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, 29 U.S.C. Sec. 794, because the inmate had not alleged any "nexus" between the allegedly discriminatory conduct of the defendant prison officials and a specific program receiving federal funding. The court also that, even assuming that testing positive for HTLV-III constituted a handicap, discrimination against handicapped individuals "is not invidious discrimination, and thus, it is not subject to strict or heightened judicial scrutiny." Therefore, the court found that the correct test to be applied was whether the prison's actions had a legitimate purpose and whether it was rational to believe that the treatment afforded the individual would promote that purpose. (Mayo Correctional Institution, Maryland)

U.S. District Court
ODORS
SANITATION

McBride v. Illinois Dept. of Corrections, 677 F.Supp. 537 (N.D. Ill. 1987). An appeals court ruled that prison conditions that are harsh or cause discomfort do not necessarily violate the Eight Amendment. Odors in the correctional facility, including odors from cellmate, odors from toilet, and odors from spray used to control roach infestation, did not constitute constitutionally prohibited cruel and unusual punishment. The plaintiff challenged his conditions of confinement in a civil rights complaint. The court also ruled that a lack of rehabilitative programs did not give rise to an actionable civil rights claim. (Stateville Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
CELLS
CROWDING
REMEDIES

Morales Feliciano v. Hernandez Colon, 672 F.Supp. 627 (D. Puerto Rico 1987). Puerto Rican prison authorities moved to modify stipulation and an order that they provide each prisoner with at least 35 square feet of living space. The district court held that: (1) prison authorities were not entitled to relief under subsection of federal rule allowing modification on the ground that changed circumstances would make further compliance with order unjust; (2) prison authorities failed to show that compliance would result in pernicious consequences, and failed to show changed circumstances warranting relief; and (3) building project undertaken to increase dramatically available beds for housing did not entitle prison authorities to relief. The possible release of prisoners by Puerto Rican prison authorities as a result of compliance with a court order that they provide each prisoner with at least 35 square feet of living space was not a "pernicious consequence" of compliance and did not entitle them to relief from order under Rule 60(b)(6); there was little factual support for assertion that all persons presently incarcerated in Puerto Rico would present danger to the community if released, argument had an undertone of disingenuity, and compliance would not interfere with efforts of Commonwealth as to enforcement of criminal law or any other policy decision of that entity. The court ruled that prison authorities should have known that the population projection figure on which they relied was, in all probability, inaccurate, and, even if they did not properly assess information available at that time, they certainly knew by the end of 1986 that they had drastically underestimated the actual rate of growth, but did not make the motion for relief from the stipulation, informally apprise the court of predictable problems in compliance, solicit assistance of monitor or seek discussions with plaintiffs' counsel. (Puerto Rico System)

U.S. District Court
SANITATION
PLUMBING
TOILETS

Nilsson v. Coughlin, 670 F.Supp. 1186 (S.D.N.Y. 1987). Inmates stated a claim under the Eighth Amendment for cruel and unusual punishment. The inmates alleged there was raw sewage in the cells, unsanitary dining facilities, a constant level of noise that was physically harmful, a lack of meaningful vocational, educational or recreational programs, and a host of other conditions. The federal court ruled that a fair inference could be drawn from the pro se complaint that the prison officials were grossly negligent in supervising or, alternatively, in promulgating policies, that caused unconstitutional conditions. (Sullivan Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
CROWDING
REMEDIES

Tate v. Frey, 673 F.Supp. 880 (W.D. Ky. 1987). Action was brought to hold Kentucky corrections officials in contempt for violating terms of an order and preliminary injunction prohibiting them from housing more than 30 state prisoners in the county jail at any time and ordering that no prisoner who was an inmate at the county jail to be allowed to remain there for more than 30 days. Evidence established that officers had been in constant and consistent violation of orders since March of 1987. Prison wardens would not be held in contempt for corrections officials' violations of order and preliminary injunction. It was not shown that wardens had any control over decisions to keep state prison inmates at the county jail, although they may have acted ministerially in response to orders issued by corrections officials. The state contemnors were ordered to pay the Metropolitan Correctional Services a fine of $100 per day per state inmate in excess of 30 and for each day over 30 a state prisoner stayed in the county jail, $25 per day. The state contemnors were also ordered to pay a fine in the amount of $25 per day to each state inmate who has been housed at the Jefferson County Jail for more than 30 days. (Jefferson County Jail, Kentucky)

U.S. Appeals Court
DOUBLE CELLING
SEGREGATION

Tyler v. Black, 811 F.2d 424 (8th Cir. 1987), cert. denied, 109 S.Ct. 1760. On appeal, a federal court held that: (1) the mass transfer of inmate to a segregation unit during a period of prison unrest did not violate due process, but (2) double celling of inmates in small cells with solid "boxcar" type doors was cruel and unusual punishment in violation of Eighth Amendment. The mass transfer of inmates to a segregation unit during a period of prison unrest did not violate due process, where inmates were given posttransfer hearings, the warden perceived move as a necessary emergency security measure, no punitive purpose was involved, and the transfers were purely temporary administrative segregations. However, double celling of inmates in segregation unit in small cells with solid "boxcar" type doors was cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth Amendment; inmates with history of assaultive behavior were placed in closed cells for up to 23 hours a day for a period of several months. (Missouri State Penitentiary, Special Management Facility)

1988

U.S. District Court
CROWDING
REMEDIES
PRETRIAL
DETAINEES

Albro v. Onondaga County, N.Y., 677 F.Supp. 697 (N.D.N.Y. 1988). The alleged offender is afforded protection by a due process clause instead of the Eighth Amendment, which prevents holding a detainee under conditions that would be equal to punishment. A violation of due process was found to exist when crowded conditions were found at a pretrial detention facility, causing many detainees to sleep on cots in the walkways and creating a hazard to both detainees and staff. There was no operational compensation for overcrowding conditions such as adequate exercise time, vocational training, or free time in the dayroom or other open space. Detainees frequently spent only a free hour on a walkway or in "passive" recreation and were confined to their cells at least 23 hours a day. The court found correctional staff insufficient to safely respond to duties; further, the court also concluded that inmates "have ready access to weapons through the dismantling of their cots." The capacity of the facility was capped by the court. Daily fines were levied on the county as an appropriate remedy for continuing overcrowding at the detention facility whenever the inmate population exceeded its capacity for four days or more. The county was ordered to pay $1,000 per day if the population reached 213-217, up to $10,000 daily if the population goes over 247. Even though the plaintiffs had withdrawn the motion for contempt, the court kept the power to punish violations that may have occurred, or might occur in the future. (Public Safety Building)

U.S. District Court
CHALLENGES

Brody v. McMahan, 684 F.Supp. 354 (N.D.N.Y. 1988). An inmate filed a complaint against the New York Commission of Corrections seeking to hold individual members liable for the conditions of the prison. The court ruled that members of the Commission could not be held personally liable for conditions at the prison because the Commission is simply a "watchdog" agency and has no direct power to control or direct customs and policies of prison facilities in New York. (New York State Commission of Correction)

U.S. District Court BEDS
CROWDING

Castillo v. Bowles, 687 F.Supp. 277 (N.D.Tex. 1988). A jail inmate brought an action against the county sheriff and deputy for a violation of his civil rights. The district court found that the fact that the inmate was temporarily forced to sleep on the jail floor due to overcrowding did not give rise to a violation of his constitutional rights. The court noted that the necessity of sleeping on the floor was the only injury the plaintiff claimed was caused by the overcrowding. The court found that "these claims are not cognizable under" 42 U.S.C.A. Section 1983 since the "United States Constitution does not require that prisoners be provided an elevated bed," citing Mann v. Smith, 796 F.2d 79, 85 (5th Cir. 1986). (Dallas County Jail, Texas)

U.S. Appeals Court
OUT-OF-CELL TIME
HYGIENE EXERCISE
SHOWERS

Davenport v. DeRoberts, 844 F.2d 1310 (7th Cir. 1988), cert. denied, 109 S.Ct. 260. Inmates brought a class action suit against the prison alleging cruel and unusual punishment because they were allowed only one hour per week for exercise and one shower per week. The federal district court granted injunctive relief and allowed three showers per week and five hours out-of-cell exercise per week, except when there was an emergency or a lock down; the court awarded only nominal damages. The Department of Corrections' own medical director testified that four to seven hours outside the cell, and three showers, were the weekly minimum necessary to prevent serious adverse effects on the physical and mental health of inmates confined in what is a form of solitary confinement. The department also argued that each cell contained a wash basin in which the inmate could wash himself as often as he liked and that the cells were large enough for the inmate to engage in various sorts of exercise, including push-ups, sit-ups and running in place. The lower court noted that "we do not suggest that this is always and everywhere the constitutional minima; much less may suffice when the period of incarceration is brief." However, on the issue of showers, the court noted that limiting the number of showers to one a week did not have a serious effect on the mental or physical well-being of the inmates and that "the deprivation merely of cultural amenities is not cruel and unusual punishment." The appeals court agreed, refusing to uphold an order for three showers per week. (Stateville Correctional Center)

U.S. Appeals Court
CHALLENGES

Gladson v. Rice, 862 F.2d 711 (8th Cir. 1988). A prisoner brought a Section 1983 action to challenge his temporary confinement, in a county jail, apart from the general inmate population during his ten-day transfer from a state penitentiary in connection with post-conviction proceedings on his behalf. The U.S. District Court granted summary judgment in favor of the county sheriff and members of the jail staff, and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed the lower court decision, finding that the prisoner's due process rights were not violated by the confinement. Prison officials received information from the penitentiary personnel that the prisoner was considered an escape risk who had a potential for violence, and there was no appreciable difference between the prisoner's basic status and living conditions in the penitentiary and those in the jail to which he was temporarily assigned. The court also found that the prisoner's constitutional guarantee against cruel and unusual punishment was not violated by the county prison's denial to him of unlimited access to certain amenities and privileges such as radio, television, telephone, showers, visitors, exercise, and cigarettes. The jail officials evaluated the prisoner's potential threat to the jail security in light of the information received from the correctional officials at the state penitentiary, and they provided the prisoner with a substantial equivalent of his penitentiary living arrangement. (Polk County Jail, Iowa)

U.S. District Court
HYGIENE
SANITATION
SEGREGATION

Harris v. Fleming, 839 F.2d 1232 (7th Cir. 1988), affirmed, 993 F.2d 1549. An inmate filed a federal civil rights lawsuit against three prison officials, claiming he had been subjected to cruel and unusual punishment seeking $320,000 in compensatory and punitive damages. The inmate stated that the prison failed to supply him with toilet paper for five days, or with soap, toothpaste or a toothbrush for ten days and he was kept in a "filthy" roach-infested cell. He also complained that during 28 days in a segregation unit he was refused permission to exercise. Since the inmate suffered no physical harm, but merely some unpleasantness, the federal appeals court found that the defendants' temporary neglect of the prisoner was not intentional and that it did not reach unconstitutional proportions. While the court found that the circumstances of the case demonstrated some neglect and indifference on the prison's part, it concluded that the conditions were temporary and affected only one inmate. Although the inmate was deprived of "yard or recreation time," he could have "improvised temporarily with jogging in place, aerobics, or pushups." (Menard Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
DOUBLE CELLING
CLASSIFICATION

Heath v. DeCourcy, 704 F.Supp. 799 (S.D. Ohio 1988). An action was brought challenging conditions of confinement at a county facility. A motion was filed to modify an agreed modification of a consent decree. The district court, denying the motion in part and granting the motion in part, found that the agreed modification would be modified in part as requested with respect to the classification of inmates permitted to be double-celled at the facility. According to the court, a consent decree may be modified where a better appreciation of facts in light of experience indicates that the decree is not properly adopted to accomplishing its purposes. The defendant seeking to modify the consent decree has a burden of showing his entitlement to relief sought based on evidentiary record. The parties in this class action suit entered into a Consent Decree which became a final judgment in this case in 1985. An Agreed Modification of Agreed Final Judgment (Agreed Modification) was negotiated by the parties and became a final judgment in this case in 1988. This modified Consent Decree permitted double-celling of inmates in the Justice Complex in 168 cells, set an inmate population limit in the Jail Annex of 162 and in the Justice Complex of 1016, provided for an inmate safety and well-being, gave defendants the authority to comply with the maximum population limits by releasing inmates based upon set criteria and by refusing admission of inmates, and authority to set staffing limits. Over the inmates objections, the court approved as eligible for double-celling inmates being held pretrial on misdemeanor or felony charges and eligible inmates split-sentenced on felony charges, provided the double-celling should be implemented only when absolutely necessary and required by the penological program, and then only for the minimum time required, and that other requirements for "minimum security" classification be met. All parties agreed that the classification requirements paragraph in the agreed modification was in error. (Hamilton County Jail and Justice Complex, Ohio)

U.S. District Court
CAPACITY
TOTALITY OF CONDITIONS

Inmates of the Allegheny County Jail v. Wecht, 699 F.Supp. 1137 (W.D. Pa. 1988). Prison inmates sued county and state officials to relieve the overcrowding at the county jail. The district court found that conditions at the jail including overcrowding, deplorable mental health facilities, fire hazards and the lack of reliable climate control rendered the jail constitutionally inadequate. The Commonwealth was partially responsible for the conditions and would be required to shoulder partial responsibility of remedial measures; and the jail would be closed and a new facility was required to be constructed. (Allegheny County Jail, Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania)

U.S. District Court
CELLS
CRUEL AND UNUSUAL
PUNISHMENT

Johnson v. Commissioner of Correctional Services, 699 F.Supp. 1071 (S.D.N.Y. 1988). An inmate filed a Section 1983 action against the correctional facility, superintendent, Commissioner of Correctional Services, and corrections officers to recover damages for an alleged eighth amendment violation arising from the confinement in a cell with an inoperable sink for nine days. The sink became inoperable after officers performed a "cell frisk" of the plaintiff's cell. The officers removed a number of things considered contraband and weapons and at the same time also took a nine inch plastic push rod from the sink in the cell. The rod was removed from the sink because in the past, inmates had successfully fashioned it into a weapon. It was impossible to obtain water from the sink without the rod. The inmate remained in the cell for nine days before being moved. The inmate alleged that he had no water from his sink nor water from any other source, other than a bucket of water he obtained while showering. But he did receive a beverage with each meal. He claimed that the lack of water caused him to become dehydrated and aggravated his migraine headaches because he was unable to take medication without ready access to water. The district court found that the confinement was not "cruel and unusual punishment"; the inmate received beverages with meals and obtained a bucket of water at one point during the confinement, and once dehydration was confirmed by the correctional facility's nurse, the inmate was removed to another cell. The court also found that the doctrine of qualified immunity barred the inmate's claim. The Commissioner was entitled to summary judgment on the grounds of a lack of personal involvement; and fact questions, as to whether the superintendent knew of the alleged violation but did nothing, precluded a summary judgment for the superintendent on the grounds of a lack of personal involvement. (Green Haven Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
CROWDING
CELL CAPACITY

Lyons v. Powell, 838 F.2d 28 (1st Cir. 1988). A pretrial detainee brought action alleging violation of his civil rights. The federal district court dismissed complaint for failure to state cause of action, and appeal was taken. The appeals court held that the pretrial detainee's allegations that he was confined to a cell for 22-23 hours per day for a 27-day period, and was forced to sleep on a floor mattress, were sufficient to state a Section 1983 cause of action on ground of deprivation of liberty without due process. The court was troubled by the inmate's contention that he was confined to a cell for 27 days with another inmate, during which time he was forced to sleep on a mattress on the floor of the cell, and his claims that the mattress nearly covered the floor of his cell, and placed appellant in a position which was in close proximity to the open toilet in the cell. According to the court, the U.S. Supreme Court has held that "double-bunking," that is, placing two inmates in a cell presumably intended for a single inmate, does not constitute punishment. This practice, then, does not constitute a per se violation of a pretrial detainee's due process rights. Bell v. Wolfish, supra, 441 U.S. at 541, 99 S.Ct. at 1875. The Court left open the possibility, however, that "confining a given number of people in a given amount of space in such a manner as to cause them to endure genuine privations and hardship over an extended period of time might raise serious questions under the Due Process Clause as to whether those conditions amounted to punishment..." Id. at 542, 99 S.Ct. at 1875-1876. In Lareau v. Manson, 651 F.2d 96 (2d Cir. 1981), the Second Circuit held that double-bunking of pretrial detainees was constitutionally permissible for a period of no more than 15 days, but that the use of a floor mattress constituted punishment "without regard to the number of days for which a prisoner is so confined." According to the court, "Based on the foregoing considerations, we conclude that the district court incorrectly dismissed appellant's complaint for failure to state a cause of action." The court ruled, however, that the pretrial detainee was not denied access to court; detainee was given periodic access to a law library, and was not constitutionally entitled to also receive assistance from "persons trained in the law." (New Hampshire State Prison)

U.S. Appeals Court
DOUBLE CELLING
CELL CAPACITY

Plyler v. Evatt, 846 F.2d 208 (4th Cir. 1988), cert. denied, 109 S.Ct. 241. The State requested modification of a consent decree so as to allow double-celling at new prisons and also appealed a court-ordered release of 700 inmates. This request was denied by the district court. The federal appeals court found that the State had made a good-faith effort to comply with the consent decree and had faced an unanticipated increase in the prison population and that it was an abuse of discretion not to allow double-celling--ordering the district court to modify the consent decree to allow double-celling at the five new facilities. The appeals court noted that the state had embarked on an aggressive program of new prison construction, involving the spending of over one-hundred million dollars, as well as instituting early release programs to alleviate overcrowding. The court also noted that there were potential dangers from the early release of high risk inmates--dangers which "far outweigh any imposition on the inmates from double-celling" in some of the "modern, air-conditioned facilities" which have been constructed. The court retained jurisdiction to order further remedies should the double-celling result in any unconstitutional conditions of confinement. (South Carolina Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
REMEDIES

Rowland v. U.S. Dist. Court for N.D. of Cal., 849 F.2d 380 (9th Cir. 1988). Prisoners brought a lawsuit seeking to correct prison conditions. The federal district court issued a permanent injunction and ordered a monitor to inspect the new prison. Prison officials sought a writ of mandamus to vacate the order. The appeals court held that the district court was without jurisdiction to authorize a monitor to inspect new prison because the facility was not covered by its permanent injunction correcting various facility-specific unconstitutional conditions at the old facility. To establish whether violations existed at the new facility, a new lawsuit must be brought. The court noted that removing segregated prisoners from the old facility was one way for prison officials to satisfy the purpose behind the injunction by removing prisoners from the facility that was found to be old, overcrowded and dirty and could not have been to subvert or undermine the permanent injunction. (New Folsom Prison, California)

U.S. Appeals Court
CAPACITY
CROWDING
REMEDIES

Twelve John Does v. District of Columbia, 861 F.2d 295 (D.C. Cir. 1988). The District of Columbia's motion to modify a consent decree establishing a population lid on a prison facility was denied by the U.S. District Court, and the District appealed. The appeals court, affirming in part and vacating and remanding in part, found that the increase in the number of inmates in the District of Columbia prison system was not unforeseeable, and thus was not a change of conditions entitling the District to modification of the consent decree establishing a population lid for the prison facility. Evidence failed to establish that the District made a good-faith attempt to comply with the consent decree. The district court order requiring that, before inmates subject to the consent decree be transferred to another District facility, the Director of the Department of Corrections was required to certify to the court that a transfer would not threaten to violate the obligation to provide adequate care to the inmates in other facility extended relief to inmates who were not party to the original proceedings and not encompassed by the provisions of the consent decree. Thus, the certification requirement was not a valid means of enforcing the consent decree. (Central Facility, Lorton, District of Columbia)

U.S. Appeals Court
CROWDING

Williams v. Willits, 853 F.2d 586 (8th Cir. 1988). A prisoner brought civil rights action against guards and prison supervisors. A federal appeals court held that: (1) the complaint did not allege any nexus between alleged overcrowding in prison and a fight between prisoner and inmate, and (2) prison guards did not violate a prisoner's civil rights by failing to break up a fight between him and another inmate where they determined that any effort to intervene would increase the risk because the guards were outnumbered by the inmates in the prison yard where the fight took place. To prove a supervisory liability claim in a civil rights action, a prison inmate was required to demonstrate that prisoners faced a pervasive and unreasonable risk of harm from some specified source and that the supervisor's corrective inaction amounted to deliberate indifference or tacit authorization; a single incident, or isolated incidents, would not ordinarily satisfy that burden. A prison inmate's allegation that a prison guard stood by and watched while he and another inmate engaged in a fight did not state grounds for holding prisoner supervisors liable for any violation of civil rights. (Iowa State Penitentiary)

1989

U.S. District Court
CONDITIONS OF CONFINEMENT
REMEDIES DORMITORIES
CAPACITY

Benjamin v. Koehler, 710 F.Supp. 91 (S.D.N.Y. 1989). New York City sought modification of a court order imposing limitations on the number of inmates who could be housed in a dormitory and the square footage which could be afforded to each inmate for living purposes. The federal district court ruled that the city was not entitled to modify because an increase in population was not unforeseeable and modifications were not constitutionally acceptable. According to the court, the evaluation of the application is governed by two criteria. First, did the increase in arrests as a result of the "crack" epidemic constitute a new and unforeseeable condition adequate to warrant modification of the decrees or does the city itself bear the responsibility for failing to foresee the overcrowding crisis that exists now? Second, are the defendants' requested modifications, each of which must be examined independently, constitutionally acceptable or are they in derogation of the primary goal of the decrees to ensure constitutionally minimal conditions for detainees? The court stated,

"The denial of the city's application should not be construed as minimizing the problem which the city faces but rather as a determination that the problem cannot again be solved at the expense of the people held in custody. The emergency which the city faces does not, for example, authorize the holding of 75 male prisoners in a receiving room with one toilet, insufficient benches and chairs, and often without mattresses to sleep on, for as much as two to three days. The problem will not be solved by requiring prisoners to live within forty square feet for two weeks. The time has come for the city to accept the fact that the court cannot consciously produce a solution to its chronically recurring problem. The city must accept the responsibility for dealing with the increase in the population." (Queens House of Detention for Men, Brooklyn House of Detention for Men, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
FIRE SAFETY

Berry v. Peterson, 887 F.2d 635 (5th Cir. 1989). An inmate who was injured in a fire at the county jail brought a suit against the county, county board of supervisors, and the sheriff. The district court entered judgment in favor of the inmate and awarded him $200,000. The appeals court reversed the award after finding that the inmate who was injured in the fire "voluntarily" executed a covenant-not-to-sue, notwithstanding the attorney's alleged failure to adequately explain that the inmate thereby waived any claims against the county. The covenant-not-to-sue was not against public interest and could be enforced by the county. The court stated that the enforceability of the inmate's covenant-not-to-sue for injuries sustained during the fire was one of law for the court. The only issue which was even arguably suitable for the jury was the voluntariness of the agreement. (Hancock County Jail, Bay St. Louis, Mississippi)

U.S. District Court
CLOTHING
HYGIENE
SANITATION

Bird v. Figel, 725 F.Supp. 406 (N.D. Ind. 1989). After a civil rights plaintiff was awarded compensatory and civil damages arising out of his incarceration in the county lockup facility, the defendant sheriff and deputy sheriffs moved for judgment notwithstanding the verdict or, in alternative, a new trial. The district court found that the evidence supported the jury award and the instruction on punitive damages was proper. There was testimony that, during the plaintiff's two incarcerations, he was stripped and given only a white suicide gown to wear. He was placed in a cell with nothing in it but a steel bed frame, he was told to drink from the toilet, he was ridiculed for being gay and for having AIDS syndrome, and he was denied access to the telephone and other amenities. The plaintiff alleged that the conditions of his confinement, pursuant to the sheriff's suicide watch policy, were unconstitutionally restrictive. He also alleged that correctional officers intentionally or recklessly violated his constitutional rights during one period of confinement. As to the allegations pertaining to the correctional officers, the plaintiff specifically alleged that they denied him water and told him to drink out of the toilet, denied him access to the telephone, denied him all personal hygiene effects, denied him visitation, denied him writing materials and postage, made unauthorized disclosures of the fact that he suffers from AIDS-related complex and were deliberately indifferent to his medical needs. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff with an award of $600 compensatory damages against all three defendants for one period of incarceration, $1000 punitive damages against two correctional officers for first period of incarceration and $200 compensatory damages against another correctional officer on the second period of incarceration. (Allen County Lockup Facility, Indiana)

U.S. Appeals Court
STAFFING

Birrell v. Brown, 867 F.2d 956 (6th Cir. 1989). An inmate at the Michigan State Prison brought a civil rights action challenging the conditions of his confinement. The director of the state prison system and the superintendent of the prison moved for a summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity. The district court denied the motion. On appeal, the court found that the officials' reliance on the district court's permission of enlargement of time for them to file a motion for reconsideration of its order excused the failure to file notice of appeal in a timely fashion and the officials were protected by qualified immunity. The court noted that a professional, sued in his individual capacity, will not be liable for damages if he was "unable to satisfy his normal professional standards because of budgetary restraints." The director of the Michigan prison system and the superintendent of the correctional facility were protected by qualified immunity from the inmate's civil rights action challenging allegedly inhumane conditions of confinement, including the understaffing of the institution and housing prisoners before desired or planned renovations at the facility could be completed. (Michigan's Western Wayne Correctional Facility)

U.S. District Court
VENTILATION
MEDICAL CARE FACILITIES

Brock v. Warren County, Tenn., 713 F.Supp. 238 (E.D. Tenn. 1989). An action was taken under a federal civil rights statute and the Tennessee wrongful death statute by the children of a prisoner who died from heat prostration. The district court found that the conditions in the cell where the prisoner was housed, including virtually nonexistent ventilation and extremely high temperature and humidity, were cruel and inhumane. The court also found that the failure of the county commissioners and the sheriff to provide even minimal medical training to jail guards or to provide the prisoner who died from heat prostration with adequate medical care, which might have been simply moving the prisoner, a nondangerous 62-year-old man, to a cooler cell, constituted deliberate indifference to the prisoner's medical needs and were proximate causes of the inmate's death. The county was liable under a civil rights statute for the prisoner's death from heat prostration, where the county commissioners made no effort despite being warned to rectify excessive heat and lack of ventilation problem in the jail and, specifically, in the cell where the deceased prisoner was housed. The deprivation of the prisoner's constitutional rights was the result of a municipal policy. The sheriff, who was the chief supervisor in charge of the county jail, could be held vicariously liable under a civil rights statute for the prisoner's death in light of evidence he directly participated in and knowingly acquiesced in the housing of the prisoner in a cell with inadequate ventilation and extremely high temperature and humidity. The sheriff argued that there was nothing he could do to improve the temperature and humidity conditions in a cell where the prisoner died because funds were controlled by the county commission. Remedial steps, subsequently taken, such as the removal of a metal cover and the placement of a large fan in the hallway outside the cell, could have alleviated adverse conditions without requiring any expenditure of money, and the failure to try to improve the conditions could result in the sheriff being assessed $10,000 in punitive damages for the prisoner's death from heat prostration. The court awarded the prisoner's children $100,000 in compensatory damages against the county and the sheriff. (Warren County Jail, Tennessee)

U.S. Appeals Court
CHALLENGES
EQUAL PROTECTION PROGRAMS
WOMEN

Canterino v. Wilson, 869 F.2d 948 (6th Cir. 1989). An action was filed challenging the denial of equal protection rights and the conditions of confinement in an institution for women. The U.S. District Court enjoined the enforcement of a statute which lists six categories of inmate in all Kentucky prisons who are ineligible for work release programs and the defendants appealed. The court of appeals found that the prisoners did not have a protected liberty interest in a particular classification, or in the study and/or work programs. The prisoners failed to prove that the denial of study and work release to members of their class was gender-based discrimination on its face; both men and women were included in the class of people who could be denied study and work release. Female prisoners failed to establish proof necessary to shift the burden of proof to prison and prison officials to show a legitimate justification for supposed discrimination; the court could not discern whether female prisoners were claiming that more women were unfairly classified and therefore unfairly denied these opportunities, or whether more women in the institution had committed serious crimes than men who were confined to similar institutions. (Kentucky Correctional Institute for Women)

U.S. District Court
OVERCROWDING
CONDITIONS
EXERCISE

Carver v. Knox County, Tenn., 753 F.Supp. 1370 (E.D. Tenn. 1989). A class action suit was brought on behalf of county jail inmates and pretrial detainees seeking declaratory and injunctive relief concerning conditions of confinement. The district court found that overcrowded conditions at the county jail violated the Fourteenth Amendment as applied to pretrial detainees and the Eighth Amendment as applied to convicted inmates. Rated capacity of the jail is 228. The inmate population at the Jail has hovered between 260 and 270 for several two to three-month periods during the last two years. As a result, many of the inmates were forced to sleep on the floor of the drunk tank. Moreover, the court found that the living conditions in the drunk tank of the jail were particularly deplorable due to the fact that this part of the facility was designed only to hold up to 12 intoxicated individuals for a short period of time, i.e., 24 to 48 hours; yet, the credible proof at trial indicated that this drunk tank regularly housed 30 to 50 persons for extended periods of time up to and exceeding one month. (Knox County Jail, Knoxville, Tennessee)

U.S. District Court
DOUBLE CELLING
TOTALITY

C.H. v. Sullivan, 718 F.Supp. 726 (D. Minn. 1989). Prisoners who were serving sentences under a federal witness security program brought action against the Attorney General and his agents, challenging double celling. The district court found that double celling was not cruel and unusual punishment despite the concern that double celling might result in the discovery of their identities by other inmates and threaten their security. The court also found that the use of a seniority system to determine which prisoners were double celled did not violate due process. Depriving prisoners serving sentences under a federal witness security program of seniority, and with it a single cell, for the violation of prison regulations did not so infringe upon the prisoners' safety as to constitute a violation of the fifth amendment. The seniority method was reasonably related to valid prison objectives of discipline and relief of overcrowding. The prisoners being disciplined were advised of charges and the facts supporting the charges and they were given a reasonable opportunity to call witnesses and present documentary evidence in their defense and an investigation was conducted to ensure that incompatible prisoners were not housed together. The court is permitted to look at the challenged conditions of confinement alone or in combination to determine whether an eighth amendment violation has occurred; a particular prison policy may not directly be a violation, but may lead to conditions which do constitute punishment without a penological purpose. (Federal Correctional Institution, Sandstone, Minnesota)

U.S. District Court
CELLS
CONDITIONS

Denz v. Clearfield County, 712 F.Supp. 65 (W.D. Pa. 1989). A prisoner brought a civil rights action against Clearfield County and the County moved to dismiss. The district court found that the occurrence of a slip and fall injury as a result of dank, hot and humid cell conditions did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment and did not transform the conduct of the county into a wanton infliction of unnecessary pain. The prison inmate did not have a due process claim where the inmate had an opportunity to pursue a postdeprivation remedy in state court, and the complaint was dismissed. There is no constitutional liberty interest infringed upon by the merely negligent conduct of prisoner officials. (Clearfield County Prison, Pennsylvania)

U.S. District Court
CROWDING
EXERCISE

Essex County Jail Inmates v. Amato, 726 F.Supp. 539 (D. N.J. 1989). The inmates of a county jail sued the county seeking imposition of sanctions for the violation of a consent judgment under which the county was to abide by overall population limits and population limits within sections of the jail, and to afford each inmate an opportunity for one hour of recreation per day. The district court found that the imposition of fines for overcrowding based upon the agreed upon figure of $100 per day per inmate was warranted and the fine for the failure to provide recreational facilities, based on $20 per day per inmate affected, was warranted despite the claim that exercise opportunities could not be provided because of security concerns that prevented the installation of equipment in each tier. The federal court had authority to impose sanctions for violations of the agreement, embodied in the consent judgment, between inmates in the county prison and the county providing for maximum levels of occupancy of the prison and one hour of recreational opportunities per day per inmate as part of the court's general power to interpret and enforce contracts. A prior contempt finding against the prison for violating the maximum inmate population cap established by an agreement between inmates and the prison which was embodied in the consent judgment did not nullify a continued noncompliance with the order by the county. (Essex County Jail, New Jersey)

U.S. District Court
MEDICAL CARE
SANITATION
VENTILATION

Fambro v. Fulton County, Ga, 713 F.Supp. 1426 (N.D. Ga. 1989). The matter regarding conditions at a county jail came before the court ex mero motu after the court received a monitor's tentative findings of fact. The district court found that the substandard delivery of medical care in the jail was unconstitutional because it denied sentenced prisoners and pretrial detainees access to adequate health care in violation of the eighth and fourteenth amendments. The medical system subjected inmates to unnecessary risk of contracting dangerous or fatal communicable diseases, required inmates to suffer unnecessary pain and discomfort without the help of medical science, and, under the system, whole classes of inmates who were dependent on pharmaceuticals were required to wait for up to three days to receive their medicine. The court also found that the substandard sanitation in the jail was unconstitutional. Jails are constitutionally obligated to provide reasonably adequate sanitation for their inmates. This generally requires control of vermin and insects and clean places for eating, sleeping, and working and, additionally, concerns such areas as food preparation, medical facilities, lavatories, and showers. The substandard sanitation in the county jail endangered the health of sentenced prisoners and pretrial detainees, in violation of the eighth and fourteenth amendments. Food was being prepared in unsanitary surroundings and inmates were being required to live and sleep in and around seeping sewerage and in warm dark places which were not regularly and adequately cleaned, lit or ventilated. The court stated: "At various times heretofore, in an effort to address persistent overcrowding, the court has authorized the sheriff in his discretion to release inmates under a prioritized release order and has imposed a fine of $100 per day for each inmate sleeping on the floor. Other efforts have been made the county in a timid sort of way to select inmates who might be eligible for release. None of these efforts have succeeded in bringing the population of the jail down." In light of the overcrowding, resulting in unconstitutional operation of the county jail, and failure of other means to reduce jail population, a release order was appropriate remedy. (Fulton County Jail, Georgia)

U.S. District Court
EXERCISE
LEGAL ASSISTANCE
MEDICAL CARE
SHOWERS
TOILETS
TOTALITY OF CONDITIONS

Gilland v. Owens, 718 F.Supp. 665 (W.D. Tenn. 1989). Convicted inmates and pretrial detainees brought a Section 1983 action challenging conditions at a county jail. The U.S. District Court found that the inmates and detainees failed to establish that incidents of delayed medical attention occurred with sufficient frequency to violate the eighth amendment and due process rights to medical care. It was also found by the court that the sanitary and hygiene conditions did not violate constitutional rights. Frequent and delayed repairs of the county jail toilets and showers and short-term deprivations of toilet paper, towels, sheets, blankets, mattresses, toothpaste, and toothbrushes did not violate the eighth amendment or due process rights of the inmates and detainees. The evidence failed to show any undue delay in the repair of toilets and showers, and the evidence also failed to indicate that deprivations occurred with sufficient frequency to amount to constitutional deprivation. The court found that the lack of exercise opportunities at the overcrowded, county jail deprived the inmates and detainees of eighth amendment and due process rights, even though the sheriff intended to utilize gymnasium areas more fully in the future. The exposure of violence and the threat of personal harm in the county jail violated the eighth amendment and due process rights of the inmates and detainees, even though experts said that they could sense no pervasive fear or tension in jail. It was also stated by the court that the legal services at the county jail through the inadequate law library, two untrained jailhouse lawyers, and consultation with inmates' attorneys on pending criminal cases deprived convicted inmates and pretrial detainees of the constitutional right of access to courts, even though nothing showed that any inmate or detainee was unable to file a lawsuit. The amount of the sheriff's budget for various categories and sources of revenue was irrelevant in the action challenging the constitutionality of the conditions at the county jail. (Shelby County Jail, Memphis, Tennessee)

U.S. District Court
SMOKE

Gorman v. Moody, 710 F.Supp. 1256 (N.D. Ind. 1989). A prisoner brought an action challenging the failure of prison officials to segregate him from smoking inmates. The district court found that the failure of prison officials to segregate smokers from nonsmokers among the inmate population did not violate the eighth amendment because the eighth amendment draws its meaning from the evolving standards of decency in society as a whole. It is relevant that society cannot yet completely agree on the propriety of nonsmoking areas and a smoke-free environment. However, there might come a time when the evolving standards of decency would demand a smoke-free environment in a prison setting. The deliberate indifference standard was applicable to determine whether the failure of prison officials to segregate smokers from nonsmokers, thus exposing nonsmokers to secondhand smoke, violated their eighth amendment rights, and the prisoner asserting such a claim would have to show that prison officials intentionally exposed them to a known risk of harm and actually intended to harm him. Indiana's Clean Indoor Air Act does not create a protected liberty interest for nonsmoking prisoners to be segregated from smoking prisoners. (Westville Correctional Center, Indiana)

U.S. Appeals Court
CELLS
LAUNDRY
SANITATION

Howard v. Adkison, 887 F.2d 134 (8th Cir. 1989). An inmate brought an action against the supervisory officers at the facility at which he was confined, alleging the violation of his eighth amendment rights. The U.S. District Court entered a judgment in favor of the inmate, and the defendants appealed. The appeals court affirmed and found that the evidence concerning filthy conditions in the inmate's cell was sufficient to support a finding that the inmate's eighth amendment rights were violated. According to the court, inmates are entitled to reasonably adequate sanitation, personal hygiene, and laundry privileges, particularly over a lengthy period. Evidence that the inmate was confined for two years in a cell covered with filth and human waste and was denied access to proper cleaning supplies or laundry service was sufficient to establish that his confinement was cruel and unusual punishment within the meaning of the eighth amendment. Evidence that the inmate complained about filthy conditions in his cell continuously over a two-year period but that supervisory officers failed to provide him with any relief was sufficient to hold officers liable for eighth amendment violations. The appeals court upheld an award of $500 actual damages, $1 nominal damages and $750 punitive damages against the special unit manager, and $1,000 punitive damages against the lieutenant. (Missouri DOC and Human Resources)

U.S. Appeals Court
CAPACITY
TOTALITY OF CONDITIONS

Inmates of Allegheny County Jail v. Wecht, 874 F.2d 147 (3rd Cir. 1989). County officials appealed from an order of the U.S. District Court entered in a dispute over the conditions at the county jail. The court of appeals found that an order imposing contempt sanctions for the county's violation of inmate population caps at the jail, along with an order to close the jail was reasonable; however, an order requiring county officials to prepare a plan for the construction of a new jail facility was appealable. County officials could be held in contempt for failing to provide the warden at the county jail and his staff with the ability to comply with prior orders imposing inmate population caps and requiring trained psychiatric nurses at the jail's mental health unit. According to the court, when the totality of conditions in a jail violates the Constitution, the district court need not confine itself to the elimination of specific conditions; rather, the nature of overall violation determines the permissible scope of an effective remedy. The order prohibiting the county jail from being used to house inmates was an appropriate remedy in the action challenging conditions at the jail, in view of the jail's lack of adequate space for mental health facilities, its age, size and deteriorating condition, its persistent overcrowding problem and its small cell size. An order requiring county officials to submit a plan for accommodating at least 900 inmates was not final. The order was separable from a contempt order issued in connection with the county's violation of a population cap at the county jail, and was not sufficiently specific to be more than a step toward the selection of the remedy for constitutional violations addressed. (Allegheny County Jail, Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania)

U.S. Appeals Court
CHALLENGES
SANITATION
BEDDING

Johnson v. Pelker, 891 F.2d 136 (7th Cir. 1989). An inmate brought a civil rights action challenging the conditions of his confinement. The U.S. District Court granted a summary judgment for the defendants, and appeal was taken. The appeals court found that neither an accidental dumping of water on the inmate, nor the denial of his request for dry bedding and clothing, deprived him of constitutional rights. The court also ruled that the inmate's allegation that he had been placed in a cell for three days without running water and in which feces had been smeared on walls, while his request for cleaning supplies and for the water to be turned on were ignored, stated a cause of action for the violation of the inmate's eighth amendment rights. (Menard Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
MEDICAL CARE
PROGRAMS
SEPARATION ODOR

Langley v. Coughlin, 709 F.Supp. 482 (S.D.N.Y. 1989). Female inmates brought a class action against correctional authorities alleging violations of their eighth amendment rights arising from conditions of confinement in a "solitary" unit. Correctional authorities moved for summary judgment on the grounds of qualified immunity. The district court denied the motion for summary judgment, finding that the correctional authorities responsible for designing and implementing the inmate programs were not entitled to qualified immunity against the claims that female inmates were not provided with medical treatment and that mentally balanced inmates were housed with inmates who suffered from chronic mental illness. The Commissioner of the New York State Department of Correctional Services could be held liable in the Section 1983 suit to the extent he failed to develop and implement programs and policies regarding the treatment of mentally ill inmates or delegated that responsibility to others whom he then failed to supervise adequately. The plaintiffs in this class action are inmates at Bedford Hills Correctional Facility ("BHCF"), who were housed in Building 118 from 1981 through August 1987. In Building 118 (also known as "solitary" or "Special Housing Unit" ("SHU")), plaintiffs were locked in their cells up to 23 hours of each day, with one hour for recreation. Those plaintiffs suffering from chronic mental illness ("mentally disordered women") were allegedly kept in excessive isolation and denied adequate mental health care in violation of their rights under the eighth and fourteenth amendments of the U.S. Constitution. The mentally disordered women are identifiable by their assaultive behavior and the marked deterioration they exhibited while in confinement. Those plaintiffs not suffering from chronic mental illness ("non-mentally disordered women") maintain that the conditions of their confinement subjected them to cruel and unusual punishment, in violation of the eighth amendment. Throughout the relevant period, the plaintiffs were subjected to noxious odors, noise, and danger as the mentally disordered women engaged in acts of self-destruction, arson, and assaultive behavior. Several mentally disordered women routinely spread feces and urine throughout the unit, flooded the unit with sewerage, and yelled and screamed day and night. These occurrences were frequent, rather than merely an isolated incident. The plaintiffs allege that all of the defendants were deliberately indifferent to their mental health needs. (Bedford Hills Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
CAPACITY CHANGE OF CONDITIONS
CROWDING
PRETRIAL
DETAINEES

Palmigiano v. DiPrete, 710 F.Supp. 875 (D. R.I. 1989). Rhode Island officials failed to rid themselves of contempt by bringing a correctional facility into compliance with standing orders of the district court governing the conditions of confinement of pretrial detainees. The filing by the Governor and Director of the Rhode Island Department of Corrections of a long-range plan designed to address the growing need for additional space throughout the state correctional system was not the specific and detailed plan that the district court had ordered to take care of the overcrowding problem for the pretrial detainees. Thus, the Governor and Director were in contempt. The crux of an impossibility defense to a contempt charge is a lack of power to carry out orders of the court due to circumstances beyond one's control and means literal inability to take steps necessary to comply with a judicial order or consent decree, not simply the unwillingness to take action because contemnor perceives steps that actually can be taken as politically costly or ideologically repugnant. In light of many steps available to the Rhode Island Governor and the Director of the State Department of Corrections to take care of overcrowding at the prison intake service center, compliance with previous district court orders regarding overcrowding was within the power of the Governor and the Director, and factual impossibility was not a defense to the contempt proceedings for failure to comply with those orders. (Adult Correctional Institutions, Rhode Island)

State Appeals Court
FOOD

Sivak v. Ada County, 769 P.2d 1131 (Idaho App. 1989). A prison inmate filed a habeas petition alleging a denial of his eighth amendment rights due to conditions of confinement in the county jail. The district court upheld a judgment of the Magistrate, dismissing the inmate's petition for writ of habeas corpus, and the inmate appealed. The court of appeals, affirming the decision, found that the inmate's allegations that he had been inadequately fed during confinement in the county jail because his weight decreased by two or three pounds during a one-month period failed to allege dietary deprivation sufficiently serious to constitute cruel and unusual punishment. The eighth amendment, the court noted, "is not implicated by every inmate complaint about the conditions of confinement" nor should the courts be "super-administrators of the prison system." (Ada County Jail, Idaho)

U.S. Appeals Court
BEDDING

Thompson v. City of Los Angeles, 885 F.2d 1439 (9th Cir. 1989). An arrestee brought a civil rights action against the Board of Regents of the University of California whose police officer had arrested him for grand theft auto, and the county in whose jail the arrestee was detained. The U.S. District court dismissed the action as to the university regents and granted summary judgment for the county, and the arrestee appealed. The appeals court, affirming in part, reversing in part and remanding, found that the university was a state instrumentality for eleventh amendment purposes, so the board of regents was not a "person" subject to liability under the federal civil rights statute. Subjecting the grand theft auto arrestee at the county jail to a strip search, x-rays, and a blood test did not violate the arrestee's fourth or fourteenth amendment rights, for purposes of a civil rights action; but it would be presumed that the county maintained the "custom" of unconstitutional jail conditions in the form of a shortage of beds and could be held liable for the arrestee's injuries resulting from the alleged constitutional deprivation of failing to provide him with a bed or mattress for nights spent in the county jail, based on a prior court order regarding the same jail. (Los Angeles County Jail, California)

U.S. District Court
CHALLENGES OUT OF CELL TIME REMEDIES
CROWDING

Vazquez v. Carver, 729 F.Supp. 1063 (E.D.Pa. 1989). Pretrial detainees and inmates brought an action to challenge conditions of confinement at a county prison. The plaintiffs moved for preliminary injunction. The district court found that the detainees and inmates were entitled to preliminary injunction reducing the population from 420 to 310, which was the number of beds in the prison. The limited amount of time out of cells, the reduced living space in many areas of the prison, the limited access to bathroom facilities for many inmates, and the decreased availability of day area space indicated a substantial likelihood of succeeding on merits of claims under the eighth and fourteenth amendments. The potential for future harm from inmate violence in the overcrowded prison constituted "irreparable harm" supporting a request by the pretrial detainees and the inmates for a preliminary injunction to reduce the population allegedly violating the eighth and fourteenth amendments. (Lehigh County Prison, Pennsylvania)

1990

U.S. District Court
PROGRAMS
EXERCISE
SANITATION ODOR

Buffington v. O'Leary, 748 F.Supp. 633 (N.D.Ill. 1990). A prisoner sued a prison official under Section 1983, alleging Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment deprivation. The U.S. District Court found that the prisoner was not denied constitutional rights by being deprived of education and vocational programs available elsewhere in the prison as the constitution simply does not require prison officials to provide educational, rehabilitative, or vocational programs. The prisoner, who had been given seven hours per week exercise time outside of his cell and had not alleged physical injury from lack of physical movement did not state a cause of action against the prison official for infliction of cruel and unusual punishment. However, he stated a cause of action for constitutional deprivation by alleging that there was "rusted water" and "a scent of bad smelling pipes" in his cell, and that human waste backed up through the plumbing. While the defendant prison official contended that these conditions were no more than "an inconvenience or discomfort," the court found that it could not "with assurance determine that the conditions" in the housing unit met an "essential" or "minimum" standard of sanitation. (Stateville Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
SMOKE

Caldwell v. Quinlan, 729 F.Supp. 4 (D. D.C. 1990). An inmate brought a civil rights action against the Director of a Federal Bureau of Prisons, alleging that his frequent exposure to passive tobacco smoke violated his constitutional rights. The district court granted a motion filed by the Director to dismiss. The court stated that the director's failure to constantly segregate smokers from nonsmokers did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment and that individuals do not have a constitutional right to be free from passive tobacco smoke, so the exposure to passive smoke did not trigger protections of the due process clause or violate equal protection rights. In addition, the Bureau of Prisons' smoking policy, which provided only that the warden may implement a smoking policy at his discretion, did not create a liberty interest to a smoke-free prison term. The inmate's occasional exposure to smoke drifting over from designated "smoking" areas did not violate the eighth amendment. According to the court, the Federal Bureau of Prisons has not been indifferent to nonsmoking inmates. Federal regulations provide that "The Warden, as set forth in this rule, may establish smoking/no smoking areas with the institution. (a) Smoking is prohibited in those areas where to allow smoking would pose a hazard to health or safety. (b) Smoking/no smoking areas may be established in other areas of the institution, at the discretion of the Warden."

The court found that contemporary society "has yet to view the exposure to second-hand smoke as transgressing its 'broad and idealistic concepts of dignity, civilized standards, humanity and decency.'" The plaintiff's occasional exposure to such smoke, therefore, was not cruel and unusual punishment. (U.S. Penitentiary, Marion, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
DOUBLE CELLING

C.H. v. Sullivan, 920 F.2d 483 (8th Cir. 1990). Prisoners serving sentences under the federal witness security program brought action against the Attorney General and his agents, challenging double-celling. On cross motion for summary judgment, the U.S. District Court granted the defendants' motion, and the prisoners appealed. The court of appeals, affirming the decision, found that the court did not have jurisdiction over the prisoners' breach of contract claim. It also found that the double-celling of prisoners is not unconstitutional for a general prison population absent deprivation of food, medical care, sanitation, increased violence, or other conditions intolerable for incarceration, and the government's practice of selecting double-celled prisoners by seniority was not arbitrary and capricious and did not violate the due process rights of prisoners serving sentences under the Federal Witness Protection Program. Some procedure for choosing which prisoners would be double-celled was necessary, and the seniority system prevented discriminatory treatment and encouraged witnesses to obey prison regulations. (Federal Correctional Institute, Sandstone, Minnesota)

U.S. Appeals Court
SMOKE

Clemmons v. Bohannon, 918 F.2d 858 (10th Cir. 1990). A state prisoner brought a civil rights action alleging violations of his constitutional rights arising out of involuntary subjection to environmental tobacco smoke. Summary judgment for the defendants was granted by the U.S. District Court, and the prisoner appealed. The court of appeals found that exposing the prisoner to an unreasonable risk of a debilitating or terminal disease offends "evolving standards of decency" protected by the Eighth Amendment. According to the court, a relevant inquiry is whether long-term exposure to environmental tobacco smoke poses an unreasonable risk of harm to an inmate's health and is a relevant question in determining whether a prison policy of permitting indefinite double-celling of smokers with non-smokers against the nonsmokers' expressed will is cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth Amendment. (Kansas State Penitentiary)

U.S. Appeals Court
ODORS

Givens v. Jones, 900 F.2d 1229 (8th Cir. 1990). A former inmate filed a civil rights action against various employees and officials of a prison asserting violations of his constitutional rights. The U.S. District Court granted the defendants' motions for summary judgment on all but three of the claims, and the defendants named in the remaining three claims appealed. The court of appeals, reversing the lower court decision, found that at the time a psychiatrist prescribed a medication to which the inmate claimed to be allergic, it was not clearly established that such conduct constituted a deliberate indifference to the inmate's serious medical needs. It was also found that prison officials could reasonably have believed that the noise and fumes caused by the remodeling of the prison, which the inmate claimed gave him migraine headaches, were not so excessive as to constitute an eighth amendment violation. According to the court, a constitutional guarantee of freedom from cruel and unusual punishment does not protect against mere acts of negligence on the part of prison officials and employees. To be cruel and unusual punishment, conduct that does not purport to be punishment at all must involve more than ordinary lack of due care for the prisoner's interests or safety and it is obduracy and wantonness, not inadvertence or error in good faith, that characterize the prohibited conduct. (Missouri Training Center for Men)

U.S. District Court
SMOKE
MEDICAL CARE DISCIPLINE
CROWDING
DOUBLE CELLING

Harris v. Murray, 761 F.Supp. 409 (E.D. Va. 1990). An inmate filed an action under a federal civil rights statute, asserting numerous allegations relating to conditions of confinement. On the defendants' motion for summary judgment, the district court found that the dismissal of the inmates various claims was warranted. For example, it noted that, officials at the Virginia prison did not violate the inmate's civil rights in connection with the alleged smoke-filled condition of the visiting room. Officials had taken adequate measures to alleviate the inconvenience of occasional incidents when there were several smokers, and the inmate had not alleged any serious medical problems resulting from the room's condition. The officials did not violate the inmate's civil rights through alleged harassment of the inmate by an officer who was attempting to clear the visitation room; the officer was merely trying to organize inmates exiting that room and to make sure they did so in a timely and orderly fashion, and the inmate did not assert that he was harmed in any way physically or emotionally by the alleged harassment, and the inmate's civil rights were not violated by his detention prior to a hearing to determine the accuracy of the charge that he disobeyed a direct order to leave the visiting room in a timely manner. The prison officials were not deliberately indifferent to the inmate's need for reading glasses during the ten days he was in administrative segregation, for purposes of a civil rights claim; although an inconvenience, that deprivation did not rise to a level of cruel and unusual punishment. The inmate failed to establish deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs in connection with an allegedly excessive waiting period to see a doctor; delays of seven days on the inmate's request for a routine eye examination and approximately two weeks for treatment concerning hair loss problems were reasonable under the circumstances. The inmate's claim that he was occasionally forced to stand while eating due to insufficient seating space in the dining area did not state sufficient facts to warrant a finding of cruel and unusual punishment. Finally, the court found that the double celling of prisoners does not amount to an Eighth Amendment violation where other prison living conditions are constitutionally adequate; although a cell is designed for one inmate, double or even triple occupancy is not in itself cruel and unusual punishment. (Nottoway Correctional Center, Virginia)

U.S. District Court
FOOD
MEDICAL CARE
PRETRIAL DETAINEE
SANITATION

Hodge v. Ruperto, 739 F.Supp. 873 (S.D.N.Y. 1990). A former pretrial detainee brought a civil rights claim against police officers, commissioner and mayor alleging constitutional violation as a result of treatment before he was arraigned. The district court found that the claim that officers deprived the detainee of food and water for two and one-half days while confining him to an overcrowded unsanitary cell charged sufficiently flagrant conduct to allow reasonable inference that the conduct was attributable to municipal policy. The alleged deprivation allowed a reasonable inference of inadequate supervision which was deliberate indifference to constitutional rights. The constitutional rights of pretrial detainees were not violated by the failure of police to allow him to contact family or attorney during prearrestment detention. A pretrial detainee does not have a constitutional right to a telephone call on completion of booking formality. Prearrestment detainees are entitled to adequate food, clothing, shelter, sanitation, medical care, and safety. The allegation by the pretrial detainee that he had to sleep on a steel frame without a mattress, that sanitation facilities were so filthy he was unable to use them and that he was denied access to necessary medical care stated a claim for violation of fourteenth amendment rights. (43rd Precinct, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
CAPACITY
REMEDIES
CROWDING

Inmates of the Allegheny County Jail v. Wecht, 901 F.2d 1191 (3rd Cir. 1990). County officials appealed from an order of the U.S. District Court imposing sanctions based on officials' violation of court orders limiting the population of the county jail. The appeals court found that imposing sanctions upon county officials for failing to comply with court-ordered jail population limits was not an abuse of discretion because the order was designed to coerce the county into spending funds needed to develop and implement a plan for alternative, constitutionally adequate housing for inmates. However, a procedure employed by the district court in awarding attorneys' fees to the inmates' counsel in the jail overcrowding case was an abuse of discretion because the court did not afford the county officials an opportunity to review and contest the inmates' fee petition, and the court did not state a basis of its fee determination. "In the more than thirteen years since the inmates filed their complaint, Allegheny County has consistently failed to house its inmates in compliance with the sparse and minimal commands of the eighth amendment. Through much of this period, Allegheny County officials have also consistently violated court orders designed to remedy severe overcrowding at the jail." (Allegheny County Jail, Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania)

U.S. District Court
DOUBLE CELLING

Inmates of the Suffolk County Jail v. Kearney, 734 F.Supp. 561 (D. Mass. 1990). The county sheriff filed a motion to modify a consent decree. The district court found that the consent decree requiring the construction of a new jail with single occupancy cells would not be modified to permit double occupancy in most of the cells, despite a U.S. Supreme Court ruling upholding the practice of double-bunking, increases in the pretrial detainee population, and a possibility that the release of some pretrial detainees would result if double occupancy were not permitted. According to the court, for purposes of determining whether to modify a consent decree, the party uncertain as to whether the law would require results proposed to be included in a consent decree could have withheld the consent, and appealed the decision of the district court if it held against that party. (Suffolk County Jail, Massachusetts)

U.S. District Court
FOOD
EXERCISE
CLOTHING BEDDING ISOLATION
CRUEL AND UNUSUAL
PUNISHMENT

LeMaire v. Maass, 745 F.Supp. 623 (D. Or. 1990). An inmate brought a civil rights action, alleging unconstitutional conditions of his imprisonment in a disciplinary segregation unit. The U.S. District Court found: The use of full mechanical in-cell restraints, without control procedures to ensure that such practice was used only for safety purposes and limited to time necessary to serve that purpose, constituted cruel and unusual punishment; requiring inmates to shower in full mechanical restraints had no legitimate penological justification, and thus constituted cruel and unusual punishment; the practice of placing inmates on a controlled feeding status, during which they are fed "Nutraloaf," for reasons other than misuse of food or utensils for up to seven days at a time constituted cruel and unusual punishment; there was no legitimate penological justification for extending controlled feeding after misconduct has ceased or for conduct that could continue even with such feeding; the placement of inmates with serious medical problems in "quiet cells" from which they could not summon guards to assist them constituted cruel and unusual punishment; the policy of taking inmate's clothing, bedding and personal property as punishment for behavior not connected to misuse of clothing or property and requiring inmates to "earn back" items taken by demonstrating good behavior lacked legitimate penological justification and constituted cruel and unusual punishment; and the exercise conditions in the prison disciplinary unit constituted cruel and unusual punishment because the inmate was denied outdoor exercise for nearly five years and it was not possible for him to get sufficient exercise in his cell to prevent physical and mental deterioration. (Oregon State Penitentiary)

U.S. District Court
BEDS
OUT OF CELL TIME
PRETRIAL DETAINEES

Lyons v. Powell, 729 F.Supp. 1404 (D. N.H. 1990). A pretrial detainee, who had been at a state prison and was transferred to a federal facility, filed a civil rights lawsuit complaining that he was confined to a cell for 22-23 hours per day during a 27 day period at the federal facility, during which time he was forced to sleep on a mattress on the floor. The federal prison officials filed a motion, stating that they were entitled to qualified immunity. The court denied the motion, noting that the defendants had a duty to check on the institutions where federal pre-trial detainees were lodged and were also responsible for any omissions they made in a supervisory capacity. (New Hampshire State Prison)

U.S. Appeals Court
CELLS
CLASSIFICATION

McCord v. Maggio, 910 F.2d 1248 (5th Cir. 1990). An inmate at the state penitentiary brought a civil rights action for prison officials' alleged violation of his eighth amendment rights in connection with conditions of confinement and with his classification for imprisonment in a single cell. The U.S. District Court entered a judgment in favor of the defendants, and the inmate appealed. The appeals court, affirming in part, reversing and remanding in part, found that the civil rights claim arising from the conditions of the inmate's confinement, including his alleged placement in an unlighted, windowless cell into which water and human sewage was allegedly allowed to seep, would be remanded to a magistrate for additional findings of fact, but the inmate was not denied procedural due process by his initial and ongoing confinement in a closed cell, where a lockdown review board had considered the inmate's entire record, including the need to protect him from reprisals or harm from other inmates, in ordering assignment, and where the inmate's classification was reviewed every 90 days at a reclassification board hearing of which the inmate was given prior notice. (Louisiana State Penitentiary)

U.S. Appeals Court
FACILITIES

McDonald v. Armontrout, 908 F.2d 388 (8th Cir. 1990). An appeal was taken from an order of the U.S. District Court modifying a consent decree entered in an action concerning the conditions in the prison's capital punishment unit. The appeals court affirmed the decision, finding that the plan to move the prison's capital punishment unit to a new facility was a change in circumstance that warranted modification of the consent decree governing conditions at the old facility, and the modifications of the consent decree satisfied constitutional requirements, although access to recreational activities and telephones would be more restricted at the new facility for some inmates. The new facility could accommodate a larger classification system, entitling inmates with less restrictive classifications to more recreation time and other additional benefits. (Missouri State Penitentiary)

U.S. District Court
CONDITIONS OF CONFINEMENT
FOOD VISITATION
USE OF FORCE

Morrison v. Martin, 755 F.Supp. 683 (E.D.N.C. 1990). A state prisoner brought civil rights claims against state officials and employees, and the defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court found that it was without jurisdiction over the civil rights suit to the extent it sought recovery against state officials in their official capacity. It also found that the prisoner did not state a cognizable claim for relief under civil rights statutes by accusing correctional personnel of placing voices in his head to ask about his court case and emitting constant sound waves, as the court could take judicial notice that the impossible contentions could not be true. In addition, the vague and generalized civil rights claims by the prisoner that he had missed meals from time to time and occasionally had not had a mattress, which contained no information as to the location, date or circumstances, could not support an action based on Section 1983, and the subjection of the prisoner to verbal abuse or profanity does not rise to a level of constitutional deprivation cognizable in a civil rights action. Furthermore, the prisoner had no constitutional entitlement to contact visitation during a limited period of time while he was on administrative segregation pending custody review, particularly given the prisoner's refusal to cooperate with diagnostic and intake procedures, and the fact that denial of the contact visits was done pursuant to intake policy and thus constituted a legitimate administrative decision. The claim based on alleged removal of "various appeals materials" and a Bible from his cell for a period of 19 days while he was confined to suicide watch did not state a cognizable claim, particularly where materials were seized pursuant to established policies concerning suicide watch and the prisoner had not shown harm caused by the alleged seizure. Finally, the prisoner's allegation of excessive force was insufficient to state a Section 1983 claim against correctional officers, where the inmate's claims that prison staff subjected him to daily "stinging" and "humiliating impulses" which caused him to ejaculate and urinate on himself, were incredible. The entire picture presented in the inmate's unrealistic and delusional complaint rendered credible beyond doubt the officers' averments that any force used was needed to cope with the inmate's irrationality and that the degree of force used was not excessive. (North Carolina Department of Correction)

U.S. District Court
CROWDING
REMEDIES

Palmigiano v. DiPrete, 737 F.Supp. 1257 (D. R.I. 1990). In an ongoing litigation over the constitutionality of prison overcrowding, petitioners moved to find the defendants in continuing contempt of court and the defendants moved to modify the existing orders. The district court found that immediate relief to alleviate overcrowding was required, including the maintenance of a fund to provide indigent detainees with bail, awarding 90 days of expedited good time and awarding additional good time every 30 days until conditions were mitigated. (Adult Correctional Institutions, Rhode Island)

U.S. Appeals Court
DOUBLE CELLING
TOTALITY OF CONDITIONS
CROWDING
REMEDIES

Tillery v. Owens, 907 F.2d 418 (3rd Cir. 1990). An inmate brought an action challenging conditions of confinement at the state correctional institution. The U.S. District Court granted relief and the state and prison officials appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the evidence supported a determination that double-celling violates the eighth amendment in view of other conditions to which inmates were subjected, and an order banning the double-celling was within the district court's discretion given its determination that the institution was overcrowded, that the lighting, ventilation, plumbing, showers, and fire safety provisions fell below constitutional norms, that violence and insecurity were pervasive, that medical and mental health care were constitutionally deficient, that inmates had limited opportunities for recreation outside their cells, that inmates were double-celled for long periods of time, and that inadequate screening before double-celling of inmates resulted in "fatal pairings". It was not necessary that there be a showing that double-celling itself caused increased violence, disease, and other negative conditions. The totality of conditions within the institution must be considered in determining whether conditions of confinement violate the eighth amendment. The constitutionality of double-celling had to be analyzed in context of the district court's determination, well supported by record, that almost every element of physical plant and provision of services at the institution fell below constitutional norms. The district court order requiring state and local authorities to cease double-celling inmates in cell blocks by a specified date, to remedy the eighth amendment violation, was within its discretion, and did not impermissibly invade the state's prerogative in view of the option available of hiring more guards so that empty tiers at the institution could be used, as an alternative to transferring inmates to other institutions. (State Correctional Institution, Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania)

U.S. District Court
CLOTHING
FOOD
MEDICAL CARE POPULATION STAFFING
TRANSFERS
TOTALITY OF CONDITIONS
CAPACITY

Tyler v. U.S., 737 F.Supp. 531 (E.D. Mo. 1990). The district court entered an interim order amending a previous order and permitting an increase in the ceiling cap from 450 to 481 of inmates in the St. Louis City medium security institution workhouse, provided that the number of guards and other essential staff was increased by 10% within 30 days, the quantity or quality of food was not decreased, clothing allowances or the availability of medical and dental treatment was not reduced, all inmates found guilty and sentenced were transferred to the designated penal institution not more than ten days after the imposition of a sentence, and educational facilities were broadened and expanded. Officials of the institution were required to submit plans concerning the implementation of house arrests for detainees, a plan for the expeditious transfer of women inmates to another site, and a plan for the establishment of a drug treatment center. (St. Louis City Medium Security Institution Workhouse, Missouri)

U.S. District Court
CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENT
SMOKE

West v. Wright, 747 F.Supp. 329 (E.D. Va. 1990). An inmate brought a pro se civil rights complaint alleging that his exposure to other prisoners' cigarette smoke constituted cruel and unusual punishment, and prison officials moved for summary judgment. The U.S. District Court found that the prisoner, who did not suffer from any preexisting medical condition that was aggravated by tobacco smoke, was not subjected to cruel and unusual punishment as a result of being exposed to other prisoners' cigarette smoke in light of existing safeguards implemented by prison officials to protect nonsmokers from environmental tobacco smoke. Each cell had a window which the inmate may open or close as he chooses. Each cell and day room also had output and input vents that provided continuous circulation of natural air for adequate ventilation. The inmates assigned to the general population may also have personal fans in their cells and pedestal fans are located in each of the housing units and are operated by the inmates. It is also noted that smoking is prohibited in the library, dining hall, gymnasium and medical department, and inmates in the general population are afforded recreational opportunities and are confined in their housing units only during count and after lockdown in the evening. (Brunswick Correctional Center, Virginia)

1991

U.S. Appeals Court
DEFENSES
STATE REQUIREMENTS
OVERCROWDING
CONDITIONS

Alberti v. Sheriff of Harris County, Tex., 937 F.2d 984 (5th Cir. 1991), cert. den., 112 S.Ct. 1994. Appeal was taken from remedial orders of the U.S. District Court entered in an action challenging conditions in a county jail system. The court of appeals, remanding the decision, found that the state could be held liable for conditions in the county's jail system based on its failure to accept the transfer of convicted felons housed in the county jail but sentenced to the state prison system, or to reimburse the county for the cost of their housing, in view of Texas statutes making the state responsible for the confinement of convicted felons. Remand was required in the jail overcrowding case to determine whether the conditions at the county jails were caused by the county's deliberate indifference to the prisoners' needs, in violation of the Eighth Amendment. Although evidence indicated that overcrowding was caused by the state's refusal to accept felons incarcerated in jail but sentenced to the state prison system, evidence also indicated problems with the jails' plumbing, ventilation, fire, safety, supplies, food service, and medical care. (Harris County Sheriff Department, Texas)

U.S. District Court
SMOKE

Harris v. Murray, 758 F.Supp. 1114 (E.D. Va. 1991). A prisoner brought a Section 1983 claim challenging conditions of confinement. The U.S. District Court found that the presence of cigarette smoke in the visitation room during visiting hours did not amount to cruel and unusual punishment. The court found that prison officials had taken adequate measures to alleviate the inconvenience of occasional incidents when the visiting room had several smokers, including a ventilation system. (Nottoway Correctional Center, Virginia)

U.S. Appeals Court
HEATING
CHALLENGES
FACILITIES

Henderson v. DeRobertis, 940 F.2d 1055 (7th Cir. 1991), cert. den., 112 S.Ct. 1578. Inmates brought an action against prison officials alleging that their constitutional rights were violated when they were subjected to freezing temperatures. Following a jury trial, the U.S. District Court entered judgment in favor of officials notwithstanding the jury verdict in favor of the inmates, on the basis of qualified immunity. Thereafter, two other inmates filed Section 1983 complaints based upon the same factual circumstances and sought to certify as a class the prisoners confined during a four-day period when adequate heat was not provided. The U.S. District Court dismissed the cases with prejudice, and on consolidated appeal, the court of appeals found that even though the inmates were subjected during a period of abnormally cold weather due to a malfunctioning heating system, the inmates had a clearly established constitutional right, established in 1982, to have adequate heat and shelter, and the prison officials were not entitled to qualified immunity. (Stateville Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
SAFETY
THREATS

Hobbs v. Evans, 924 F.2d 774 (8th Cir. 1991). An inmate brought a civil rights action against prison officials, asserting an Eighth Amendment right to be free from violent attacks by fellow inmates. The U.S. District Court entered judgment against two officials, and they appealed. The court of appeals found that the prison officials did not act in reckless disregard of the inmate's right to be free from inmate attacks absent a showing that the inmate was faced with a pervasive risk of harm at the institution and that the officials failed to respond reasonably to that risk. The finding that a prison guard acted in reckless disregard of the inmate's right to be free from assault by other inmates was sufficiently supported by evidence that the inmate suffered three assaults after the guard labeled him as an informant. (Maximum Security Correctional Facility, Tucker, Arkansas)

U.S. Appeals Court
OUT OF CELL TIME

Johnson v. Moore, 926 F.2d 921 (9th Cir. 1991). An inmate brought a civil rights action against the superintendent of a state correctional facility. The U.S. District Court entered summary judgment against the inmate, and he appealed. The court of appeals found that the inmate did not have a due process right to a hearing before he was placed in "cell lockdown" inasmuch as the lockdown was not punishment but was pursuant to prison policy mandating that all inmates not working or attending classes be confined to their cells during the day. (Clallam Bay Corrections Center, Washington)

U.S. Appeals Court
OUT OF CELL TIME

Johnson v. Moore, 948 F.2d 517 (9th Cir. 1991). An inmate brought an action against the superintendent of a facility, the challenging constitutionality of prison conditions and policies. The U.S. District Court entered summary judgment in favor of the superintendent, and the inmate appealed. The court of appeals found that confinement to a cell pursuant to a policy that all inmates not working or attending classes be confined to their cells during the day did not violate, in and of itself, any recognized liberty interests of the inmate. It was also found that the inmate's challenge to prison policies was rendered moot by his transfer to another facility, absent any reasonable expectation of returning to the first facility. (Clallam Bay Corrections Center, Washington)

U.S. Appeals Court
CONDITION OF CONFINEMENT
CRUEL AND UNUSUAL
PUNISHMENT

McCord v. Maggio, 927 F.2d 844 (5th Cir. 1991). A state prisoner brought a suit against a warden for alleged violation of Eighth Amendment rights arising from prison conditions. The U.S. District Court entered judgment in favor of the warden. The court of appeals, affirmed in part and reversed and remanded in part. On remand, relief was again denied, and the prisoner appealed. The court of appeals found that the prisoner's Eighth Amendment rights were violated by his repeatedly having to sleep and live in sewage and foul water, and remand was necessary for consideration of whether an "extraordinary circumstances" defense applied and whether causation and significant injury were shown. (Louisiana State Penitentiary)

U.S. Appeals Court
CROWDING

Moore v. Morgan, 922 F.2d 1553 (11th Cir. 1991). A county jail inmate brought a civil rights action against a county sheriff and county commissioners, challenging jail conditions. After determining that the inmate proved conditions at the county jail violated the Eighth Amendment due to overcrowding and lack of out-of-cell time, the magistrate judge concluded that the sheriff and county commissioners were entitled to qualified immunity. The U.S. District Court adopted the magistrate judge's recommendation and directed judgment against the inmate, who appealed. The court of appeals found that the defense of qualified immunity was not available with respect to official capacity claims. In addition, the county failed to satisfy its constitutional responsibility in maintaining the county jail by its delay in rectifying jail overcrowding, and it was liable for compensatory damages, despite voters' overwhelming rejection of a proposal to levy a tax to build a new jail. According to the court, the ways in which the commissioners actually obtained money to finance necessary jail improvements, when put under the threat of litigation, provided compelling evidence of fact that the commissioners could have taken steps to improve the jail at a much earlier date. (Chambers County Jail, Alabama)

U.S. Appeals Court
TOILETS
VISITATION

Patchette v. Nix, 952 F.2d 158 (8th Cir. 1991). Prisoners brought an action contending that they had liberty interest in existing visitation regulations and that changing those regulations and overcrowded prison conditions violated their constitutional rights. The U.S. District Court found that the change in visitation regulations violated due process but that there was no Eighth Amendment violation, and appeal was taken. The court of appeals found that the prisoners had a liberty interest in weekend visitation which could not be abridged without affording due process. The court also found that the temporary inconveniences caused to the inmates as a result of 50% deficiency in toilet facilities did not violate the Eighth Amendment where a corrective action of moving prisoners to a new facility was expected in a matter of months. (Iowa State Penitentiary Farm I)

U.S. Appeals Court
CLOTHING
BEDDING
TOTALITY OF CONDITIONS

Porth v. Farrier, 934 F.2d 154 (8th Cir. 1991). A reformatory inmate filed a civil rights action alleging a violation of his Eighth Amendment rights. The U.S. District Court entered judgment for the prison officials and the inmate appealed. The court of appeals found that confinement of the inmate in a strip cell without clothes, bedding, or a mattress for approximately 12 hours was not so inhumane, base or barbaric as to shock one's sensibilities even though the prison officials acted improperly. While clothing and bedding are basic necessities, the court stated, confinement without them can only be determined to be cruel and unusual punishment on the basis of the totality of the circumstances. Prison conditions which only result in discomfort do not amount to cruel and unusual punishment. (Iowa State Men's Reformatory)

U.S. District Court
CONDITIONS
SANITATION

Thomas v. Jabe, 760 F.Supp. 120 (E.D. Mich. 1991). An inmate brought a civil rights action against prison officials. The officials moved for summary judgment. The district court found that genuine issue of material fact existed as to whether the inmate's Eighth Amendment rights were violated when he was forced to stay in a cell that was flooded with water and human waste. The defendants knew about a water leak and subsequent flooding well in advance of the inmate's placement in the quiet cell, and it should have been obvious it was unsuitable for occupation. (State Prison of Southern Michigan in Jackson)

U.S. Supreme Court
CONDITIONS
CRUEL AND UNUSUAL
PUNISHMENT

Wilson v. Seiter, 111 S.Ct. 2321 (1991). Prisoners brought an action against prison officials alleging cruel and unusual punishment. The U.S. District Court granted the officials' motion for summary judgment and the prisoners appealed. The court of appeals affirmed, and certiorari was granted. The U.S. Supreme Court, vacating and remanding, found that the prisoners claiming that conditions of confinement constituted cruel unusual punishment, were required to show deliberate indifference on the part of the prison officials, noting that "nothing so amorphous as 'overall prison conditions' can rise to the level of cruel and unusual punishment when no specific deprivation of a single human need exists." (Hocking Correctional Facility, Ohio)

1992

U.S. District Court
DOUBLE CELLING
CONDITIONS OF CONFINEMENT

Baker v. Holden, 787 F.Supp. 1008 (D. Utah 1992). Prison officials sought to vacate a preliminary injunction prohibiting double celling. The district court found that double celling would not manifest deliberate indifference to inmate's needs in certain cell blocks, but double bunking in a cell block would be unconstitutional where conditions of confinement, which included small cell size with no windows, no adjacent common area and inadequate fire escape and congestion caused by cell release levers, would produce the effective deprivation of the basic human needs of shelter and adequate living space. (Wasatch Unit, Utah State Prison)

U.S. District Court
CONDITIONS

Cameron v. Tomes, 783 F.Supp. 1511 (D. Mass. 1992). An involuntarily committed patient brought an action against the Commissioner of the Department of Mental Health and the administrator of a treatment center for the sexually dangerous, alleging that the defendants had violated his constitutional rights by failing to provide him with minimally adequate treatment. The district court found that rigid application of some of the center's rules and policies to the patient was an unconstitutional failure to exercise professional judgment. According to the court, decisions about the treatment of an involuntarily committed patient cannot be constitutionally sufficient if in making them there is deliberate indifference to the patient's mental health needs. Applying a policy requiring patients to reach a destination within 10 minutes to an involuntarily committed patient with only one leg without any consideration for his disability failed to exercise professional judgment. (Massachusetts Treatment Center for the Sexually Dangerous)

U.S. District Court
HEARING IMPAIRED

Clarkson v. Coughlin, 783 F.Supp. 789 (S.D.N.Y. 1992). A deaf inmate filed a civil rights action against a prison, and other hearing impaired inmates sought to intervene. Prison officials filed motions to dismiss and to transfer. The inmate's action against prison officials for failure to accommodate her hearing impairment was rendered moot by the inmate's release on parole but it did not require a dismissal of the class action; other hearing impaired inmates had sought to intervene, indicating a strong likelihood that some other named plaintiff existed who would be able to represent the putative class adequately. A female inmate who was ineligible for enrollment in a unit created to provide resources for hearing impaired inmates at the male prison would be permitted to intervene in the class action, even though her hearing loss was not as severe as the named plaintiff's deafness; the hearing impaired inmate was incarcerated at a facility that provided no services for hearing impaired inmates and she had faced the possibility of disciplinary charges for failure to comply with instructions that she could not hear. (NY State Dept. of Corr. Services)

U.S. Appeals Court
SMOKE
CRUEL AND UNUSUAL
PUNISHMENT

Clemmons v. Bohannon, 956 F.2d 1523 (10th Cir. 1992). A prison inmate brought a civil rights action alleging violations of the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments arising out of involuntary subjection to environmental tobacco smoke. The U.S. District Court granted prison officials summary judgment, and the inmate appealed. The court of appeals found that the inmate sometimes being forced to share a cell with a smoker, and being exposed to smoke from other inmates and guards, did not constitute an Eighth Amendment violation; respiratory and eye irritation were not sufficiently serious, and the inmate did not offer any evidence of effects pertaining to his personal health. (Kansas State Penitentiary)

U.S. Appeals Court
SAFETY

Gibson v. Foltz, 963 F.2d 851 (6th Cir. 1992). The widow of an inmate who was killed when he was stabbed by a fellow inmate sued prison officials and a corrections officer under Section 1983. The U.S. District Court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment. The appeals court found that the widow failed to show that the assault was a result of deliberate indifference by the defendants. The corrections officer's failure to be at the area of the prison in which the inmate was fatally assaulted with a weapon, and the officer's alleged failure to conduct required searches of cells and inmates, did not rise to a level of "deliberate indifference," and thus, did not violate the Eighth Amendment. There was no evidence that they knew that the victim was in danger or that any specific dangerous condition existed in the cell block in which the assault occurred. (State Prison of Southern Michigan)

U.S. Appeals Court
CLOTHING

Gordon v. Faber, 973 F.2d 686 (8th Cir. 1992). Inmates at a state prison brought a Section 1983 action against a security officer. The U.S. District Court assessed damages of $75 per inmate and ordered the officer to pay costs. The officer appealed and the court of appeals affirmed the decision, finding that the Eighth Amendment rights of the prisoners were violated by their being left outside without proper protection in freezing temperatures for periods varying from one hour to one hour and forty-five minutes, while their living facilities were searched for a weapon alleged to be hidden there. (Iowa Men's Reformatory, Anamosa, Iowa)

U.S. District Court
SMOKE

Guilmet v. Knight, 792 F.Supp. 93 (E.D. Wash. 1992). A prison inmate brought a suit alleging that his Eighth Amendment rights were violated where he was housed with a cellmate who smoked. Upon the defendant's motion for summary judgment, the district court found that the prisoner was not subjected to cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth Amendment when he was housed for fifteen days with a cellmate who smoked. The intermittent exposure to environmental tobacco smoke during the course of those fifteen days did not pose an unreasonable risk to the prisoner's health and did not deny him the minimal civilized measure of life's necessities. In addition, the conduct of the correctional unit supervisor, who moved the inmate within ten days of his complaint, did not reflect a culpable state of mind. The court noted that the comparatively short delay that occurred was justified by the need to find an inmate with whom the plaintiff would be compatible. Since consideration of the inmate's compatibility is necessary to preserve prison security, the delay in moving the plaintiff was not unreasonable. (Washington State Penitentiary)

U.S. Appeals Court
EXERCISE
SHOWERS

Henderson v. Lane, 979 F.2d 466 (7th Cir. 1992). An allegedly fractious inmate who had been placed in a state's "circuit rider" security program brought a Section 1983 action for prison officials' alleged violation of his civil rights. The U.S. District Court denied the inmate's request for preliminary injunctive relief and the defendants' motion for partial summary judgment on a qualified immunity claim, and both parties appealed. The appeals court found that the inmate had "adequate remedy at law" for the alleged restriction on his right of access to courts, and was not entitled to preliminary injunctive relief, as claims could be pursued in the pending Section 1983 action. The prison officials were entitled to qualified immunity for their alleged wrongful denial of the inmate's civil rights in placing him in the "circuit rider" security program that allegedly prevented him from having more than one shower or more than one hour of exercise per week, as the inmate's alleged right to additional showers and exercise was not "clearly established" at the time of the alleged violations. (Illinois Correctional System)

U.S. Appeals Court
SMOKE

Hunt v. Reynolds, 974 F.2d 734 (6th Cir. 1992), cert. denied, 114 S.Ct. 709. State prison inmates brought a Section 1983 action against prison officials, claiming deprivation of their Eighth Amendment rights by virtue of their being compelled to share cells with smokers. The U.S. District Court entered judgment for the defendants, and the inmates appealed. The court of appeals, reversing and remanding, found that a genuine issue existed as to whether prisoners had serious medical needs for a smoke-free environment. The court noted that prisoners allergic to the components of tobacco smoke, or who can attribute their serious medical conditions to smoke, are entitled to appropriate medical treatment, which may include removal from places where smoke hovers. (Tennessee Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
CRUEL AND UNUSUAL
PUNISHMENT

Jackson v. Duckworth, 955 F.2d 21 (7th Cir. 1992). An inmate brought a Section 1983 action against prison officials alleging that subhuman conditions at prison violated the Eighth Amendment's prohibition against infliction of cruel and unusual punishments. The U.S. District Court granted summary judgment for the prison officials, and the inmate appealed. The court of appeals found that genuine issues of material fact as to the ghastliness of the inmate's prison conditions and state of mind of the prison officials precluded summary judgment against the inmate in the action. The inmate's affidavit stated that he was forced to live with filth, rodents, inadequate heating, no toilet paper, and drinking water containing small black worms which turned into small black flies, and that officials visited his unit routinely, and observed the conditions described, but failed to take adequate corrective measures. (Indiana Prison System)

U.S. District Court
DOUBLE CELLING

Jensen v. Gunter, 807 F.Supp. 1463 (D.Neb. 1992). Nebraska inmates brought class actions under a federal civil rights statute, alleging that the practice of double celling violated the Eighth Amendment, and that the penitentiary's policy relating to the inmate liability for contraband in a double cell violated the Fourteenth Amendment's due process clause. The district court adopted a report and recommendation of a U.S. Magistrate Judge, concluding that the rule providing a presumption that each inmate in a living unit has knowledge of the presence of contraband found in the living unit, and that each inmate charged with discovery of such contraband shall have the burden of coming forward with evidence to rebut the presumption, was not pre se unconstitutional. Each inmate had available state court remedies and federal court actions in which to challenge the sufficiency of evidence. In addition, evidence was insufficient to show that double celling taxed the penitentiary beyond its limits to provide essential human services, resources, and adequate physical structures to house inmates in violation of the Eighth Amendment. However, the random placement of new inmates in double cells under volatile conditions that existed in the penitentiary's main housing units was not a reasonable response to the persuasive risk of harm to those inmates, and therefore such placement violated the Eighth Amendment. Information gathered and compiled during the initial intake of inmates into state prisons was not considered in placement of new inmates into double cells, and such information could be of valuable assistance in predicting compatibility of cellmates. (Nebraska State Penitentiary)

U.S. Appeals Court
SMOKE

McKinney v. Anderson, 959 F.2d 853 (9th Cir. 1992), affirmed, 113 S.Ct. 2475. An inmate brought a civil rights action against prison officials alleging a violation of the Eighth Amendment due to his exposure to environmental tobacco smoke. The U.S. District Court directed verdict for prison officials, and the inmate appealed. The court of appeals affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded, and certiorari was granted. The U.S. Supreme Court vacated and remanded. Thereafter, the court of appeals found that housing a prisoner in an environment that exposed him to levels of environmental tobacco smoke that posed an unreasonable risk of harming his health satisfied the objective component of the Eighth Amendment claim of cruel and unusual punishment; however, the inmate would have to establish a subjective component of the claim on remand by showing that prison officials showed deliberate indifference to the inmate's long-term exposure to environmental tobacco smoke. (Nevada State Prison, Carson City)

U.S. District Court
SECURITY

Miller v. Campbell, 804 F.Supp. 159 (D. Kan. 1992). An inmate brought an action alleging cruel and unusual punishment during a lockdown. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion, finding that the medical care of the inmate was not cruel and unusual punishment, where there was a mere difference of opinion regarding the nature of care offered. In addition, the brief lockdown, the shutdown of water and electricity, and the suspension of telephone access was related to legitimate correctional goals in response to inmates' throwing water-soaked trash into the walkway and was not cruel and unusual punishment. The water was turned off to prevent flooding and was turned on at intervals to allow the use of toilets and sinks. The electricity was shutdown after inmates damaged light fixtures, and nothing indicated officials' deliberate indifference to dangerous conditions of confinement. The court noted that these deprivations were brief and were reasonably related to legitimate correctional goals. (Leavenworth County Jail, Kansas)

U.S. District Court LOCKDOWN

Stewart v. McGinnis, 800 F.Supp. 604 (N.D.Ill. 1992), affirmed, 5 F.3d 1031. A state inmate brought a civil rights action against various state and prison officials in both their individual and official capacities alleging that he suffered several constitutional violations during his incarceration at a state facility. On cross motions for summary judgment, the district court found that the inmate was transferred out of the correctional facility, and was under no threat of repeated injury. He therefore lacked standing to bring claims for declaratory and injunctive relief under Section 1983. The imposition of lockdowns without notice or a hearing did not violate the inmate's procedural due process rights; the inmate had no constitutionally based liberty interest in nonlockdown conditions that entitled him to due process protection before a lockdown was imposed. (Stateville Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENT STATE REQUIREMENTS
MEDICAL CARE

Swoboda v. Dubach, 788 F.Supp. 519 (D. Kan. 1992), modified, 992 F.2d 286. An inmate brought a pro se action against the county board of commissioners, the sheriff, and others involved in operating the county jail, seeking damages, declaratory judgment, and injunctive relief arising out of conditions of the inmate's confinement in jail as a pretrial detainee and after conviction. The defendants moved for dismissal. The district court found that the inmate, having made no claim that he had needed and been denied medical care, was not entitled to maintain an action based on a claim that medical care had been withheld from inmates in drug withdrawal. In addition, although a jail inspection report indicated that the county jail was unsatisfactory in several categories, the report did not establish that conditions at the county jail were so deficient or severe during the inmate's confinement as to constitute cruel and unusual punishment or to constitute punishment during the inmate's pretrial confinement. The appeals court affirmed the decision regarding conditions, but remanded the case for further hearing regarding a claim of excessive force. (Doniphan County Jail, Kansas)

U.S. District Court
PLUMBING
SANITATION

Warren v. Stempson, 800 F.Supp. 991 (D.D.C. 1992), affirmed, 995 F.2d 306. An inmate brought a Section 1983 action regarding his treatment and prison conditions. The inmate claimed that the adjustment segregation cell block into which he had been placed was plagued with rats, mice, roaches, spiders, flying bugs, insects, birds and lice, and that the shower water was usually cold. The court did not condone such conditions and believed that, if they exist, they were substandard, the court did not believe they rose to a level of cruel and unusual punishment under the Eighth Amendment. (District of Columbia)

U.S. District Court
CELLS
SANITATION

White v. Nix, 805 F.Supp. 721 (S.D. Iowa 1992), affirmed, 7 F.3d 120. An inmate brought a civil rights suit against prison officials arising out of his confinement in a "screened" prison cell. The district court found that the placement of the state inmate in the cell did not violate his Eighth Amendment right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment. The cell was in a cellhouse that housed inmates pending investigations for disciplinary infractions. The cell had a toilet, sink, a single bed and a table. A screened wire mesh covers the bars of the cell. The court ruled that any uncleanliness in the interior of the cell could have been corrected by the inmate's request for cleaning supplies. In addition, the inmate was only confined to the screened cell on a temporary basis for eleven days. The court also found that the inmate failed to show that his placement in the screened prison cell was for other than reasons of institutional security and safety following his assaultive behavior. The inmate failed to prove that his placement was retaliatory, because of his earlier lawsuits. The inmate also failed to show a violation of his due process rights arising from the officials' 48-hour delay in transferring him from the screened cell after he exhausted his administrative appeals in a disciplinary matter where the defendant did not have a liberty interest in the immediate transfer by reason of an informal prison rule that inmates in summary segregation were not to be transferred until they exhausted their administrative appeals. (Iowa State Penitentiary)

U.S. District Court
HYGIENE

Williams v. ICC Committee, 812 F.Supp. 1029 (N.D.Cal. 1992). An inmate filed a pro se Section 1983 action against prison officials alleging that he had been deprived of his eyeglasses although he was legally blind, deprived of access to courts, denied an opportunity to make legal phone calls, and was discriminated against based upon his race. He also sought appointment of counsel pursuant to the in forma pauperis statute. The court found that allegations of the prison officials' deliberate denial of toilet paper and soap for an extended period were more significant than a de minimis intrusion and constituted denial of minimal civilized measures of life's necessities so as to state a claim under Section 1983 for violation of the Eighth Amendment. (San Quentin Prison, California)

U.S. Appeals Court
FOOD
OUT OF CELL TIME
PROGRAMS
SANITATION

Wishon v. Gammon, 978 F.2d 446 (8th Cir. 1992). An inmate brought an action under Section 1983 alleging Eighth Amendment violations and denial of equal protection. The U.S. District Court entered an order granting the prison officials' motion for summary judgment, and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed the decision. The court found that the out-of-cell time of forty-five minutes per week did not violate the Eighth Amendment rights of the inmate who was assigned to a protective custody unit for his own safety. The restriction did not cause the inmate to suffer any injury or decline in health, he had not used all recreation time available to him, and he had an opportunity to exercise within the cell. The inmate failed to establish that the infestation of his cell with insects and other vermin and the improper cleaning of his cell or the fact that he was allegedly routinely served cold food that was often contaminated with foreign objects violated his Eighth Amendment rights. There was evidence that the cells were sprayed for pests every month and would be sprayed more frequently on request by a prisoner, and that the inmate never used the opportunity provided to clean the cell himself. There was also no evidence that the food served was nutritionally inadequate or prepared in a manner presenting an immediate danger to the inmate's health, or that his health suffered because of the food. The court found that the inmate failed to establish an equal protection violation arising from the denial of access to education and vocational opportunities. The inmate, who was required to be on lock-down status during most of each day for safety and security, did not show that he was treated differently from other inmates who were similarly situated in the general population. The inmate had access to self-study materials, college correspondence courses, and library materials. (Moberly Training Center for Men, Missouri)

U.S. District Court OVERCROWDING
PRETRIAL
DETAINEES

Young v. Keohane, 809 F.Supp. 1185 (M.D. Pa. 1992). A pretrial detainee brought a Bivens civil rights action alleging that prison officials violated the detainee's constitutional rights. Cross motions for summary judgment were made. The district court found that the prison officials were not entitled to qualified immunity on claims that overcrowding violated the detainee's due process rights. The detainee was confined to one room with up to eleven other people between twenty-two and twenty-four hours per day without a wash basin, toilet, table or chairs, or drinking fountain under more restrictive conditions than those placed upon convicted prisoners. (United States Penitentiary, Lewisburg, Pennsylvania)

1993

U.S. District Court
FLOOR, SLEEPING
BEDS

Allen v. City and County of Honolulu, 816 F.Supp. 1501 (D. Hawaii 1993). An inmate brought a Section 1983 action against prison and government officials alleging violation of his constitutional rights. The officials moved for summary judgment claiming qualified immunity. The district court found that the intimidation of the state inmate by another inmate where the intimidation did not result in any actual injury but only in the inmate giving the other inmate his pork and beef from his meals and being forced to sleep on a mattress on the floor of his cell was not a violation of a clearly established constitutional right. Therefore, the state officials were entitled to qualified immunity from liability in the Section 1983 action with respect to the intimidation claims. The court noted that requiring an inmate to sleep on the floor, by itself, is not a constitutional violation. In Hawaii, there is no constitutional difference between sleeping on a mattress placed on a concrete slab and sleeping on a mattress placed on a concrete floor. (Halawa Correctional Facility, Hawaii)

U.S. District Court
DOUBLE CELLING

Barajas v. Waters, 815 F.Supp. 222 (E.D. Mich. 1993). Inmates brought a Section 1983 action against prison officials asserting claims relating to conditions of confinement and court access. The officials filed a motion to dismiss or for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The court found that the inmates failed to show that double celling violated the Eighth Amendment. Under the objective component of the Eighth Amendment conditions of confinement claim, the inmates had to claim that conditions deprived them of minimal civilized measures of life's necessities; however, because routine discomfort is part of the penalty that criminal offenders pay for their offenses against society and because prisoners are not constitutionally guaranteed comfortable prisons, a conditions of confinement claim must be based on extreme deprivations. (Cotton Regional Correctional Facility, Jackson, Michigan)

U.S. Appeals Court
CROWDING

Best v. Essex County, N.J. Hall of Records, 986 F.2d 54 (3rd Cir. 1993). A pretrial detainee sued a county, county executive and others under a civil rights statute after he was assaulted by another detainee in a jail day room. Summary judgment for the defendants was granted by the U.S. District Court and the plaintiff appealed. The court of appeals, affirming the decision, found that although the jail was overcrowded and the county was under direct court order to update the facility to alleviate overcrowding, the county and county executive were not liable under the civil rights statute for assault on the detainee when another detainee poured hot water from a coffee urn over him during an altercation in the day room. Any possible connection between the conditions at the jail and the assault was too attenuated to allow recovery, as there was no demonstration of a connection between overcrowding and the assault or even allegations, absent the overcrowding, that the plaintiff would not have been with the assailant in the day room. (Essex County Jail Annex, New Jersey)

U.S. District Court HANDICAPPED INMATES
HEARING IMPAIRED

Casey v. Lewis, 834 F.Supp. 1569 (D.Ariz. 1993). Disabled inmates brought an action against prison officials alleging that conditions in a prison system violated their Eighth Amendment rights and the Rehabilitation Act. The district court found that lack of accessible bathrooms, showers, and cells for inmates who were confined to wheelchairs, had artificial limbs, or were partially paralyzed violated the Eighth Amendment. However, disabled inmates did not establish that instances in which they did not receive special equipment or consideration rose to a level of constitutional violations. The inmates ultimately received equipment, there was no evidence that the equipment could have been obtained more quickly, and, to the extent that there was a delay, prison officials implemented new policies to remedy the situation. The court also found that the consistent pattern of delays in inmates' receipt of hearing aids when tests established hearing losses violated the Eighth Amendment, even though inmates did not establish any harm that resulted from the delays. A blind inmate, however, did not establish that prison officials' treatment of him violated the Eighth Amendment, even though officials did not place him in a specific rehabilitation program and notwithstanding his allegations that he could not clean his cell properly and that he was unable to inspect his food for foreign objects. The officials had the inmate evaluated on numerous occasions and recommended services, provided him with numerous talking books, catalogs of equipment from which he could order, and assistance in learning braille, and made every effort to assure that other inmates and guards could not tamper with his food. Prison officials did not deny the blind inmate access to courts by refusing to provide braille legal books which the inmate requested. The officials offered, on several occasions, a legal assistant to read materials to him, but the inmate declined those offers. Finally, it was found that the mobility impaired, hearing impaired, and blind inmates failed to establish a violation of the Rehabilitation Act by prison officials, even though the mobility impaired and blind inmates were "handicapped" within the meaning of the Act and prison programs received federal funds. Other than one occasion on which one mobility impaired inmate was unable to participate in sick call, the inmates did not identify particular programs from which they were excluded due to their handicaps. (Arizona Department of Corrections)

U.S. Supreme Court
SMOKE

Helling v. McKinney, 113 S.Ct. 2475 (1993). A prisoner brought a civil rights action against prison officials alleging violation of his Eighth Amendment rights due to his exposure to environmental tobacco smoke (ETS). The district court entered a directed verdict for the prison officials and the inmate appealed. Appeals courts modified the lower court decision, and the case was presented to the U.S. Supreme Court. The Supreme Court ruled that the inmate's Eighth Amendment claim could be based upon possible future harm to his health, as well as present harm, arising out of exposure to ETS. The Court found that the prisoner had stated a cause of action for violation of his Eighth Amendment rights, alleging that prison officials had, with deliberate indifference, exposed him to levels of environmental tobacco smoke that posed an unreasonable risk of serious damage. The court ordered the lower court, on remand, to consider the circumstances of the inmate's new prison location (where he was not longer exposed to a cellmate who smoked five packs of cigarettes a day), including non-smoking policies of this new location. The Court also ordered the lower court to consider the subjective element, deliberate indifference, in light of the officials' current attitudes and conduct, which may have changed materially because of the transfer of the inmate to a facility that has a smoking policy. (Nevada Department of Prisons)

U.S. Appeals Court
CLOTHING
DISCIPLINE
EXERCISE
FOOD
SHOWERS

LeMaire v. Maass, 12 F.3d 1444 (9th Cir. 1993). An inmate brought a civil rights action alleging unconstitutional conditions of his imprisonment in a disciplinary segregation unit. The U.S. District Court granted injunctive relief, and the prison superintendent appealed. The appeals court, vacating and remanding, found that "wantonness" in the infliction of deprivations on the inmate, which had to be established in order to prove cruel and unusual punishment, consisted of acting maliciously and sadistically for the very purpose of causing harm, rather than merely acting with deliberate indifference. In addition, none of the challenged practices, including controlled feeding status, use of restraints in showers, curtailment of outside exercise privileges, use of quiet cells, use of in-cell restraints, and removal of clothing, were unnecessary or imposed on the inmate maliciously or sadistically for the purpose of causing harm. (Oregon State Prison)

U.S. District Court
HOT WATER
SEGREGATION

Matthews v. Peters, 818 F.Supp. 224 (N.D.Ill. 1993). A prison inmate brought an action against employees of the Department of Corrections charging that defendants violated his constitutional rights by depriving him of hot water in his cell for a period of seven months while segregated. On the defendants' motion for judgment on pleadings, the district court found that the prison officials would not be relieved on qualified immunity grounds from having to defend the inmate's lawsuit in view of a showing of deliberate indifference by prison officials in the refusal to cure readily remediable conditions. (Stateville Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
HARASSMENT
THREATS

McDowell v. Jones, 990 F.2d 433 (8th Cir. 1993). An inmate brought an action under Section 1983 and Section 1985(3), alleging that prison officials violated his rights during his incarceration. The U.S. District Court granted the officials' motions to dismiss and for summary judgment, and the inmate appealed. The court of appeals, affirming the decision, found that the inmate's allegations that prison staff harassed him generally and harassed him to dissuade him from filing a grievance about his seized property did not allege a violation of his constitutional rights for purposes of Section 1983. The inmate did not allege that he was denied access to grievance procedures. Verbal threats and name calling were not actionable under Section 1983, and the inmate could have pursued a state post-deprivation remedy for conversion of his property. In addition, the prison superintendent was not liable under Section 1983 for alleged violations of the inmate's rights. The superintendent denied his involvement in many alleged violations and the inmate agreed that the superintendent did not participate in the alleged violations and said that he had sued the superintendent only because of the superintendent's position. (Missouri Training Center for Men)

U.S. District Court
PLUMBING

McNeal v. Ellerd, 823 F.Supp. 627 (E.D. Wis. 1993). Prisoners who were placed in a cell with a non-functional sink brought a Section 1983 action against prison employees seeking damages and declaratory and injunctive relief, and the prison employees moved to dismiss. The district court found that the prisoners failed to show a serious deprivation of basic human needs and thus were unable to establish a prima facie case that prison conditions violated the Eighth Amendment. The prisoners did not allege that generally unsanitary conditions existed, that the non-functional sink caused particular unsanitary conditions in the cell, or that they were deprived of potable water. (Racine Correctional Institution, Wisconsin)

U.S. Appeals Court
EQUAL PROTECTION

More v. Farrier, 984 F.2d 269 (8th Cir. 1993), cert. denied, 114 S.Ct. 74. Inmates brought a Section 1983 action against prison officials challenging the refusal to provide in-cell cable television service to wheelchair-bound inmates. The U.S. District Court found an equal protection violation, and an appeal was taken. The appeals court, reversing the decision, found that the prisoners had no fundamental right to in-cell cable television. Furthermore, the prison officials did not violate the inmates' rights to equal protection when they refused to install the cable television service in the inmates' individual cells; officials could rationally decide that installing service was not worth the effort, even if the cost was minimal, where the officials provided inmates with substantially equivalent access to television a short distance from their cells. (Iowa State Penitentiary)

U.S. District Court
DOUBLE CELLING
FLOOR-SLEEPING

Newkirk v. Sheers, 834 F.Supp. 772 (E.D. Pa. 1993). Pretrial detainees brought a suit against a local government and prison officials in their official and individual capacities alleging violation of their constitutional rights. On cross motions for summary judgment, the district court found that the county prison warden and deputy warden did not have qualified immunity from liability for double-celling detainees in cells designed for one inmate and forcing detainees to sleep on mattresses on the cell floors for a period greater than a few days. The district court also found that the double ceiling of the detainees in other than exigent circumstances violated their due process rights. (Schuylkill County Prison, Pennsylvania)

U.S. Appeals Court
DOUBLE CELLING

Strickler v. Waters, 989 F.2d 1375 (4th Cir. 1993), cert. denied, 114 S.Ct. 393. An inmate in a city jail brought a suit against the Commonwealth of Virginia, the city, the city sheriff, and the Department of Corrections for their alleged violation of his constitutional rights concerning his conditions of confinement. The U.S. District Court granted the defendants' motions for summary judgment, and the inmate appealed. The court of appeals found that double ceiling did not rise to a level of cognizable Eighth Amendment deprivation. The inmate failed to present any evidence that he had sustained serious or significant physical or emotional injury because of such conditions. (Portsmouth City Jail, Virginia)

U.S. District Court
CELLS
HYGIENE
PLUMBING

Thomas v. Brown, 824 F.Supp. 160 (N.D. Ind. 1993). A state prisoner brought a civil rights action, claiming that he had been deprived of running water in a sink in his cell. The district court found that material issues of fact, precluding summary judgment on behalf of prison officials, existed as to whether the prisoner had been subjected to cruel and unusual punishment. There was dispute about whether the prisoner had notified authorities, and as to whether the officers had shown necessary deliberate indifference to his plight. However, the complaint did not state an equal protection claim. (Indiana State Prison)

- U.S. District Court
FOOD
PRETRIAL
DETAINEES
VENTILATION
- Tucker v. Randall, 840 F.Supp. 1237 (N.D.Ill. 1993). A former pretrial detainee brought a Section 1983 action against officers of a sheriff's department alleging inadequate jail conditions. The district court dismissed, and the detainee appealed. The appeals court found that the alleged intensely cold and hot temperatures in the detainee's cell, and alleged lack of food in the jail, did not meet "deliberate indifference" or "malicious motives" standards so as to defeat the qualified immunity defense asserted by the sheriff's department officials. Attempts to remedy prison conditions, including the use of a space heater, giving the defendant an extra blanket and clothes to wear, installing fans and opening windows, and giving the detainee extra snacks, showed something less than a criminally reckless or malicious state of mind. (Kendall County Jail, Illinois)
- U.S. District Court
PRETRIAL
DETAINEES
SANITATION
- Walton v. Fairman, 836 F.Supp. 511 (N.D. Ill. 1993). Pretrial detainees brought a pro se Section 1983 action against corrections officials and a sheriff alleging that conditions of confinement violated their due process rights. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court found the pretrial detainees sufficiently alleged facts in their civil rights complaint to show that conditions of confinement in the county jail violated their due process rights so as to survive a motion to dismiss. The detainees alleged that rats bit them and one claimed that a swarm of mice attacked him. The alleged bites and attacks took place in about a month and a half time span. The detainees alleged that they told officials about the large nest of rats and mice and that the officials did not exterminate or make any efforts to rid the jail of the vermin. (Cook County Jail, Illinois)
- U.S. Appeals Court
DISCIPLINE
SANITATION
SEGREGATION
- White v. Nix, 7 F.3d 120 (8th Cir. 1993). An inmate brought a civil rights suit against prison officials arising from his confinement in a screened prison cell for eleven days. The U.S. District Court entered judgment for the officials, and the inmate appealed. The court of appeals, affirming the decision, found that the confinement of the inmate in the screened cell for eleven days when he was issued a disciplinary notice was not cruel and unusual punishment so as to deprive the inmate of his Eighth Amendment rights. The cell was equipped with a toilet, sink with hot and cold water, bed, and table, and was wired for cable television, although the furniture was bolted to the floor and screen mesh covered the bars of the cell. If the inmate had complained about the condition of the cell, he would have been provided with cleaning materials in order to correct the alleged unsanitary conditions. (Iowa State Penitentiary, Fort Madison, Iowa)
- 1994
- U.S. Appeals Court
CELLS
HEATING
- Del Raine v. Williford, 32 F.3d 1024 (7th Cir. 1994). A prison inmate brought a civil rights action against prison employees. The U.S. District Court dismissed the action and the inmate appealed. The appeals court found that genuine issues of material fact regarding whether prison officials failed to provide heat and shelter for the inmate precluded summary judgment for the prison employees. The inmate alleged that broken windows in his cell were not fixed despite his requests to prison officials and that the temperature in his cell was not much higher than the outside temperature which was 40 or 50 degrees below zero with the windchill. (United States Penitentiary, Marion, Illinois)
- U.S. Appeals Court
CROWDING
POPULATION
- Harris v. Angelina County, Tex., 31 F.3d 331 (5th Cir. 1994). In a prisoner class action under Section 1983 challenging conditions at a county jail, the U.S. District Court found conditions to be unconstitutional and granted injunctive relief in the form of a population cap. Appeal was taken. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that evidence supported the finding that population exceeding 111 led to denial of basic human needs of both convicted felons and pretrial detainees. In addition, evidence supported a finding that the county was aware of the overcrowding and the resulting conditions. Evidence showed that the county could and had in the past taken some steps to relieve overcrowding, and, even if a cost defense was cognizable, it was inapplicable in the absence of any evidence that additional funding was unavailable from taxpayers to address overcrowding. (Angelina County Jail, Texas)
- U.S. District Court
FLOOR-SLEEPING
PRETRIAL
DETAINEES
- Hines v. Sheahan, 845 F.Supp. 1265 (N.D.Ill. 1994). A pretrial detainee brought a Section 1983 action for alleged constitutional deprivations suffered while incarcerated. On the defendants' motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim, the district court found that the pretrial detainee's complaint alleging that he was required to sleep on a mattress on the floor with rats and roaches failed to state a due process claim based on unconstitutional conditions of confinement. The complaint did not set forth facts that would support a claim of deliberate indifference, and failed to allege facts indicating what harm the detainee suffered. (Cook County Jail, Illinois)
- U.S. District Court
SMOKE
- Jackson v. Berge, 864 F.Supp. 873 (E.D. Wis. 1994). An inmate brought a Section 1983 action for injunctive and monetary relief against prison officials for allegedly violating his civil rights when they placed him in a cell with a prisoner who smoked. The prison officials' filed a motion for summary judgment. The district court, granting the motion, found that the inmate did not satisfy the objective component of the cruel and unusual punishment test based on his confinement with a cellmate who smoked. He produced no competent evidence that he had a serious medical condition, or that second-hand smoke caused or aggravated any illness. In addition, he produced no evidence of the level of environmental tobacco smoke in his cell. The court also found that the inmate failed to establish that the prison officials acted with deliberate indifference in violation of the prohibition on cruel and unusual punishment in placing him in a cell with a roommate who smoked. Emergency overcrowding required housing in double rooms and the cell was designated a nonsmoking cell. Furthermore, the officials investigated the inmate's complaints, but they found no evidence of any smoking in the cell. They also provided the inmate with medical care every time he complained of chest pains or breathing problems. (Fox Lake Correctional Institution, Fox Lake, Wisconsin)

U.S. District Court
SANITATION

Jones v. Stine, 843 F.Supp. 1186 (W.D. Mich. 1994). A prisoner brought a civil rights action against a warden and deputy warden. The district court found that the prisoner failed to state an Eighth Amendment claim based upon inadequate sanitation. The prisoner's allegations that he was provided only with a sponge and mop once a week and a "duster" twice a week, and that he was never supplied with soap, detergents or disinfectants, did not allege that the prisoner had been deprived of a minimal civilized measure of life's necessities. (Alger Maximum Correctional Facility, Munising, Michigan)

U.S. District Court
CELLS
SEGREGATION

Killen v. McBride, 907 F.Supp. 302 (N.D.Ind. 1994). An inmate brought a civil rights action against prison officials seeking damages allegedly caused by this placement in a "bubble cell" for eight days. The district court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment, finding that placement of the inmate in a bubble cell did not amount to deliberate indifference to the inmate's needs in violation of the Eighth Amendment, and that state prison officials were entitled to immunity for the inmate's claim for monetary damages. A "bubble cell" has a shield or bubble over the front of the cell to prevent the occupant from reaching or throwing objects through the bars. The inmate had reached through the bars of his previous cell and stabbed another inmate. (Westville Correctional Center, Indiana)

U.S. Appeals Court
ASBESTOS CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENT
SAFETY

McNeil v. Lane, 16 F.3d 123 (7th Cir. 1994). A state prisoner filed a Section 1983 suit, alleging prison officials violated his right under the Eighth Amendment to be free from cruel and unusual punishment by placing him in a cell within close proximity to asbestos covered pipes. The U.S. District Court dismissed the complaint for failure to state a claim, and the inmate appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the allegations that the defendants allowed asbestos-covered pipes to exist directly outside of the inmate's cell, and that the defendants told the inmate that they could not transfer him to another cell, did not establish that the defendants acted with minimum level of culpability sufficient to trigger Eighth Amendment protection. In addition, the complaint did not allege facts sufficient to establish that conditions were serious enough to be considered cruel and unusual, in the absence of an allegation that the inmate was exposed to unreasonably high levels of asbestos. (Stateville Correctional Center, Joliet, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
BEDDING
CONDITIONS HEATING
SHOWERS
VENTILATION

Miller v. Fairman, 872 F.Supp. 498 (N.D. Ill. 1994). A pretrial detainee brought a civil rights action against jail administrators and jail guards alleging that conditions of his confinement violated his due process rights. The district court found that the pretrial detainee's allegations that heating and ventilation were inadequate during his stay at the county jail were sufficient to state a civil rights claim based on a violation of his Fourteenth Amendment due process rights. In addition, the detainee's allegations that he was provided with a wet mattress infested with insects and mice, that the showers at the jail were filthy and that the washroom facility sprayed water on inmates, were sufficient to state a civil rights claim based on a due process violation. (Cook County Jail, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
CELLS
PLUMBING
SANITATION
SHOWERS
TOILETS

Sanford v. Brookshire, 879 F.Supp. 691 (W.D. Tex. 1994). An inmate filed a Section 1983 action asserting cruel and unusual punishment resulting from confinement to a filthy cell in a county jail for six days without functional plumbing or hygienic supplies. The district court found that the county jailer and her supervisor violated the inmate's Eighth Amendment rights, for purposes of the inmate's Section 1983 claim, by acting with deliberate indifference to complaints about filth in the cell and a nonfunctioning toilet and sink, lack of toilet paper, and a shower head which produced only a thin stream of cold water. The jailer left the inmate in the cell for six days while a written maintenance request was processed, and the jailer's supervisor told the inmate he could not receive cleaning supplies until cleaning day. However, the inmate failed to present any evidence of actual damages from violation of his civil rights and, thus, was only entitled to recover nominal damages of one dollar from the county jailer and her supervisor who were deliberately indifferent to the inmate's complaints. (Ector County Jail, Texas)

U.S. District Court
BEDDING
HYGIENE
ISOLATION
LIGHTING
MEDICAL CARE PROGRAMS
TRANSFERS

Taifa v. Bayh, 846 F.Supp. 723 (N.D.Ind. 1994). Prisoners brought a class action suit challenging conditions of confinement at a prison operated by the Indiana Department of Corrections. The district court approved a settlement agreement involving assignment and transfer of prisoners, along with improvement of various prison conditions at the Maximum Control Complex (MCC). The state agreed only to assign prisoners to MCC under specified conditions and to transfer prisoners out of MCC after a specified period of time, subject to certain conditions, and agreed to alter MCC conditions in many areas. The agreement provided for: a commissary with a list of particular items to be made available; inmate access to radios and televisions under specified conditions and at inmate expense; expanded visitation and telephone privileges; availability of additional reading materials; increased opportunities for prisoner recreation; an expanded law library; increased educational and substance abuse programs; expanded provisions for medical care including mandatory psychiatric evaluations for all prisoners upon their admittance; improvements in the condition of bedding; a decrease in the intensity of the 24-hour lights in the cells; increased privileges with respect to keeping personal property in cells and the storage room; and additional access by prisoners to personal hygienic items. (Maximum Control Complex, Indiana Department of Corrections, Westville, Indiana)

U.S. Appeals Court
CAPACITY
CROWDING POPULATION
STAFFING

Taylor v. Freeman, 34 F.3d 266 (4th Cir. 1994). State prison inmates filed an action alleging that overcrowding and understaffing exposed inmates to an unconstitutionally unacceptable risk of physical violence. On the inmates' motion for a preliminary injunction, the U.S. District Court issued a mandatory preliminary injunction ordering prison officials to reduce the total inmate population by 30 percent of operating capacity in two months, in addition to ordering officials to take other remedial actions. The defendants appealed. The appeals court found that, in issuing the mandatory preliminary injunction, the district court exceeded the limited remedial authority vested in federal courts to direct the way in which state prison officials meet the dictates of the Eighth Amendment. The court's assumption of extensive managerial control over the prison was premised upon conclusory findings regarding the inmates' allegations that overcrowding and understaffing exposed the inmates to an unacceptable risk of physical violence. (North Carolina's Morrison Youth Institution)

U.S. District Court HANDICAPPED
INMATES

Torcasio v. Murray, 862 F.Supp. 1482 (E.D. Va. 1994). An inmate brought a suit against state officials, alleging that his civil rights were violated by prison officials' failure to provide for his morbidly obese condition. The district court found that the inmate failed to state an Eighth Amendment violation, except as to the size of the toilet in his cell. The prisoner, who was five feet seven inches tall and weighed in excess of 460 pounds and had a girth of 78 inches, alleged that the handrails for the toilet facilities were inadequate to accommodate him. In addition, the commode was so small that the defendant's groin and genitals were often submerged in the toilet bowl. The court found that the inmate did state a cause of action under the Rehabilitation Act (ADA) in connection with claims that the shower, toilet, pod tables, cell doors, outdoor recreation activities, indoor recreation activities, location of the housing unit and his cell, and conditions of his confinement in the infirmary were unreasonable. (Virginia State Prison)

U.S. Appeals Court
CONDITIONS
CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENT
PRETRIAL
DETAINEES
SANITATION

Whitnack v. Douglas County, 16 F.3d 954 (8th Cir. 1994). An inmate who had been convicted and was awaiting sentencing, and a pretrial detainee, brought a Section 1983 action against a county, the director of the county department of corrections, and correctional officers, alleging unconstitutional conditions of confinement. The U.S. District Court entered judgment for the inmate and detainee, and the correctional officers appealed. The appeals court, reversing and remanding, found that the filthy conditions of a cell did not constitute unconstitutionally cruel and unusual punishment respecting the inmate, and did not violate due process respecting the detainee, given the brevity of their confinement under such conditions. The intolerable conditions lasted not more than 24 hours before adequate cleaning supplies were made available which could make conditions tolerable. (Douglas County Correctional Center, Nebraska)

U.S. District Court
CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENT HEATING
HYGIENE
SANITATION

Wilson v. Schomig, 863 F.Supp. 789 (N.D. Ill. 1994). A prisoner brought a civil rights action against prison officials based on alleged violations of the Eighth Amendment. The district court found that the inmate's claims that his cell contained dirt, dust, and roaches, and that the ceiling leaked during rainstorms did not allege conditions sufficiently serious to violate the objective standard of cruel and unusual punishment and did not state a claim based on the Eighth Amendment. However, the prison officials were not entitled to qualified immunity from the inmate's claim that they failed to clean up or allowed him to clean up human feces from his cell and a claim that the temperature in his cell fell below freezing during three days in January. (Stateville Correctional Center, Joliet, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
HEATING

Winston v. Campbell, 868 F.Supp. 1242 (D.Kan. 1994). A former inmate of a county jail filed a civil rights complaint. The district court found that the jail inmate was not subject to a constitutional deprivation because of a rule forbidding the taking of blankets into dayrooms, which allegedly were unreasonably cold. Temperature logs showed a normal and routine practice of providing a reasonable and, as far as practical, comfortable level of heating in the jail. (Leavenworth County Jail, Kansas)

U.S. Appeals Court
CELLS
SAFETY

Anderson v. County of Kern, 45 F.3d 1310 (9th Cir. 1995). Pretrial detainees and convicted prisoners brought an action against prison officials under Section 1983. The U.S. District Court refused to enjoin prison officials from placing mentally disturbed or suicidal prisoners in safety cells. The detainees and prisoners appealed. The appeals court found that the district court did not err in refusing to enjoin the county from ever making use of safety cells for mentally disturbed or suicidal prisoners. There was ample testimony that some prisoners became so violent and such a danger to themselves that temporary placement in a safety cell was needed to deprive the prisoners of all means of harming themselves. The fact that some prisoners who were violent might be mentally disturbed or suicidal did not detract from the need. The deprivation of sinks, stand up toilets, and beds for short periods of time during violent episodes was constitutionally justifiable because the inmates were confined to the safety cells only for short periods of time. (Kern County Jail, California)

U.S. District Court
CROWDING
CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENT
FLOOR- SLEEPING HEATING
TOTALITY OF CONDITIONS

Askev v. Fairman, 880 F.Supp. 557 (N.D. Ill. 1995). An inmate sued a county department of corrections and correctional officers under Section 1983 alleging violation of the Eighth Amendment. On the defendants' motion to dismiss, the district court found that although the inmate was forced to sleep on the floor at various times during his incarceration in the jail, that mice, roaches, and other vermin were constantly roaming around the floor, that the floor temperature was approximately 35 degrees during the winter months, and that the county jail was overcrowded, these conditions did not constitute "cruel and unusual punishment" in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The conditions did not result in a serious deprivation of basic human needs and the conditions did not deprive the inmate of the minimal civilized measure of life's necessities. In addition, the court found that the inmate's claim that he filed a grievance requesting remedies for the conditions of confinement and nothing was done to remedy the situation was an insufficient basis on which the court could conclude that the prison officials knew of and disregarded the excessive risk to the inmate's health and safety for purposes of a Section 1983 action. The inmate's allegation that he slept on the floor of a jail cell did not state a claim for conspiracy between correctional officers and the county department of corrections, absent any showing that an agreement existed between the department of corrections and the correctional officers. Furthermore, the jail supervisors' failure to deal with the overcrowding problem at the correctional facility did not constitute a decision or custom for purposes of an official capacity claim under Section 1983 based on allegations that the inmate was required to sleep on the floor, absent an allegation that supervisors approved or condoned any policy or regulation promoting inmates sleeping on the floor during the winter months, that supervisors were personally involved in having inmates sleep on the floor, or that there was a pattern of conduct by supervisors to allow inmates to sleep on the floor. (Cook County Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
HYGIENE
SANITATION

Burton v. Cameron County, Tex., 884 F.Supp. 234 (S.D. Tex. 1995). A detainee who suffered from AIDS brought Section 1983 and Texas tort claims actions against a sheriff and a county for alleged harassment. On a motion for summary judgment by the county, the district court found that, even taken as true, allegations that the detainee was denied access to shaving, haircuts, and finger and toe nail cutting, was verbally harassed by jail guards, was forced to use disposable eating utensils, was forced to wash his own clothes, and was forced to use showers in which unnamed persons had urinated did not demonstrate that the county violated his due process rights for failure to provide reasonably adequate hygiene and sanitation conditions. (Cameron County Jail, Texas)

U.S. District Court HANDICAPPED INMATES

Clarkson v. Coughlin, 898 F.Supp. 1019 (S.D.N.Y. 1995). Male and female deaf and hearing-impaired inmates sued correctional officials alleging failure to accommodate their hearing impairments in violation of the Rehabilitation Act, the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), due process, and the Eighth Amendment. The inmates also alleged violation of equal protection because male inmates were granted access to a sensorially disabled unit, but not females. The district court found that the defendants violated all statutes and constitutional provisions under which the inmates had sought relief, warranting declaratory and injunctive relief.

The court found that deaf and hearing-impaired inmates had a parole-related liberty interest at stake entitled them to the presence of a qualified interpreter at hearings and other proceedings. The court found violation of the requirements of the ADA with regard to protection against discrimination and the location of accessible services, activities and facilities. Although the defendants had distributed an ADA manual to staff, the manual did not provide information to inmates about accommodations that were available to them, nor did it contain procedures for employees' handling of inmate requests for accommodation.

The court found that the defendants violated the ADA by failing to provide the inmates with the opportunity to request auxiliary aids and services of their choice. The court found violation of ADA's self-evaluation obligations, noting that while the department did complete the physical plant and personnel portions of the self-evaluation, those did not include an evaluation of inmate housing. The court found that the defendants violated the Rehabilitation Act and ADA by failing to establish an effective procedure for deaf and hearing impaired inmates regarding accommodations and assistive services, and by failing to provide qualified interpreters for various aspects of the reception and classification process.

The court found that the defendants violated the Rehabilitation Act and ADA by failing to provide them with timely access to telephone communication devices, close caption decoders for televisions, and special alarms to alert them in the event of a fire. The court found that the defendants violated the Rehabilitation Act and ADA by excluding deaf and hearing-impaired inmates from participation in programs such as academic and vocational programs and rehabilitative counseling, on the basis of their disability. The court noted that no qualified sign language interpreters were made available to such inmates for educational purposes, effectively excluding them from programs.

According to the court, medical treatment provided to deaf and hearing-impaired inmates without the assistance of a qualified interpreter or other assistive devices was a failure to provide sufficient information for informed consent, thereby violating inmates' due process rights to be free from unwanted medical treatment. At least two inmates experienced improper and possibly harmful treatment as a result. The use of sign language interpreters who were not bound to maintain confidentiality in the administration of medical treatment violated the inmates' constitutional right to privacy.

The court found that the defendants violated the Rehabilitation Act and ADA by conducting disciplinary, grievance and parole hearings for deaf and hearing-impaired inmates without affording them interpretive services or assistive devices necessary to render their opportunity to be heard meaningful.

The court held that even if all of the needs of deaf and hearing-impaired inmates were met at a sensorially disabled unit at one prison, the defendants violated their rights under the Rehabilitation Act and ADA by transferring them to other facilities for disciplinary, safety and/or medical reasons. Also, the court found that the fact that there were more male deaf and hearing-impaired inmates requiring services than female did not justify the fact that many male inmates--but no female inmates--had access to a prison's sensorially disabled unit. (New York Department of Correctional Services)

U.S. District Court
OUT OF CELL TIME
EXERCISE
SEGREGATION

Cody v. Jones, 895 F.Supp. 431 (N.D.N.Y. 1995). An inmate brought a § 1983 action alleging violation of his Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment rights. The district court held that although the inmate did not always receive all of the conditions of confinement for protective custody inmates, the conditions of his confinement did not present a dramatic departure from the basic conditions of his sentence so as to give rise to a due process violation. The inmate alleged that he did not always receive some of the conditions that were intended for protective custody inmates, such as two meals out-of-cell per day and three hours of out-of-cell time per day. (Great Meadow Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
PLUMBING
SANITATION
TOTALITY OF CONDITIONS

Geder v. Godinez, 875 F.Supp. 1334 (N.D. Ill. 1995). A prisoner brought a civil rights action against several prison officials alleging cruel and unusual conditions of confinement. On a motion by the defendants for summary judgment, the district court found that prison conditions, including the alleged presence of defective pipes, sinks and toilets, improperly cleaned showers, a broken intercom system, stained mattresses, accumulated dust and dirt, and infestation by roaches and rats, viewed separately or cumulatively, were insufficient to establish deprivation of human need sufficient to constitute a violation of the Eighth Amendment. No violation was shown absent a showing that prison officials knew of and consciously disregarded an excessive risk to inmates' health or safety. Prison conditions are not unconstitutional under the Eighth Amendment simply because they are restrictive or harsh. (Stateville Correctional Center, Joliet, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
ASBESTOS

Gonyer v. McDonald, 874 F.Supp. 464 (D. Mass. 1995). Inmates filed a Section 1983 action against prison officials, alleging that exposure to asbestos in prison eating and living facilities was cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The district court found that allegations of free-floating asbestos fibers in prison and related citations for violations of state health codes sufficiently demonstrated the objective seriousness of prison officials' actions to state a cognizable claim. In addition, an allegation of the chief prison official's knowledge for several years of the presence of asbestos in violation of health codes sufficiently demonstrated the subjective culpability of prison officials to state a cognizable claim. The assertion that exposure to asbestos would cause cancer stated a cognizable claim even though inmates had not yet contracted cancer. (Franklin County House of Correction, Massachusetts)

U.S. District Court
CLOTHING
CROWDING FLOOR-SLEEPING
SANITATION

Landfair v. Sheahan, 878 F.Supp. 1106 (N.D. Ill. 1995). A former pretrial detainee at a county jail brought a pro se civil rights complaint against a sheriff and various corrections officials complaining of conditions at the jail. On a motion to dismiss, the district court found that the plaintiff sufficiently stated a claim against the sheriff in his individual capacity with respect to jail conditions, as it was reasonable that the sheriff was aware of the overcrowding at the county jail and the problems which accompanied it. In addition, the detainee stated a claim against the executive director of the county department of corrections and the superintendent of the county jail, by arguing that they were aware of the jail conditions since the detainee submitted grievance reports to them and they visited his wing periodically. A claim was also stated with respect to the allegation that the plaintiff contracted meningitis as a result of being required to sleep on the floor of his cell. A claim was stated with respect to the alleged lack of cleaning supplies, clean clothing and linen. However, a claim was not stated with respect to shower conditions, medical treatment, alleged unsanitary food, exposed electrical wires, or retaliation by a correction officer. (Cook County Jail, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
ISOLATION
IDLENESS
SEGREGATION
PSYCHIATRIC CARE

Madrid v. Gomez, 889 F.Supp. 1146 (N.D.Cal. 1995). Inmates brought a class action suit challenging conditions of confinement at a new high-security prison complex in California. The district court found for the plaintiffs in the majority of issues presented, ordered injunctive relief and appointed a special master to direct a remedial plan tailored to correct specific constitutional violations. In the beginning of its lengthy opinion, the court noted that this "...is not a case about inadequate or deteriorating physical conditions...rather, plaintiffs contend that behind the newly-minted walls and shiny equipment lies a prison that is coldly indifferent to the limited, but basic and elemental, rights that incarcerated persons--including the 'worst of the worst'--retain under...our Constitution." The court held that the fact that a prison may be new does not excuse its obligation to operate it in a constitutionally acceptable manner.

The court held that prison inmates established prison officials' deliberate indifference to the use of excessive force by showing that they knew that unnecessary and grossly excessive force was being employed against inmates on a frequent basis and that these practices posed a substantial risk of harm to inmates. According to the court, officials consciously disregarded the risk of harm, choosing instead to tolerate and even encourage abuses of force by deliberately ignoring them when they occurred, tacitly accepting a code of silence, and failing to implement adequate systems to control and regulate the use of force. The court found that officials had an affirmative management strategy to permit the use of excessive force for the purpose of punishment and deterrence.

The court found the delivery of physical and mental health services to be constitutionally inadequate and that evidence demonstrated that officials knew that they were subjecting the inmate population to a substantial risk of serious harm, thus violating the Eighth Amendment. The court held that staffing levels were insufficient, training and supervision of medical staff was almost nonexistent and screening for communicable diseases was poorly implemented. Inmates often experienced significant delays in receiving treatment, there were no protocols or training programs for dealing with emergencies or trauma, there was no effective procedure for managing chronic illness, medical recordkeeping was deficient, and there were no programs of substance to ensure that quality care was provided.

According to the court, although conditions of confinement in the security housing unit did not violate the Eighth Amendment for all inmates, they did violate constitutional standards when imposed on certain inmates, including those who were at a particularly high risk for suffering very serious or severe injury to their mental health. The court found that conditions involved extreme social isolation and reduced environmental stimulation. The court held that prison officials had an actual subjective knowledge that conditions of isolation presented a substantial excessive risk of harm for mentally ill and other vulnerable inmates, and that the officials acted wantonly in violation of the Eighth Amendment.

The court ruled that the psychological pain that results from idleness in segregation is not sufficient to implicate the Eighth Amendment, particularly where exclusion from prison programs is not without some penological justification.

The court found that double-celling and inmate assaults did not rise to the level of an Eighth Amendment violation in the absence of evidence that the overall total number of cell fights over a three-year period was significantly more than would be expected for a facility of the prison's size and security designation. (Pelican Bay State Prison, California)

U.S. District Court
BEDDING
USE OF FORCE

Maguire v. Coughlin, 901 F.Supp. 101 (N.D.N.Y. 1995). A former inmate sued corrections officials to recover for alleged verbal and physical abuse, inadequate cell conditions, and transfers. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants, in part, and denied it in part. The court found that the alleged verbal and physical abuse was not cruel and unusual punishment since officers did not apply force maliciously and sadistically to cause harm and did not use more than de minimus force. The court found that questions of fact precluded summary judgment on the claim that the former inmate's confinement in a cell without bed linens violated the Eighth Amendment. Because an inmate's Eighth Amendment right to adequate cell conditions was clearly established at the time of the alleged violations, the court held that the defendants were not entitled to qualified immunity. (Downstate Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
THREATS
MEDICAL CARE

Malsh v. Austin, 901 F.Supp. 757 (S.D.N.Y. 1995). An inmate brought a civil rights action against prison officials claiming that his Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment rights were violated by the rescheduling of a dental appointment. The court dismissed the case, finding that the inmate did not have a protected liberty interest in having his dental appointment on the day scheduled and that postponement of the appointment did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment. The court found that the inmate's claim that he was threatened with disciplinary action, physical violence, an extension of time in keeplock, and possible segregation if he continued to seek dental care, could not support a § 1983 action without any allegation of injury or damage. (Woodburne Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
SANITATION
FIRE SAFETY
HYGIENE
TOILETS
ASBESTOS

Masonoff v. DuBois, 899 F.Supp. 782 (D.Mass. 1995). Prison inmates filed a class action suit against prison officials alleging that conditions of confinement violated their rights under the Eighth Amendment. The district court granted summary judgment, in part, for the inmates. The court found that the use of chemical toilets violated the Eighth Amendment rights of the inmates where the use and emptying of the toilets resulted in extremely unsanitary conditions, the toilets caused an unbearable stench, and prison inmates suffered numerous health problems caused by the use of toilets including nausea, burns, and rashes. The court also found that there were genuine issues of material fact as to whether prison officials acted with deliberate indifference regarding chemical toilets, precluding summary judgment. The court denied summary judgment for the prison officials with regard to fire safety issues raised by the inmates. Inmates alleged fire hazards caused by the lack of a functioning sprinkler system and the lack of automatic locks on cell doors, which are required by a state building code. Prison officials responded that the facility had implemented a rigorous fire safety program which mitigated any dangers imposed by these deficiencies. The court noted that while it may look to state codes in its effort to determine society's standard of decency, such standards do not necessarily reflect constitutional minima. The court found that the inmates' assertion that their exposure to asbestos fibers causes cancer stated a cognizable Eighth Amendment claim, precluding summary judgment. The court held that genuine issues of material fact precluded summary judgment on the allegation that pest or vermin infestation created inadequate sanitation in violation the Eighth Amendment. The court noted that infestation of vermin such as rats, mice, birds, and cockroaches in the prison is inconsistent with adequate levels of sanitation required by the Eighth Amendment. (Southeast Correctional Center, Massachusetts)

U.S. Appeals Court
SAFETY
SANITATION

Morissette v. Peters, 45 F.3d 1119 (7th Cir. 1995). An inmate sued a prison and prison officials for violations of Section 1983 based on confinement stemming from alleged drug possession in prison. The U.S. District Court granted summary judgment to the defendants and the inmate appealed. The appeals court found that the prison officials could not be liable under the Eighth Amendment for denying humane conditions of confinement absent a showing that the officials were even remotely aware of the alleged unsanitary conditions in the cell in which the inmate was confined. Even if the guards were aware of the exposed wires in the cell and failed to fix the problem during the inmate's brief stay in controlled segregation, the guards were only guilty of negligence which would not support an Eighth Amendment claim. (Pontiac Correctional Facility, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
BEDS
CONDITIONS
MEDICAL CARE

Oldham v. Chandler-Halford, 877 F.Supp. 1340 (N.D. Iowa 1995). An inmate brought a Section 1983 action based on a variety of complaints including a lack of medical treatment and poor living conditions. The district court found that even if a medical restriction on the inmate's activity could establish a property interest, medical restrictions on the inmate as a result of an injured wrist did not establish a property interest in a top bunk assignment. "Lower bunk only" assignment was not marked on the inmate's medical restrictions. Even if there were such a property interest, the assignment to a different bunk did not show deliberate indifference to a serious medical need. (Iowa Mens Reformatory, Anamosa, Iowa)

U.S. Appeals Court
SMOKE

Weaver v. Clarke, 45 F.3d 1253 (8th Cir. 1995). An inmate brought a Section 1983 civil rights claim alleging that prison officials unconstitutionally exposed the inmate to environmental tobacco smoke. The U.S. District Court denied a motion to dismiss by prison officials on the grounds that the inmate stated a claim despite an asserted qualified immunity defense. Appeal was taken. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the alleged unwillingness to enforce a smoking ban in the inmate's room was deliberate indifference to the inmate's medical problems. The inmate had a clearly established right to be free of the existing serious medical condition caused by tobacco smoke exposure. (Lincoln Correctional Center, Lincoln, Nebraska)

U.S. District Court
VENTILATION
TEMPERATURE
SANITATION

Robinson v. Il. State Corr. Ctr. (Stateville), 890 F.Supp. 715 (N.D.Ill. 1995). A prison inmate housed in a segregation unit sued prison officials alleging violation of his civil rights in connection with his conditions of confinement. The district court dismissed several elements of his suit, but found that his complaint that inadequate heating and cooling posed a risk to his health was actionable under § 1983. The inmate alleged that temperatures in his cell placed his health and well-being at risk; the court said these allegations were sufficient to state a civil rights claim even if the inmate did not allege that he suffered frostbite, hypothermia or similar inflictions. The court noted that the inmate claimed he had informed facility personnel about these conditions but nothing was done to remedy the problem. However, the inmate did not claim that he suffered injuries as a result of unsanitary conditions in the segregation unit and the court found that these claims were not actionable. The inmate alleged that the toilet area was unsanitary, there were roaches and bed bugs, and there was a lack of weekly bedding supplies; the court held that while these allegations stated unpleasant conditions, they did not rise to the level of a constitutional violation. The court also held that allegations that the prison's food preparation area was unsanitary did not present an immediate danger to the health and well-being of the inmate and thus failed to state an actionable claim. The inmate claimed that the reduction of visitation time imposed when he was placed in segregation violated his rights but the court disagreed, holding that he was not denied the right to see particular visitors nor did restrictions placed on visitation time prevent him from receiving any visitors at all. The court found that neither prison regulations nor state statutes established a protected right to commissary privileges, holding that restrictions placed on the types of commissary items that could be purchased by inmates in segregation did not violate any constitutional rights. (Stateville Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
CROWDING
SANITATION
VENTILATION
CLOTHING
EXERCISE
FLOOR-SLEEPING

Stone-El v. Sheahan, 914 F.Supp. 202 (N.D.Ill. 1995). A pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 civil rights action against a sheriff, executive director of the county department of corrections, and the superintendent of the county jail. The detainee alleged that various conditions of his confinement violated his right to due process. The district court granted the defendants' motion to dismiss. The court found that the defendants had not personally caused the conditions at the jail, nor could they limit the number of pretrial detainees assigned there or appropriate funds to improve conditions. The court also found that the detainee failed to allege conditions of confinement serious enough to violate the objective component of a due process claim. The detainee had asserted that he had slept on the floor without a mattress, that the jail was noisy, that the jail lacked showers, that he was not able to maintain his personal hygiene, that ventilation was poor, and that inadequate security permitted gangs to intimidate him. The detainee also alleged a lack of exercise opportunities, but the court found that even dramatic restrictions on outdoor exercise do not violate due process as long as detainees have ample opportunities to participate in indoor activity. The court noted that the detainee failed to allege any harm caused by the poor ventilation or any adverse health effects from the alleged lack of exercise. (Cook County Jail, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
FLOOR-SLEEPING
FOOD
SANITATION
CROWDING

Summers v. Sheahan, 883 F.Supp. 1163 (N.D.Ill. 1995). An inmate filed a pro se suit against jail officials, seeking compensatory and punitive damages for alleged violations of his constitutional rights. The district court dismissed the action. The court held that the inmate's allegation that he contracted bronchitis because he did not receive his heart medicine failed to state an Eighth Amendment claim absent allegations that jail officials were aware of his condition or that they deliberately withheld his medication. The court also held that failure of the officials to authorize the inmate's overnight stay at a county hospital was not a violation of his rights because the inmate was placed in the jail hospital where he was observed overnight as recommended by the county physician. The inmate alleged he was forced to sleep on cold floors for approximately two months, but the court found this was an inevitable consequence of overcrowding rather than punishment and represented a "temporary inconvenience" rather than a violation of his rights; jail officials were also not liable for failing to deal with the overcrowding problems at the jail. The court found that the inmate's allegations of vermin-infested food rose to the level of a constitutional violation but jail officials were not shown to have been deliberately indifferent. The inmate's allegations that he was forced to stay in an unsanitary, germ- and bacteria-filled environment, and that showers were filthy and clogged, failed to state a claim for violation of the Eighth Amendment. (Cook County Jail, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
FLOOR-SLEEPING
CROWDING

Ware v. Fairman, 884 F.Supp. 1201 (N.D.Ill. 1995). An inmate brought a pro se § 1983 action against county officials seeking compensatory and punitive damages for alleged violations of his constitutional rights. The district court granted the defendants' motion to dismiss. The conditions that the inmate complained of--sleeping on the floor inside a cold cell for one week--although uncomfortable, were at most temporary and were therefore not serious enough to be considered cruel and unusual punishment. The court noted that nothing in the Constitution requires elevated beds for prisoners. The inmate's claims that he had not had a change of uniform or sheets from the time of his arrival, and that his tier was infested with roaches, water bugs, fruit flies and mice failed to state an Eighth Amendment claim without a factual basis supporting the inference that the defendants maintained the conditions to punish the inmate. The court also noted that failure of prison officials to keep vermin under control in a crowded jail does not violate the Constitution. (Cook County Dept. of Corrections, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
BEDDING
CELLS
CLOTHING

Williams v. Delo, 49 F.3d 442 (8th Cir. 1995). An inmate brought a Section 1983 action against prison officials alleging that conditions of his confinement in a strip cell violated the Eighth Amendment, seeking damages and injunctive relief. The U.S. District Court denied the prison officials' motion for summary judgment and the officials appealed. The appeals court, reversing and remanding with instructions, found that the officials were entitled to qualified immunity as to the inmate's damages claim. While the inmate did not have clothing or bedding, he was given three meals a day, including milk, and was sheltered from the elements. He did not show that any of the prison officials named as defendants knew of and disregarded an excessive risk to his health or safety. The inmate also failed to show that prison officials knowingly disregarded, were disregarding, and would continue to disregard an objectively intolerable risk of harm to his health or safety, as required to prevail on a claim for injunctive relief. (Potosi Correctional Center, Missouri)

U.S. District Court
FOOD
HYGIENE
MEDICAL CARE
VENTILATION

Wilson v. Cook County Bd. of Commissioners, 878 F.Supp. 1163 (N.D. Ill. 1995). A pretrial detainee brought a Section 1983 action against detention facility officials and a county board of commissioners alleging due process violations. On the defendants' motions to dismiss the district court found that the failure to allege remedial injury warranted the dismissal of claims alleging overcrowding, inadequate staffing, inadequate opportunity for exercise, and inadequate grievance procedures. However, the court found that the pretrial detainee's allegations that the detention facility failed to provide clean sheets, clothing, and a towel, had a limited number of toilets, showers, and sinks, and lacked sufficient toilet paper, soap, and cleaning materials stated a claim for violation of due process, where these conditions were probably not reasonably related to any legitimate government objective. The detainee's allegation that the facility lacked adequate ventilation was sufficient to state a claim for due process violation. The detainee's allegation that the detention facility failed to treat the detainee's back injury and that the facility's officials were aware that the detainee's sleeping conditions could adversely affect the injury also stated a claim for violation of due process. The pretrial detainee's allegation that the detention facility served inadequate food under unsanitary conditions and that facility officials were aware of such conditions and the fact that the conditions created an excessive risk to the detainee's health and safety stated a claim for violation of due process. The detainee's allegation that the board of commissioners failed to appropriate and provide funds sufficient to improve the conditions at the detention facility, despite its knowledge of unconstitutional conditions at the facility, and that the board was deliberately indifferent to the excessive risk created by the conditions, adequately stated a due process claim against the board. (Cook County Jail, Illinois)

1996

U.S. Appeals Court
BEDDING
SANITATION
FOOD
EXERCISE LIGHTING
NOISE
TEMPERATURE

Antonelli v. Sheahan, 81 F.3d 1422 (7th Cir. 1996). A county jail resident filed a pro se § 1983 action against jail officials, alleging constitutional deprivations. The district court dismissed the suit and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed the lower court decisions regarding some conditions of confinement and issues, including floor-sleeping, theft of his property, lockdowns, denial of access to courts, and denial of opportunity to participate in rehabilitative programs to earn good-time credits. But the appeals court reversed the lower court by finding that several allegations were sufficient to state claims. The appeals court found that the inmate's allegations of deliberate indifference to prolonged pest infestation at the jail were sufficient to state a § 1983 claim. The inmate admitted that the jail had been sprayed twice by a pest control service during a 16-month period, but he alleged that cockroaches were everywhere and that roaches and mice crawled over him and constantly awakened him. The inmate's allegations that food was rancid and nutritionally deficient were also sufficient to state a claim. The inmate's allegation that his health and well being deteriorated while confined because of inadequate exercise also stated a § 1983 claim. The inmate alleged that he was restricted to his cell or unit for extended periods of time and had insufficient space to exercise in his unit. His claims that his pleas for psychological treatment were ignored and that he was deprived of necessary medication were also sufficient to overcome a motion to dismiss. The court found that although the inmate had no right to leave his cell to go to a general reading library, his allegation of denial of access to reading materials and inadequate lighting for reading in the jail stated a § 1983 claim. The inmate's claim of excessive noise in the jail also stated a § 1983 claim. He alleged that noise occurred every night--often all night--and interrupted or prevented his sleep. He also stated a claim by alleging that he was denied protection from cold temperatures in the jail by the jail staff's failure to provide him with blankets. (Cook County Jail, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
NOISE
SEGREGATION
SANITATION

Bracewell v. Lobmiller, 938 F.Supp. 1571 (M.D.Ala. 1996). Female inmates in a segregation unit challenged their conditions of confinement by filing a § 1983 action. The district court held that unconstitutional conditions were created by the presence of an inmate who continually yelled and threw things and that prison officials had at one time been deliberately indifferent to these conditions. However, the court found that the inmates failed to establish that prison officials continued to be deliberately indifferent and the inmates were therefore not entitled to injunctive relief. The unconstitutional conditions were created by an inmate who repeatedly and erratically engaged in outbursts of disgusting and disruptive behavior, which included yelling, screaming, hollering, banging, cursing, and throwing liquids, unclean sanitary napkins, and feces. While the officials admitted that they were initially aware of the problems but took no actions to abate them, they eventually corrected the problem by medicating the inmate and moving other prisoners away from her. (Julia Tutwiler Prison for Women, Alabama)

U.S. District Court
SMOKE

Crowder v. Kelly, 928 F.Supp. 2 (D.D.C. 1996). Inmates who were nonsmokers brought an action against prison officials alleging they were subjected to high levels of environmental tobacco smoke (ETS) in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The district court granted the inmates' motion for a preliminary injunction, finding that the inmates were likely to succeed on their claim and that they would suffer irreparable injury if their exposure to ETS was not enjoined. The inmates had described a pattern of disregard for the prison's non-smoking policy by both the prison population and the corrections department. According to the court, evidence indicated that the inmates' involuntary exposure to ETS could have both long-term and short-term effects on their health, including coughing, chest discomfort, phlegm production and elevated risk of lung cancer and heart disease. (District of Columbia, Lorton Correctional Complex, Virginia)

U.S. District Court
CLOTHING

Davidson v. Coughlin, 920 F.Supp. 305 (N.D.N.Y. 1996). A state prison inmate filed a § 1983 action against prison officials alleging conditions that violated the Eighth Amendment. The court found that summary judgment for the defendants was precluded on the inmate's claim that prison officials failed to provide him with adequate winter clothing. The officials alleged that the inmate was provided with the clothing mandated by state corrections directives; the inmate alleged that they failed to provide inmates with various items of clothing, including winter underwear, winter boots or galoshes, sweaters, gloves, scarves and wool socks. The inmate alleged that some of these items were available for purchase only. (Auburn Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
CLOTHING
EXERCISE

Davidson v. Scully, 914 F.Supp. 1011 (S.D.N.Y. 1996). A prisoner moved for a preliminary injunction in his suit against prison officials. The district court granted the motion with regard to the prison's alleged failure to provide warm clothing for inmates who wished to participate in outdoor exercise. The court found that it was likely the prisoner would demonstrate that he was unconstitutionally denied the opportunity for outdoor exercise. Prison officials did not dispute the prisoner's allegations that prisoners such as himself who were housed in a special housing unit were issued only summer weight clothing and nonwaterproof footwear, and that the prisoners of that unit shared "community" lightweight jackets. The district court stated that refusing to provide adequate clothing for outdoor exercise during cold weather was tantamount to refusing to provide outdoor exercise, which would constitute cruel and unusual punishment. (Auburn Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
DOUBLE CELLING
CLASSIFICATION

El Tabech v. Gunter, 922 F.Supp. 244 (D.Neb. 1996). Inmates sued corrections officials alleging that the practice of double celling inmates with random cell assignment violated the Eighth Amendment. The district court ordered remedial measures and the officials appealed; the appeals court remanded the case for certification of findings. On remand, the district court held that evidence was sufficient to find that prison officials actually knew of and disregarded the substantial risk to the safety of inmates posed by making random double cell assignments without the use of classification information and without determining inmate compatibility. The court noted that evidence supported the conclusion that the level of violence at the penitentiary, including violence in double cells, posed a substantial risk of harm to inmates. The court found that remedial measures, such as cell moves, protective custody, or posting staff on a gallery, did not render the decision not to use classification information reasonable. The court found that evidence established that wardens were personally responsible for the failure to use classification information before making cell assignments. (Nebraska State Penitentiary)

U.S. Appeals Court
PRETRIAL DETAINEES
OUT OF CELL TIME
TOTALITY OF CONDITIONS
FLOOR-SLEEPING
CELLS

Ferguson v. Cape Girardeau County, 88 F.3d 647 (8th Cir. 1996). A prison inmate filed civil rights claims and state law claims against county officials alleging violation of his constitutional rights when he was a pretrial detainee. The district court granted summary judgment for some defendants, and the appeals court affirmed in part and remanded in part. The court found that confinement of the pretrial detainee in a space of just over 30 square feet and the use of a floor mattress for 13 nights did not constitute "punishment" in violation of the detainee's due process rights. The court noted that the totality of circumstances supported the existence of a legitimate governmental interest, based on the short duration of confinement, the necessity to keep the detainee under observation for both his medical condition and safety concerns, and the amount of time he spent out of his cell. (Cape Girardeau County Jail, Missouri)

U.S. Appeals Court
PRETRIAL
DETAINEES

Hamilton v. Lyons, 74 F.3d 99 (5th Cir. 1996). A parolee who was detained for an alleged new offense brought a § 1983 action challenging conditions of confinement at a city jail. The district court dismissed the case as frivolous and the parolee appealed. The appeals court affirmed, ruling that the alleged conditions did not violate the Eighth or Fourteenth Amendments. The parolee had alleged that he was denied visitation, recreation, mail, legal materials, sheets, and showers for a three-day period, but the court found that the conditions were not unconstitutional and that the parolee presented no evidence that the defendants intended to punish the parolee for his pending charges. (DeSoto City Jail, Texas)

U.S. District Court
VENTILATION
NOISE
EXERCISE

Kropp v. McCaughtry, 915 F.Supp. 85 (E.D.Wis. 1996). A state inmate filed a § 1983 action against a prison warden and security director alleging cruel and unusual punishment in violation of his Eighth Amendment rights. The district court granted summary judgment for the prison officials, finding that construction of an expanded metal front on cell doors in the adjustment segregation unit did not violate the inmate's rights. Construction lasted for only five hours each day, prisoners were housed at least one cell removed from the work, the construction did not require the workers to wear gas masks and therefore the prisoners did not need them, and the inmates were supplied with ear plugs on request. The court also found that temporary denial of the inmate's outdoor exercise while outside recreation modules were being constructed did not violate the inmate's rights. The inmate was not denied the right to exercise in his cell and once he was transferred to the general population he was able to exercise outside several times a week. (Waupun Correctional Institution, Wisconsin)

U.S. Appeals Court
CROWDING POPULATION

McClendon v. City of Albuquerque, 79 F.3d 1014 (10th Cir. 1996). After a class action suit was filed against a detention facility, the district court granted a preliminary injunction to reduce the population. The district court judge had made an unannounced visit to the facility, which was followed by a one-day evidentiary hearing. The preliminary injunction was converted into a permanent injunction based on a partial settlement agreement between the parties. The district court ordered the facility to reduce its inmate population according to a schedule of progressively decreasing population caps, and imposed detailed conditions concerning the day-to-day operation of the facility. To comply with the population caps, the order required the defendants to implement a "Matrix Release System" (MRS) which assigned a numerical score to each inmate, providing the basis for the release of selected prisoners when the population cap was exceeded. After using the MRS twice, the defendants decided to avoid exceeding the population caps by housing inmates in other facilities. The plaintiffs objected to the arrangements that were proposed (which included using tents, the basement of the courthouse, and re-opening a facility which had been closed) and filed suit. The judge imposed a condition which required the defendants to make any proposed site available to plaintiffs' counsel for inspection; in the event of a dispute between the parties, the judge noted that he would be "happy to tour any other facilities that may be used as an interim measure." Local government officials and employees filed an application for an emergency stay of the order and a writ of prohibition seeking relief from the injunction. The district court had required prior court approval and inspection by inmates' counsel of any confinement facilities that were to be used other than the local detention center. The appeals court assigned the petition for writ to a panel for review, and granted a stay of the district court order, finding that the local officials had demonstrated the likelihood of success on appeal. The officials secured a stay of the order and eventually some of the elements of the decision were vacated when the City opened a new detention facility. (Bernalillo Co. Detention Ctr., New Mexico)

U.S. Appeals Court
CLOTHING
BEDDING
EXERCISE
HYGIENE
VENTILATION

Mitchell v. Maynard, 80 F.3d 1433 (10th Cir. 1996). A prisoner brought a § 1983 action against prison officials, claiming violation of his rights under the Fifth, Sixth, Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments. The district court granted judgment for the defendants as a matter of law and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded the case for further proceedings. The appeals court found that judgment as a matter of law was precluded by genuine issues of fact regarding the prisoner's alleged conditions of confinement. The prisoner claimed that he was denied clothing and bedding, that he was subjected to temperatures in the mid-fifties, that he was deprived of exercise for an extended period of time, that there was a lack of hot water and adequate ventilation, that his prescription eyeglasses were removed and that he was denied writing utensils. These conditions, if proved at trial, may violate the prisoner's Eighth Amendment rights. (Mack Alford Corr. Center, Oklahoma)

U.S. District Court
PLUMBING
TOILETS

Neal v. Clark, 938 F.Supp. 484 (N.D.Ill. 1996). A prisoner brought a § 1983 action against prison officials alleging violation of his Eighth Amendment rights as the result of his conditions of confinement. The district court held that the prisoner's conditions of confinement in his segregation cell were not sufficient to support an Eighth Amendment violation. The prisoner complained that during his 20-day confinement in a segregation cell there was no hot water and the toilet ran constantly and did not flush properly. (Joliet Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
BEDDING
CLOTHING DISCIPLINE
PUNITIVE
SEGREGATION
EXERCISE
VISITATION

O'Leary v. Iowa State Men's Reformatory, 79 F.3d 82 (8th Cir. 1996). Iowa inmates who were placed in a progressive four-day behavior management program filed suit under § 1983 alleging cruel and unusual punishment. The district court entered judgment for the defendants and the inmates appealed. The appeals court affirmed the lower court decision, finding that the inmates were not denied the minimal civilized measures of life's necessities. The court also found that there was no showing that prison officials were deliberately indifferent to an excessive risk to inmate health or safety. The inmates had received disciplinary reports and were placed in the behavior management program. On the first day of the program prisoners are deprived of underwear, blankets, mattresses, exercise and visits; prisoners are provided with normal diets, sanitation and hygiene supplies, and they may read their mail but they may not retain it. On the second and following days prisoners gradually regain the deprived items-- as long as they demonstrate satisfactory behavior. (Iowa State Men's Reformatory)

U.S. Appeals Court
SMOKE

Oliver v. Deen, 77 F.3d 156 (7th Cir. 1996). A state prison inmate sued prison officials seeking damages for alleged violation of his Eighth Amendment rights by housing him with smoking cellmates. The district court entered summary judgment in favor of the defendants and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the inmate failed to demonstrate that he had a sufficiently serious medical need to implicate the Eighth Amendment or to provide the basis for an award of damages. The court noted that while the inmate was asthmatic and showed signs of discomfort and the prison doctor issued a permit to the inmate to have a nonsmoking cellmate, the inmate's medical records showed that his asthma was mild, that he never required outside hospitalization, and the only evidence of a causal relationship between smoke and the inmate's discomfort was a few general news articles which indicated that smoke could aggravate an asthmatic condition. (Pontiac Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
SANITATION

Smith v. Copeland, 87 F.3d 265 (8th Cir. 1996). A pretrial detainee brought a federal civil rights action against jail officials alleging the use of excessive force and challenging his conditions of confinement. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants on several issues and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the inmate's allegations that he was exposed to raw sewage for four days due to an overflowing toilet failed to state a constitutional claim based on conditions of confinement. The court found that having to endure the stench of his own feces and urine for four days amounted to a de minimis imposition on detainee's rights, and noted that the inmate did not dispute the assertion by jail officials that he was offered the opportunity to clean up the mess himself. (Cape Girardeau County Jail, Missouri)

U.S. Appeals Court
VENTILATION
FIRE SAFETY
SANITATION

Standish v. Bommel, 82 F.3d 190 (8th Cir. 1996). A former inmate brought a § 1983 action against prison officials challenging his conditions of confinement. The district court entered judgment against the inmate and he appealed. The appeals court affirmed the lower court decision, finding that the former inmate was not subjected to unconstitutional conditions of confinement. The inmate alleged that unsafe conditions at the prison included the lack of smoke detectors in the housing unit, lack of water sprinklers, inadequate ventilation, and insufficient emergency procedures. The court found that these conditions did not violate the inmate's rights where the only recent fires were started when inmates set fire to mattresses or bedding and neither the former inmate or anyone else had been injured by smoke inhalation or fire. The court noted that prison officials had taken action to address fire hazards, such as prohibiting smoking. The court also found that the former inmate's rights were not violated when his housing unit leaked in bad weather, even though it forced him to move his mattress to the floor to stay dry. (Jefferson City Correctional Facility, Missouri)

U.S. Appeals Court
TOILETS
SANITATION

Tokar v. Armontrout, 97 F.3d 1078 (8th Cir. 1996). A former inmate infected with the HIV virus brought a § 1983 action against former prison officials claiming that conditions in the segregation unit for HIV-positive inmates constituted cruel and unusual punishment and that his placement in the unit violated his right to privacy. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the officials and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the former inmate failed to show that the combination of broken windows and leaking roof in his housing unit caused a deprivation of an essential human need such as food, warmth or exercise; the inmate's cubicle did not have a window and the roof above his cubicle did not leak, and the inmate was able to use a blanket to stay warm before broken windows in the unit were repaired. The court also found that the inmate failed to establish that the alleged filthiness of toilet facilities in the housing unit violated the Eighth Amendment, noting that the inmate admitted that he had never asked for cleaning supplies. The appeals court held that the officials were entitled to qualified immunity with regard to the inmate's claim for violation of his right to privacy. The court noted that the inmate did not have a clearly established right to nondisclosure of his HIV status at the time he was segregated. (Jefferson City Correctional Center, Missouri)

U.S. District Court
SMOKE

Warren v. Keane, 937 F.Supp. 301 (S.D.N.Y. 1996). Prisoners brought a § 1983 action against prison officials alleging that their exposure to environmental tobacco smoke (ETS) violated their Eighth Amendment rights. The district court denied the defendants' motion for summary judgment, finding a fact question as to whether the level of smoke permeating the prison was so severe as to be a danger to the health of prisoners. The court also found that a fact question as to whether a prison corrections officer and fire and safety officer were entitled to qualified immunity precluded summary judgment. The court ruled that supervisors did not have qualified immunity because they were chargeable with the knowledge of the conditions of the prison and with the knowledge that second-hand smoke could cause serious health problems. The prisoners alleged that smoke permeated the facility due to underenforcement, inadequate smoking rules, overcrowding, and poor ventilation. (Ossining State Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
CROWDING

Women Prisoners of D.C. Correct. v. D.C., 93 F.3d 910 (D.C. Cir. 1996). A class action suit was brought on behalf of female inmates in the custody of the District of Columbia and the district court entered a corrective order. The appeals court vacated in part and remanded, finding that the availability of fewer programs for female inmates did not violate equal protection. The appeals court found that female inmates were not similarly situated to male inmates, and thus the fact that female inmates were offered fewer programs than male inmates at another facility did not violate equal protection. The court noted that female inmates were housed in a smaller facility. The appeals court also found that the district court order setting a population cap was overbroad. The appeals court held that the district court's order impermissibly usurped the executive functions of the District of Columbia by providing that the court's special officer and her staff were to monitor allegations of sexual harassment at facilities in which female inmates were housed and were to ensure that each reported violation of policy was thoroughly investigated and documented. The district court had also provided that the warden was required to take action based on the monitor's report. (Lorton Minimum Security Annex, Correctional Treatment Facility, and Central Detention Facility, District of Columbia)

U.S. District Court HEATING
CLOTHING
MEDICAL CARE

Young v. Breeding, 929 F.Supp. 1103 (N.D.Ill. 1996). An inmate brought an action against correctional officers, a warden, a nurse and a physician, alleging violation of his constitutional rights. The district court found that the inmate stated a claim against the nurse and correctional officers who allegedly refused to provide him with medical attention during an asthma attack, and against a warden who allegedly ordered the transfer of the inmate to a psychiatric center. The court also found that the inmate stated an Eighth Amendment claim regarding his confinement in a hospital unit's strip cell for approximately 20 days, where he was stripped and forced to endure the cold temperature of his cell and had to wrap himself in toilet paper to stay warm. The court found that the inmate stated a claim against a physician who allegedly forcibly medicated the inmate against his will each time the inmate requested to be released from the strip cell. Officers allegedly sprayed the inmate with mace and refused to provide him with medical attention. (Joliet Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
 SEGREGATION
 CLOTHING
 EXERCISE
 FOOD SANITATION
 HEATING
 TEMPERATURE

Beverati v. Smith, 120 F.3d 500 (4th Cir. 1997). Inmates sued prison officials alleging that their confinement to administrative segregation violated their procedural and substantive due process rights. The district court granted summary judgment for the officials and the inmates appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that conditions in administrative segregation were not so atypical that exposure to them for six months imposed significant hardship in relation to the ordinary incidents of prison life. The alleged conditions included: cells infested with vermin; cells smeared with human feces and urine and flooded with water; unbearably hot temperatures; cold food in small portions; infrequent receipt of clean clothing, bedding and linen; inability to leave cells more than three or four times per week; denial of outside recreation; and denial of educational or religious services. (Maryland Penitentiary)

U.S. District Court
 FLOOR-SLEEPING
 CROWDING
 CELL CAPACITY
 CLASSIFICATION
 PLUMBING
 VENTILATION
 SANITATION
 MEDICAL CARE

Carty v. Farrelly, 957 F.Supp. 727 (D.Virgin Islands 1997). Detainees and inmates housed in a criminal justice complex asked the court to find officials in civil contempt of a consent decree. The district court found that the consent decree comported with the principles of the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) because it was narrowly drawn, extended no further than necessary to correct the violation of federal rights, and was the least intrusive means necessary to correct the violations. The court found the officials in contempt for failing to comply with the terms of the consent decree, and continued noncompliance with a court order requiring officials to pay detainees' and inmates' attorney fees. The officials admitted they never fully complied with the order and failed to make meaningful progress toward reducing the inmate population. The court found that conditions in the criminal justice complex continued to violate the Eighth Amendment, where the complex housed an average of 168-190 prisoners in a facility designed 51 short-term detainees, five or six persons were often housed in a single cell, single cells housed two or more prisoners, and prisoners slept on mattresses on the floor. Crowding was so severe that prisoners sleeping on the floor often had to sleep with their heads against a toilet, resulting in inmates urinating on one another during the night. The disrepair of plumbing, heating, ventilation and showers effected the sanitation and health of inmates in violation of the Eighth Amendment.

According to the court, medical care was inadequate in violation of the Eighth Amendment, where an on-site nurse and physician and two part-time nurses serviced 168 to 190 prisoners, sick call was administered by prison security staff instead of medical staff, prisoners were not seen promptly as needed, the facility did not maintain adequate equipment for emergencies, personal hygiene items were not routinely distributed, intake health evaluations were inadequate, and the facility failed to offer outdoor access to all inmates.

The court cited "abominable" treatment of mentally ill inmates at the facility. Mentally ill inmates were housed together in clusters with often four or five inmates per cell, the majority of inmate assaults occurred in the clusters, and correctional staff taunted mentally ill inmates, rewarding them with cigarettes after instructing them to pull down their pants and hold their crotch, or crawl across the floor. According to the court, when overcrowding and commingling of mentally ill inmates with the general population contributes to inmate-to-inmate violence, the failure to remedy the situation constitutes deliberate indifference to the inmates' basic safety and security in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The court held that officials may not use restraints on mentally ill inmates as matter of course, but may restrain them only under special circumstances. The court also cited the failure of officials to house inmates according to an objectively based classification system and the failure to maintain separate housing for violent inmates. (Criminal Justice Complex, St. Thomas, Virgin Islands)

U.S. District Court
 HYGIENE
 USE OF FORCE

Dennis v. Thurman, 959 F.Supp. 1253 (C.D.Cal. 1997). An inmate proceeding pro se and in forma pauperis brought an action against prison officials alleging constitutional violations because he was deprived of water for 36 hours. He also challenged the force used to extract him from his cell and alleged inadequate and untimely medical care for injuries he sustained during the cell extraction. The district court held that prison officials did not use excessive force in removing the inmate from his cell. The officials had used a block gun, which shot rubber blocks at a high velocity. The court found that no official acted maliciously or sadistically for the purpose of causing the inmate pain, and the cell extraction was necessary to allow a search which was conducted in response to a plan to kill a correctional officer. The court found that even if the inmate was without water for 36 hours during a search of his cell block, there was no Eighth Amendment violation. In the past, the inmate had used water to flood the cell block, creating a dangerous condition for both prison officials and other inmates. (California State Prison--Los Angeles County)

U.S. Appeals Court
 SEGREGATION
 VENTILATION
 TEMPERATURE
 CLOTHING
 BEDDING

Dixon v. Godinez, 114 F.3d 640 (7th Cir. 1997). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against prison officials alleging that conditions of his confinement in protective custody violated the Eighth Amendment. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the officials and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part and reversed and remanded in part. The appeals court held that poor ventilation in the inmate's cell during the summer did not violate the Eighth Amendment, as the cell had a window which opened and an electric fan, and a small "chuckhole" in the door which provided some cross-ventilation. The prisoner's claims that the rank air in the cell exposed him to diseases and caused respiratory problems was not backed by medical or scientific sources. The appeals court found that summary judgment was precluded by issues of fact as to whether clothes and bedding provided to the prisoner adequately protected him from cold temperatures in his cell in the winter. The court noted that to determine whether low temperatures in the cell violated the prisoner's Eighth Amendment rights, the court should examine such factors as the severity of the cold, its duration, whether the prisoner has an alternative means to protect himself from cold, the adequacy of such alternatives, and whether the prisoner must endure other uncomfortable conditions as well as cold. (Stateville Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
ASBESTOS

Doyle v. Coombe, 976 F.Supp. 183 (W.D.N.Y. 1997). An inmate filed a civil rights action alleging that prison officials violated his Eighth Amendment right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment by exposing him to dangerous levels of asbestos. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the prison officials, finding that they were entitled to qualified immunity because the inmate's exposure to asbestos predated the controlling law that found exposure to asbestos could support an Eighth Amendment claim. The inmate alleged that he was forced to work in areas where asbestos abatement projects were in progress; he claimed he was ordered to enter into areas in which signs were visibly posted warning that asbestos and asbestos-containing materials were present and that exposure without protective gear was dangerous. (Elmira Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
TEMPERATURE
HARASSMENT

Jones v. Bishop, 981 F.Supp. 290 (S.D.N.Y. 1997). An inmate filed a § 1983 action against corrections officers and officials alleging unconstitutional conditions of confinement. The district court held that the inmate failed to establish an Eighth Amendment claim regarding allegedly cold conditions in his cell, noting that the inmate indicated that other prisoners remedied the cold simply by wearing sweats or long-johns, and that the cold caused him only depression. The court disagreed with the inmate's allegation that supervisory officials had a wanton state of mind in leaving windows open, absent evidence that the inmate had communicated to officials that he was cold or that he required additional blankets. The court found that the inmate's claim that he was called names and otherwise taunted by a corrections officer did not state a claim under § 1983. The inmate claimed that he was called "super-rape-po" and "tree jumper" by the officer. (Sing Sing Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
LIGHTING
ASBESTOS PRETRIAL DETAINEE
NOISE
OUT-OF-CELL-TIME
PLUMBING
SANITATION
SAFETY
REMEDIES
STAFFING
TOTALITY OF CONDITIONS
CROWDING
CELL CAPACITY
DOUBLE-CELLING
FIRE SAFETY
FACILITIES
HYGIENE

Jones v. City and County of San Francisco, 976 F.Supp. 896 (N.D.Cal. 1997). Pretrial detainees brought a class action against the City and County of San Francisco and various city officials challenging the constitutionality of their conditions of confinement at a jail. The district court granted various summary judgment motions filed by the plaintiffs and the defendants, enjoining future overcrowding based on past unconstitutional overcrowding. The court found due process violations based on the defendants' inadequate response to fire safety risks at the jail, excessive risks of harm from earthquakes, physical defects in the jail's water, plumbing and sewage systems, excessive noise levels, and poor lighting. The court held that the plaintiffs failed to show deliberate indifference or another basis for liability on the claims of current overcrowding, inadequate food preparation and storage, provision of medical services, personal visitation, hours and accessibility of legal visitation, legal materials and assistance, and outdoor recreation. The court noted that pretrial detainees enjoy the greater protections afforded by the Fourteenth Amendment's due process clause, rather than the Eighth Amendment's protection against cruel and unusual punishment.

The court found that some conditions of pretrial confinement may violate the Constitution in combination when they would not do so alone, but only when they have a mutually enforcing effect that produces deprivation of a single, identifiable human need such as food, warmth, or exercise.

Conditions violated the pretrial detainees' due process rights where the jail operated at about 124% of its capacity on average during a nine-month period, resulting in double-celling of inmates in 41-square-foot cells designed for single occupancy, and causing excessive time in cells and insufficient day room space when inmates were allowed to leave their cells.

The court found that officials were entitled to summary judgment precluding any finding of deliberate indifference on crowding and space allocation claims because of their efforts to move inmates from the jail to relieve overcrowding.

The court found that the detainees were not provided with reasonable safety from fire because the defendants failed to install door assemblies or additional sprinklers and had not responded reasonably to fire safety risks at the jail.

The detainees were exposed to excessive risks of harm from earthquakes in violation of their due process rights, where the jail lay a quarter mile from the San Andreas fault and faced a 50% chance of experiencing a high magnitude earthquake over the next 50 years, but it appeared structurally unable to withstand substantial seismic activity and had a malfunctioning bar locking system and inadequate staffing that further augmented risk by potentially leaving inmates trapped in their cells during and after an earthquake. The court rejected the government's contention that more than 30 public buildings in the area had the same seismic rating as the jail. The court noted that the public's alleged tolerance of risk associated with entering a poorly-constructed library or museum for an hour did not equate to tolerance for spending 100 days continuously trapped in such a facility. The court found deliberate indifference to the risk of earthquakes despite the defendants' contention that it would cost more than $33 million to upgrade the jail and efforts to gain voter approval for funding for a new facility had failed. The court noted that the city could have attempted other funding methods and did have some funds allocated for seismic repairs but diverted that money to other projects. The court found due process violations resulting from physical defects in the jail's water, plumbing and sewage system which created safety hazards. The jail's antiquated water supply system violated public health requirements and safe drinking water codes. Deteriorated sanitary fixtures such as unsealed floors, hot water pipes with deteriorated asbestos insulation, violated the detainees' rights as did sewage leaks from plumbing equipment. These conditions violated detainees' rights even though there was no evidence of any disease resulting from the deficiencies.

Despite some efforts to reduce noise in the jail, the detainees established a constitutional violation in noise levels which ranged between 73 and 96 decibels, exceeding acceptable levels, and caused increased risk of psychological harm and safety concerns due to officers' inability to hear calls for help. The extent to which noise continued to exceed maximum standards suggested that previous noise reduction efforts were merely cosmetic and that far more could be done.

The court found due process violations from poor lighting where correctional standards mandated lighting of at least 20 foot-candles in living areas, and some health standards required 30 foot-candles, but readings in the jail ranged from 0.28 to 5 foot-candles. The court concluded that development and implementation of a narrowly tailored remedial plan was an appropriate remedy, and that the plan was to address each condition that was found unconstitutional including fire safety, seismic safety, water, plumbing, sewage, noise, lighting and overcrowding. (San Francisco Jail No. 3, California)

U.S. District Court
VENTILATION
ISOLATION

Thomas v. Irvin, 981 F.Supp. 794 (W.D.N.Y. 1997). A prisoner brought a § 1983 action against prison officials alleging that their placement of him in drug watch isolation status for seven days violated the Eighth Amendment and his due process rights. The district court found that the state did not violate the inmate's due process rights, noting that the room in which he was confined was larger than an average cell at the prison and was equipped with all of the essential items necessary for proper rest and hygiene. The inmate was allowed to exercise and smoke cigarettes, and he received regular meals and daily medical attention. The officials had obtained credible information from a confidential informant that the inmate was in possession of narcotics after a visit. The prisoner had alleged that the isolation room had inadequate ventilation because two air vents in the room were covered as a security measure to prevent inmates from concealing contraband in the vents. (Wende Corr'l Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
SMOKE

Weaver v. Clarke, 120 F.3d 852 (8th Cir. 1997). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against employees of the department of correctional services alleging Eighth Amendment violations arising from his exposure to environmental tobacco smoke (ETS). The defendants imposed a smoking ban in all correctional facilities and then prevailed on summary judgment motions on claims for damages and injunctive relief. In announcing the ban, the Director of the Department stated that "pending inmate litigation, both locally and nationally on the issue of second hand smoke are concerns that must be addressed." The inmate sought fees and expenses which were granted by the district court. The employees appealed and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the inmate was the prevailing party, affirming the district court award of $8,346 in attorney fees and $2,952 expenses. The court also found that the employees were not deliberately indifferent to the inmate's serious medical needs, as required to establish a § 1983 claim. The court noted that the employees took action to house the inmate in a smoke-free cell and took reasonable steps to ensure that the inmate's cellmate observed the no-smoking rule. (Lincoln Correctional Center, Nebraska)

U.S. District Court
SAFETY
SANITATION

Women Prisoners of Corrections v. Dist. of Columbia, 968 F.Supp. 744 (D.D.C. 1997) In an ongoing class action suit brought on behalf of female inmates in the District of Columbia, the District appealed a corrective order and its subsequent modification. The appeals court vacated in part and remanded. On remand, the district court required the District to remedy environmental health problems at its correctional facility for women, including repairing or replacing roofs of dormitories, conducting a vermin eradication program, replacing torn mattresses and pillows, providing adequate prisoner-controlled lighting, and installing a drainage system to prevent hazardous accumulations of water. The court required the District to install and maintain a manual fire alarm system and fire detection system in the women's facility, and to ensure that all bed linens, blankets and curtains or draperies were fire-retardant. (District of Columbia)

1998

U.S. Appeals Court
SANITATION
LIGHTING

Barney v. Pulsipher, 143 F.3d 1299 (10th Cir. 1998). Two female former inmates who were sexually assaulted by a jailer each brought a § 1983 action against jailer, county, sheriff and county commissioners based on their assault and other conditions of confinement. The actions were consolidated and all defendants except the jailer were granted summary judgment by the district court. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the county was not liable on the grounds of failure to train or inadequate hiring. The court held that the inmates did not show that the training received by the jailer was deficient and that even if it was, the sexual assault of the inmates was not plainly the obvious consequence of a deficient training program. The court noted that the sheriff should not have been expected to conclude that the jailer was highly likely to inflict sexual assault on female inmates if he was hired as a correctional officer.

VENTILATION
SHOWERS
FOOD

The court found that the sheriff and commissioners did not violate the inmates' rights by permitting the jailer to be the sole guard on duty in the county jail. The court noted that permitting a single officer to be on duty when a second jailer was sick or on vacation did not impose liability on the county, where there were no previous incidents of sexual harassment or assault of female inmates that would have given notice to the county that its one-jailer policy would result in injuries. The court also noted that the sheriff acknowledged problems with crowding and inadequate monitoring, and its inability to house female inmates for extended periods of time. The county contracted out female inmates to neighboring jails that had better facilities and limited confinement of female inmates to 24-36 hours whenever possible.

According to the appeals court the inmates failed to establish an equal protection claim. The court also found that the sheriff and commissioners did not act with deliberate indifference to the female inmates' health and safety with regard to conditions of confinement. The inmates' allegations regarding a filthy cell, inadequate lighting and ventilation, lack of enclosure around a shower, unappetizing food, and lack of access to recreational facilities, did not rise to the level of a constitutional violation given that the inmates were confined for only 48 hours. (Box Elder County Jail, Utah)

U.S. District Court
DOUBLE CELLING
VENTILATION

Bolton v. Goord, 992 F.Supp. 604 (S.D.N.Y. 1998). Inmates brought a § 1983 suit claiming that New York's practice of housing two inmates in a prison cell previously used to house one inmate violated the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments. The district court held that double celling under the conditions set forth at trial did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment and that New York had not conferred on inmates a protected liberty interest in single-cell housing. The court held that the application of the Eighth Amendment is guided by contemporary standards of decency, but while the opinions of experts and the standards established by concerned organizations may be helpful on some questions, they do not establish constitutional minima. According to the court, public attitudes toward certain punishment, or what society is willing to tolerate in its prisons, is the more appropriate gauge of contemporary standards. The court noted that when double-celling was researched prior to its implementation, officials considered whether an inmate was violent or victim-prone before placing him in a double cell, evidence did not establish a cause and effect relationship between double-celling and an increase in violence, and guidelines for double-celling took into account medical conditions. According to the court, double-celling was in effect in most other state prison systems and in the federal system at the time it was implemented in New York. Inmates had the same access to extensive programs and services after double-celling was implemented, and there was no evidence of "overcrowding" in the sense that the facility had to compromise its services in order to handle the additional number of inmates. The court also noted that disputes between cellmates were handled quickly and never rose to more than minor incidents of physical violence, the small cell size was not shown to have resulted in the deprivation of any basic human need, and there was no indication that natural ventilation was so inadequate as to cause injury. According to the court, the Eighth Amendment does not guarantee inmates a certain type of ventilation or a certain rate of air exchange. (Woodburne Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
EXERCISE
CROWDING
CELL CAPACITY
SHOWERS
HYGIENE

Craig v. Eberly, 164 F.3d 490 (10th Cir. 1998). A pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against a sheriff in his individual capacity, and a county, alleging he was subjected to unconstitutional conditions of confinement while he was confined in the jail. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants and the detainee appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded, finding that summary judgment for the sheriff was precluded by the nature, seriousness and duration of the alleged deprivations. The detainee alleged that he was placed in a cell that measured eleven by fifteen feet with five or six other men for 24-hours a day, that his bed linens were never cleaned nor exchanged, that he was permitted only two showers a week in an unsanitary shower stall, that the sink in his cell frequently clogged and prevented his basic hygiene, that his cell had poor ventilation, and that he was allowed out of his cell for recreation only two times during his confinement. The parties disagreed on the length of the detainee's confinement, which the court found to be between two-and-one-half months and six months. (Otero County Jail, Colorado)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEGREGATION
SANITATION
HYGIENE

Davis v. Scott, 157 F.3d 1003 (5th Cir. 1998). A prisoner brought a pro se, in forma pauperis complaint against prison guards and their supervisors alleging unconstitutional conditions of confinement. The district court dismissed the complaint and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the prisoner's confinement for three days in a crisis management cell which he alleged had blood on the walls and excrement on the floor did not constitute an extreme deprivation so as to violate the prisoner's rights under the Eighth Amendment. The court noted that the prisoner had cleaning supplies available to him. (Coffield Unit, Texas)

U.S. District Court
HYGIENE
BEDDING

Jackson v. DeTella, 998 F.Supp. 901 (N.D. Ill. 1998). An inmate filed a pro se § 1983 action against prison officials in their individual and official capacities claiming he was subjected to excessive physical force and that he was subjected to cruel and unusual punishment because of certain conditions of his confinement. The district court held that officials who sprayed the inmate with a chemical agent and beat him were not entitled to qualified immunity. The court found that an eight-day deprivation of personal hygiene items and bedding was not cruel and unusual punishment, where there was no evidence that the deprivation resulted in harm to the inmate. (Stateville Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
ASBESTOS EMOTIONAL DIS-TRESS

Johnson v. DuBois, 20 F.Supp.2d 138 (D.Mass. 1998). An inmate brought a pro se action to recover for exposure to asbestos. The district court ruled that while the inmate could recover for exposure to asbestos without actually suffering from asbestosis, cancer, or other physical injuries, the inmate failed to establish that he was exposed to asbestos. The inmate alleged, based on news articles, that almost all buildings erected before 1970 used asbestos as fireproofing material, which the court found to be insufficient evidence. The inmate contended that he was exposed to asbestos while working on several corrections department inmate work crews during his incarceration, and that he was not provided with protective clothing or devices. (M.C.I. Shirley, Massachusetts)

U.S. Appeals Court
ASBESTOS

LaBounty v. Coughlin, 137 F.3d 68 (2nd Cir. 1998). An inmate sued prison officials under § 1983 alleging that he was subjected to unconstitutional conditions of confinement. The district court entered summary judgment for the officials and the inmate appealed. The appeals court vacated and remanded, finding that the inmate stated an Eighth Amendment deliberate indifference claim based on allegations that he was exposed to friable asbestos while incarcerated and that officials knowingly failed to protect him from such exposure. The court also vacated summary judgment on the inmate's tainted drinking water claim to allow the district court to determine whether officials responded properly to the inmate's request for production of documents. (Woodbourne Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
SMOKE

McPherson v. Coombe, 29 F.Supp.2d 141 (W.D.N.Y. 1998). An inmate brought a § 1983 action alleging violations of his First, Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment rights arising from his exposure to environmental tobacco smoke (ETS). The district court denied the defendants' motion for summary judgment, finding that it was precluded by fact questions as to whether smoke conditions in the prison violated contemporary standards of decency, whether officials were aware of the potential risks to the inmate's future health, and whether the superintendent was personally involved in decisions leading to denial of the inmate's request to be housed in a smoke-free environment. The court found that prison smoking regulations, which permitted smoking in dormitory areas, did not violate the inmate's First Amendment rights to freedom of association because designated non-smoking areas gave the inmate opportunities to exercise his right to associate with other inmates. The inmate had alleged that the smoking policy restricted his movement within the dormitory in his attempt to evade contact with ETS. (Attica Correctional Facility and Orleans Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
SMOKE

Scott v. District of Columbia, 139 F.3d 940 (D.C. Cir. 1998). Nonsmoking prisoners brought a civil rights suit against the District of Columbia alleging violation of their Eighth Amendment rights by exposing them to second-hand tobacco smoke. The district court entered an injunction requiring the District of Columbia to provide the prisoners with a smoke-free environment. The District appealed and the appeals court reversed, finding that evidence was insufficient to establish that the prisoners were exposed to an unreasonably high level of smoke, where measurements indicated that the amounts of second-hand smoke were within acceptable levels and the prisoners failed to demonstrate a relationship between the smoke and their alleged ailments. The appeals court also held that evidence was insufficient to establish that prison officials were deliberately indifferent to the risk of harm that second-hand smoke posed to prisoners, where evidence indicated that the officials made a good faith attempt to enforce a nonsmoking policy and improved ventilation in certain areas. (Lorton Correctional Complex, Virginia, District of Columbia)

U.S. District Court
TOTALITY OF CONDITIONS
DOUBLE CELLING
FOOD
SANITATION
CROWDING

Simpson v. Horn, 25 F.Supp.2d 563 (E.D.Pa. 1998). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against a corrections commissioner and officials, alleging that conditions of confinement at an overcrowded facility violated his Eighth Amendment rights, and that a classification system for double-cell assignment violated the equal protection clause. The district court found that the alleged deficiencies in the facility were not cruel and unusual punishment, but that fact issues precluded summary judgment on the equal protection claim. The court questioned the officials' intent to cause racial segregation via double-celling, and ruled they were not entitled to qualified immunity with respect to that claim. The court noted that prison officials have the right, acting in good faith and in particularized circumstances, to take into account racial tensions in maintaining security, discipline, and good order in prisons and jails. The court found that housing two inmates in a cell designed for one inmate does not, per se, violate the Eighth Amendment proscription against cruel and unusual punishment, but it may if it results in deprivations of essential food, medical care, sanitation or other conditions intolerable for human confinements. The inmate had alleged that as the result of overcrowding, inmates were not provided with adequate furniture, cleaning supplies, laundry service, ventilation, bedding, clothing, seating, recreational equipment, or telephones. He also alleged that food was served cold 85% of the time and that the dining hall was not kept clean or free of vermin. (State Correctional Institution at Graterford, Pennsylvania)

U.S. District Court
ASBESTOS PRETRIAL DE-TAINÉES

Smith v. Montefiore Med. Center Health Services, 22 F.Supp.2d 275 (S.D.N.Y. 1998).

A pretrial detainee sued a city and city corrections officials to recover from alleged injuries he suffered as the result of his alleged exposure to asbestos. The district court held that a three-day delay in treating the detainee after his alleged exposure did not amount to deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs, noting that a mere delay in rendering medical treatment does not rise to the level of a constitutional violation. The court also found that prison officials' failure to warn the detainee of the dangers of exposure to asbestos in connection with asbestos abatement work in the prison did not support a claim of deliberate indifference. Warning signs were reportedly posted three days after the alleged incident, which the court found to be at most negligent conduct. (George Motchan Detention Center, New York)

1999

U.S. District Court
CONDITIONS

Abarca v. Chevron U.S.A. Inc., 75 F.Supp.2d 566 (E.D.Tex. 1999). Prison employees and prison inmates, more than 1,000 total, sued the owner and operator of a pipeline and contractors who sold, installed and maintained the pipeline's valves, alleging assault, negligence, gross negligence, strict products liability, and cruel and unusual punishment arising out of a pipeline leak near the prison. The plaintiffs were forcibly exposed to gas when they were unable to be evacuated and the inmates were confined to their cells. The district court found that there was no federal question for which federal jurisdiction existed, dismissing the case. (Texas Department of Corrections, Liberty County, Texas)

U.S. District Court
MEDICAL CARE
TEMPERATURE
CLOTHING

Anton v. Sheriff of DuPage County, Ill., 47 F.Supp.2d 993 (N.D.Ill. 1999). A pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against a county and county officials alleging that he was subjected to unconstitutional conditions of confinement at a county jail. The district court refused to dismiss the case, finding that his alleged exposure to low temperature in a detention cell while naked and with no alternative means of protecting himself from the cold supported a claim of inadequate shelter against the county. The detainee allegedly repeatedly complained to jail officers for hours and they responded with jeers and laughter, and he was not provided with medical care until he threatened litigation. When a nurse finally attended to the detainee, his body temperature was three degrees below normal. The detainee had just attempted suicide and had been placed in a rubberized cell without clothing and was observed every 15 minutes. The court also found that deputies' alleged thwarting of medical treatment given to the detainee supported a claim of violation of his right to medical attention. The officers allegedly removed a blanket that was given to the detainee by the nurse, which the court held supported a claim for deliberate indifference. The court denied qualified immunity for the officers, finding that it was clearly established at the time of this incident that pretrial detainees had a constitutional right to adequate heat and medical attention. (DuPage County Jail, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
SHOWERS
EXERCISE HANDICAPPED INMATES

Beckford v. Irvin, 49 F.Supp.2d 170 (W.D.N.Y. 1999). Defendants moved to set aside a jury verdict and dismiss an inmate's case against them. The district court denied the motions, finding that the award of compensatory and punitive damages was not excessive. The inmate had been confined to a wheelchair since 1984. In 1994 he was transferred from a psychiatric center to another correctional facility where he was assigned to a Mental Health Observation Unit (MHU). The court noted that the inmate was "...not placed in MHU for mental health treatment. He was placed in MHU because the cell was bigger and because his wheelchair fit in the cell." But shortly after his transfer officials took away his wheelchair and denied him access to it for the majority of his time at the facility. The inmate repeatedly requested permission to use his wheelchair and his requests were denied. The jury concluded that the inmate's rights had been violated because he was unable to participate in outdoor exercise or to take a shower because he was not allowed to use his wheelchair. The jury awarded $125,000 in compensatory damages for violations of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) and punitive damages totaling $25,000 against two supervisory officials for being deliberately indifferent to the inmate's serious medical needs. The court noted that the fact that the jury did not assess liability on the part of lower ranking prison officials did not preclude the jury from assessing liability on the supervisory officials. (Wende Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
SANITATION
MEDICAL CARE

Caldwell v. Hammonds, 53 F.Supp.2d 1 (D.D.C. 1999). A prisoner brought a § 1983 action for damages for injuries allegedly suffered. The district court held that the prisoner failed to state a claim with his allegations of limited access to legal materials because he did not allege a specific injury as a result. But the court held that the prisoner stated a claim for deliberate indifference because his prescribed treatment for skin cancer was delayed. The court also found a claim for deliberate indifference in the prisoner's allegations that he was exposed to secondary tobacco smoke and to smoke from fires set in his cell block. The court noted that although prison policy prohibited smoking in the prison, tobacco products were sold in the prison canteen and correctional officers permitted smoking in cell blocks. The court found that pervasive unsanitary and unhealthy conditions in his cell block existed for a long time and were obvious to any observer. Because the Director of the Department of Corrections had notice of these conditions, the prisoner stated a § 1983 claim for violation of the Eighth Amendment. (Cell Block 3, Maximum Security Facility, District of Columbia Department of Corrections, Lorton, Virginia)

U.S. District Court
CELL CAPACITY
DOUBLE BUNKING
SANITATION
FLOOR-SLEEPING
TOILETS
SHOWERS
PRETRIAL DETAINEES
SMOKE

Harris v. Brewington-Carr, 49 F.Supp.2d 378 (D.Del. 1999). A pretrial detainee challenged his conditions of confinement and a district court judge refused to dismiss the case, finding that the detainee had sufficiently alleged violation of his due process rights. The pretrial detainee alleged that he was required to sleep on the floor for one week while being held in a booking and receiving area, that he had to sleep on the floor for three weeks before receiving a bed, that he was housed in a one man cell with two other men, that the open toilet in his cell was unsanitary and deprived him of his right to privacy, that there was a lack of showers and excessive noise, that he was housed with sentenced and unsentenced inmates, and that as a non-smoker he had to breathe cigarette smoke from other inmates. (Multi-Purpose Criminal Justice Facility, Delaware)

U.S. Appeals Court
SMOKE

Henderson v. Sheahan, 196 F.3d 839 (7th Cir. 1999) U.S. Cert. Den. at 120 S.Ct. 2691. A pretrial detainee who was held in a county jail for four-and-one-half years brought a § 1983 action against the sheriff and corrections officials claiming injuries allegedly sustained as the result of his exposure to second-hand smoke. The district court dismissed the action. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the inmate's alleged present injuries were not sufficiently serious to support a due process claim and that the detainee could not recover for future injuries absent a showing to a reasonable medical certainty that he faced an increased risk of developing a future injury attributable to the alleged exposure. The detainee alleged present injuries that included breathing problems, chest pains, dizziness, sinus problems, headaches, and loss of energy. Although the jail had a non-smoking policy the detainee claimed that inmates routinely violated it. (Cook County Jail, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
BEDDING
CLOTHING HEATING
HYGIENE LABOR
ODORS
SANITATION
TEMPERATURE

Palmer v. Johnson, 193 F.3d 346 (5th Cir. 1999). A state inmate brought a § 1983 action for monetary and injunctive relief against correctional officials, alleging violation of his constitutional rights when he was forced to spend a night on a work field, along with other members of a work squad, without adequate bathroom facilities and shelter. The district court found a warden and assistant warden liable in their individual capacities, granted injunctive relief, and ordered claims for monetary damages to proceed to trial. The appeals court affirmed in part and remanded, finding that the inmate had demonstrated a violation of his clearly established Eighth Amendment rights and that the warden and assistant warden were not entitled to summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity. The inmate alleged that he and other members of his work crew were confined outdoors overnight without any shelter, jackets, blankets, or a source of heat while the temperature dropped and the wind blew, and without bathroom facilities for 49 inmates sharing a small bounded area. The warden allegedly ordered this "sleep-out" in response to the inmates' response to a lecture they had received from a sergeant after lunch. They were ordered to stop and sit in the field, even though some of them wanted to go to work. They were confined to an area measuring approximately twenty feet by thirty feet, bounded by poles and a string of lights. Correctional officers were ordered to shoot any inmate who attempted to leave the designated area. When the inmate asked permission to leave the area to urinate and defecate he was informed that he would be shot if he attempted to do so outside of the boundaries that had been set. The inmates were dressed in short sleeve shirts for a day of work in the field, but the temperature fell below fifty-nine degrees overnight and the inmates were forced to stay warm by huddling together. Both the warden and assistant warden were present during the evening of the "sleep-out" and the warden allegedly threatened another such event if the inmates refused to work. (Texas Department of Criminal Justice, Institutional Division)

U.S. District Court
FAILURE TO PROTECT

Peddle v. Sawyer, 64 F.Supp.2d 12 (D.Conn. 1999). An inmate sued prison officials alleging sexual abuse by a correctional officer. The district court held that the complaint stated a claim, under the theory of supervisory liability, for violation of the Violence Against Women Act (VAWA). The female inmate alleged that prison officials assigned a male officer, whom they knew or should have known had a history of sexual misconduct, to posts where he had unsupervised contact with female inmates. According to the court, severe and repetitive sexual abuse of an inmate by a prison officer is not part of the penalty that criminal offenders pay for their offenses. (Federal Correctional Institution, Danbury, Connecticut)

U.S. District Court
LIGHTING ODORS
NOISE
SANITATION

Preval v. Reno, 57 F.Supp.2d 307 (E.D.Va. 1999). A detainee of the Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS) filed a pro se action under § 1983 alleging violation of his constitutional rights. The district court found that loud noise, constant light, bad odor and low room temperature could not be characterized as "punishment" unrelated to the detainee's detention. The district court also found that the detainee failed to state a due process claim based on INS staff failure to protect him from an assault by another inmate, where there was no allegation that any official or staff member was aware of the potential for the specific altercation before it took place. (Piedmont Regional Jail, Virginia, under contract to the Immigration and Naturalization Service)

U.S. District Court
LIGHTING
NATURAL LIGHT

Richard v. Reed, 49 F.Supp.2d 485 (E.D.Va. 1999). A prisoner brought a § 1983 complaint alleging that county jail officials violated his Eighth Amendment rights by depriving him of direct sunlight for more than 100 days. The district court dismissed the case, finding that the prisoner failed to state an Eighth Amendment claim because deprivation of sunlight for 100 days was not a sufficiently serious deprivation of a human need. The court held that the case was frivolous. The prisoner was confined in a housing unit comprised of a dayroom which had no windows and ten cells, each of which had a window. Prisoners were not allowed in their cells between 8:30 a.m. and 5:30 p.m. and prisoners who wanted to take recreation could use an indoor recreation area. The prisoner alleged that his health was placed in danger because he was exposed to illness caused by a lack of exposure to direct sunlight. The court suggested that there might be extreme circumstances under which deprivation of sunlight or light for an extended period of time might amount to a serious deprivation, but found this was not such a case. The court cited Charles Dicken's A Tale of Two Cities in which a character was imprisoned in the Bastille for almost eighteen years in a small cell "where the light of day has never shone." But after reviewing nine cases that had considered a similar question with varied results, the court concluded that "the threshold for constitutional significance occurs well short of the Dickens example." The court found that the conditions cited by the prisoner did not violate contemporary notions of decency, stating that "This conclusion finds support given that people who serve on nuclear submarines or who live within the Arctic Circle or in Antarctica go without direct exposure to sunlight for similarly long periods of time." The court also noted that the window in the prisoner's cell would provide natural light in the summertime when he was allowed back into the cell at 5:30 p.m. (Fairfax County Adult Detention Center, Virginia)

U.S. District Court
DEATH PENALTY
EQUAL PROTECTION

Riley v. Snyder, 72 F.Supp.2d 456 (D.Del. 1999). A death row inmate who was confined to the maximum security unit of a state prison challenged his conditions of confinement and moved for a temporary restraining order. The district court denied the motion, finding that death row inmates confined in the maximum security unit were not a suspect class for the purpose of his equal protection allegation. (Delaware Department of Correction)

U.S. District Court
CROWDING
FOOD
FLOOR-SLEEPING EXERCISE
SHOWERS

Robeson v. Squadrito, 57 F.Supp.2d 642 (N.D.Ind. 1999). Inmates brought an action against a county and jail officials alleging violations of their Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment rights. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that the conditions of confinement in the overly-crowded jail did not rise to the level of deprivations of "the minimal civilized measures of life's necessities." The court found that the officials' failure to give an inmate his high blood pressure medication for 36 hours was not deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs given there was no evidence he was denied the medication out of anything approaching a total unconcern for his welfare, and the inmate did not suffer any injury or harm. The court also found that the failure of jail officials to give the inmate his hypoglycemic diet was not deliberate indifference where the inmate's blood sugar was tested daily in accordance with his physician's order, and no special diet was ordered because his sugar levels were normal. According to the court, the cumulative conditions of confinement in the crowded county jail did not rise to the level of deprivations required to find an Eighth Amendment violation, even though the inmate was required to sleep on a thin mattress on the floor, had one shower, was assaulted by another inmate, was not taken to a gymnasium, was given small servings of food, and was initially denied an "indigent pack" of hygiene items. The court noted that the inmate had a blanket, clean sheets, functional toilets, sinks, drinking fountain and television, he exercised in the cell, and he did not suffer any injury as a result of the assault. (Allen County Jail, Indiana)

U.S. District Court
TOTALITY OF CONDIT.
TOILETS
EXERCISE
FLOOR-SLEEPING
SANITATION
SEGREGATION

Roop v. Squadrito, 70 F.Supp.2d 868 (N.D.Ind. 1999). An inmate who was HIV-positive and incarcerated in a county jail on an outstanding arrest warrant brought a § 1983 claim and a claim under the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) against county officials. The district court denied summary judgment for the defendants. The court held that evidence raised an issue of material fact as to whether the inmate's medical condition required that he be treated differently from other inmates in the jail, in violation of ADA. The inmate had informed jailers that he was HIV-positive upon his arrival at the jail and he was given an initial medical assessment. According to the inmate, he was told that because of "your medical condition, and you having AIDS, you're going to be locked down." He was initially housed by himself in an old shower room, which had a working shower but no flushable toilet. After five days he was moved to a solitary cell located close to the jail's command module, where there was no toilet or shower in the cell. The court found that the fact that the inmate was required to sleep on a floor mattress for an extended period of time and was not provided with a bunk while detained in the jail was not a constitutional deprivation under the Eighth Amendment. The court also found no constitutional violation in the alleged lack of ability to exercise while in the county jail, since he could have done sit-ups or push-ups in his cell and was only in jail for 30 days. No violation was found regarding the inmate's complaint that he was not able to take showers more often while confined because the court held that the deprivation of "a mere cultural amenity" is not cruel and unusual punishment. The inmate's complaints about sanitation, including dirt on the floor of his cell, were not found to be a constitutional violation. However, the court found that the alleged deprivations and violations, when taken together, constituted a violation of his Eighth Amendment rights, precluding summary judgment for the jail officials. (Allen County Jail, Indiana)

U.S. District Court
SANITATION
HYGIENE
NOISE

Thaddeus-X v. Blatter, 175 F.3d 378 (6th Cir. 1999). State inmates brought a § 1983 suit against corrections officers. The federal district court granted summary judgment for the officers and the inmates appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, vacated in part, and remanded the case. The appeals court held that the officers were the proper defendants to the retaliation claim and that the inmate who assisted a litigating inmate in filing an action was engaged in "protected conduct" for the purposes of the retaliation claim. The two inmates had signed a "Legal Assistance Request and Agreement" which was approved by an official prison policy. An officer allegedly told the inmate that he would have him moved to an area of the prison used to house mentally ill inmates because he assisted another inmate to file a suit. The court also found that a fact issue existed as to whether the alleged harassment and cold meals established the adverse action element of the inmate's retaliation claim, precluding summary judgment. The court also found that fact issues precluded summary judgment on the inmate's conditions of confinement claims. The inmate alleged that mentally ill prisoners threw human waste and urine at each other and at officers, making him afraid to leave his cell, that a foul odor was constant, that other prisoners flooded the gallery with water and banged their footlockers so loudly that he could not sleep, that the adjacent prisoner urinated through the door of his cell and refused to bathe or flush his toilet, and that this area of the prison was rarely cleaned. (State Prison of Southern Michigan)

U.S. District Court HANDICAPPED INMATES

Schmidt v. Odell, 64 F.Supp.2d 1014 (D.Kan. 1999). A former county jail inmate, a double amputee without legs from a point below his knees, brought a civil rights action against jail officials asserting claims under the Eighth Amendment. The district court denied summary judgment for the defendants, finding that it was precluded on all claims. The court held that refusal to provide the inmate with a wheelchair while confined in the county jail did not violate the Eighth Amendment since jail exits, entrances and hallways were too narrow to accommodate wheelchairs and there were legitimate safety concerns about placing a wheelchair among the jail's general population. The court also found that deficiencies such as plumbing problems, overcrowding, inadequate exercise areas, and other defects during the inmate's confinement in the county jail did not rise to the level of cruel and unusual punishment; there were opportunities to exercise in dayrooms, plumbing problems and other allegedly unsanitary conditions did not pose a serious threat to the health, safety or well-being of the inmate, and overcrowding did not result in denial of the minimal measures of life's necessities. But the court denied summary judgment for jail officials on the issue of whether they were deliberately indifferent to the basic needs of the inmate while he was confined at the jail. The court noted that the ability of the inmate to move himself about in the jail, to use the toilet, to use the shower, to obtain his meals, and to obtain suitable recreation and exercise, were a basic need that jail officials were obligated to help provide under the Eighth Amendment. The court also noted that the fact that the inmate was able to use most of the jail services did not preclude his Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) or Rehabilitation Act claims against jail officials. (Cowley County Jail, Kansas)

U.S. Appeals Court
SMOKE
SMOKE-FREE ENVIRON.

Warren v. Keane, 196 F.3d 330 (2nd Cir. 1999). State inmates brought a § 1983 action alleging that they were subjected to cruel and unusual punishment through exposure to second-hand smoke. The district court denied summary judgment for the defendants and they appealed. The appeals court affirmed and remanded the case. The appeals court held that at the time the inmates brought the action it was clearly established that prison officials could violate the Eighth Amendment through deliberate indifference to inmates' exposure to levels of environmental tobacco smoke (ETS) that posed an unreasonable risk of future harm to the inmates' health. According to the court, fact issues existed as to whether the prison officials reasonably believed that they were not violating the inmates' Eighth Amendment rights in permitting their exposure to allegedly severe levels of ETS. (Cell Block A, Sing Sing Prison, New York)

2000

U.S. District Court
CLOTHING

Ashann-Ra v. Com. Of Virginia, 112 F.Supp.2d 559 (W.D.Va. 2000). A prisoner sued state officials alleging various constitutional violations. The court held that the prisoner's claim that correctional officers failed to provide him with well-fitted shoes for 24 days did not state an Eighth Amendment claim, where he did not allege that he suffered any serious physical injury to his feet or any other part of his body. The court found that the prisoner's claim that correctional officials misapplied grievance procedures by refusing to accept grievances about a grooming policy that had not yet been enforced, failed to state a deprivation of any constitutionally protected rights. According to the court, an institution's failure to comply with state grievance procedures does not compromise an inmate's right of access to courts because state grievance procedures are separate and distinct from state and federal legal procedures. (Red Onion State Prison, Virginia)

U.S. Appeals Court
SANITATION
USE OF FORCE
FOOD
TEMPERATURE

Johnson v. Lewis, 217 F.3d 726 (9th Cir. 2000). Inmates who had been held out-of-doors while prison officials searched buildings after quelling disturbances brought two class actions against prison officials under § 1983, asserting that the conditions under which they were held violated the Eighth Amendment. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants in each case and the inmates appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded, holding that the inmates' evidence, if believed, would establish deprivations sufficiently serious to satisfy the objective component of the Eighth Amendment. The court found that the evidence was sufficient, if believed, to show that the officials had actual knowledge of the inmates' exposure to the elements and need for sanitation, edible food, and adequate drinking water, and that they intentionally disregarded these conditions. The inmates alleged that during the four days that they were held out-of-doors in the summer they did not receive protection from the elements sufficient to ward off heat-related illnesses, that they received inedible food and inadequate drinking water, and that they did not receive adequate access to toilets to avoid soiling themselves and were not allowed to clean themselves after. The inmates had also been held out-of-doors for 17 hours in subfreezing temperatures in the winter. (Arizona State Prison in Safford)

U.S. District Court
OUT OF CELL TIME
EXERCISE

Delaney v. Detella, 123 F.Supp.2d 429 (N.D.Ill. 2000). A prison inmate filed a § 1983 action against a warden and other correctional officials alleging that denial of exercise opportunities during a six-month lockdown violated his Eighth Amendment rights. The district court denied summary judgment for the defendants, finding that denial of out-of-cell exercise for six months presented a cognizable § 1983 claim. The only out-of-cell opportunities offered to the inmate were for weekly showers and a handful of family and medical visits. The court found that the six month lockdown was a large scale policy such that the warden and upper level officials could be said to have personally participated in the alleged violation. (Stateville Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
CROWDING
FOOD
BEDDING
TOILETS
SANITATION

Oladipupo v. Austin, 104 F.Supp.2d 626 (W.D.La. 2000). A detainee of the Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS) who was awaiting removal from the United States brought a § 1983 action against parish jail officials challenging the constitutionality of his conditions of confinement. The district court held that the failure of jail officials to segregate pretrial detainees who were HIV positive did not violate the due process rights of non-infected detainees. The court denied summary judgment for the officials on the issue of whether the jail's dormitory violated state fire and sanitation codes. The detainee alleged that the dormitory was overcrowded and had only eight sinks, commodes and showers for 72 pretrial detainees that were housed in the dormitory. According to the court, the detainee's allegation that he was denied a meal at the jail dining hall on one occasion because he was not wearing shoes, as required by jail policy, was insufficient to state a due process violation. The court denied summary judgment to the officials on the issue of whether denial of a mattress during the initial part of his detention, which the court characterized as a "basic human need," violated the due process rights of the detainee. (Avoyelles Parish Jail, Louisiana)

U.S. District Court
SANITATION
FIRE SAFETY
SEPARATION

Oladipupo v. Austin, 104 F.Supp.2d 643 (W.D.La. 2000). A detainee of the Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS) who was awaiting removal from the United States brought a § 1983 action against parish jail officials challenging the constitutionality of his conditions of confinement. The district court found that the fact that INS detainees held at the parish jail had fewer privileges than INS detainees held at a federal detention center did not violate the Equal Protection Clause. The court also found that housing INS detainees with convicted prisoners did not violate the Due Process Clause. The court denied summary judgment for the officials on the allegation that the housing unit at the jail had serious sewage problems that created unsanitary conditions. The court also denied summary judgment to the officials on the allegation that the jail had an inadequate number of emergency exits. (Avoyelles Parish Jail, Louisiana)

U.S. District Court
BEDDING
FLOOR-SLEEPING
TEMPERATURE
VENTILATION

Oladipupo v. Austin, 104 F.Supp.2d 654 (W.D.La. 2000). A detainee of the Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS) who was awaiting removal from the United States brought a § 1983 action against parish jail officials challenging the constitutionality of his conditions of confinement. The district court held that the allegation that the detainee was deprived of a mattress and bed presented a cognizable constitutional claim. According to the court, the detainee's allegation that he was forced to sleep on a cold, wet floor for seven hours presented a due process claim. Jail officers had removed mattresses from a cell in which the detainee and others were housed after they had placed barriers in front of the ventilation system in an attempt to control the temperature in the cell. The court held that an issue of fact existed as to whether jail officials were personally involved in creating and perpetuating the conditions. (Avoyelles Parish Jail, Louisiana)

U.S. District Court
VENTILATION

Sarro v. Essex County Correctional Facility, 84 F.Supp.2d 175 (D.Mass. 2000). A state prison inmate sued prison officials under § 1983 for violation of the Massachusetts Tort Claims Act. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants, finding that the requirement that the inmate keep his cell windows shut for three days and nights did not violate the Eighth Amendment. According to the court, the inmate's allegation that he was not "breathing normally" during the period that the windows were shut, and that he needed to use his inhaler to help him breathe normally, was an insufficient assertion of a physical injury to maintain a suit to recover for alleged mental and emotional injury. (Essex County Correctional Facility, Massachusetts)

2001

U.S. Appeals Court
SMOKE

Alvarado v. Litscher, 267 F.3d 648 (7th Cir. 2001). A prisoner brought an action against a prison alleging deliberate indifference to his exposure to environmental tobacco smoke in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The district court denied the prison's motion to dismiss and the appeals court affirmed, finding that the prisoner stated a claim upon which relief could be granted. The court found that the prisoner's current and future health had been endangered because he had chronic asthma. The prisoner alleged that other prisoners in his non-smoking housing unit smoked in violation of prison policy because correctional officers were frequently not at their post to enforce the smoking ban. The prisoner also alleged that he is unable to participate in programs that would enhance his chances of parole because smoking is permitted in common areas of the prison. (Dodge Correctional Institution, Wisconsin)

U.S. District Court
EQUAL PROTECTION

Brashear v. Simms, 138 F.Supp.2d 693 (D.Md. 2001). A state inmate challenged policies banning smoking and sale of tobacco products and possession of tobacco by inmates in state prisons. The district court dismissed the action as frivolous, finding it did not violate equal protection. (Maryland Department of Public Safety and Correctional Services)

U.S. District Court TEMPERATURE
CLOTHING
LAUNDRY

Brown v. McElroy, 160 F.Supp.2d 699 (S.D.N.Y. 2001). A prisoner brought an action against the Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS) and Public Health Service (PHS) alleging inadequate medical treatment and other complaints. The district court found that PHS officials were absolutely immune from liability on the claim of inadequate health care. The court found no constitutional violation from the alleged conditions of a cold room, no clean bed linens, toiletries, or clean clothing. (Buffalo Federal Detention Facility, Batavia, New York)

U.S. District Court TEMPERATURE
SMOKE
EXERCISE
SANITATION

Caldwell v. District of Columbia, 201 F.Supp.2d 27 (D.D.C. 2001). An inmate filed a § 1983 action against the District of Columbia and several employees of its corrections department, alleging unconstitutional conditions of confinement and denial of medical care. A jury entered a verdict in favor of the inmate, on all claims, and awarded $174,178. The appeals court granted judgment for the defendants as a matter of law, in part, denied judgment for the defendants in part, and did not reduce the damage award. The court found that statements by the inmate's attorney during his closing argument, suggesting specific dollar amounts to be considered by the jury, did not warrant a new trial. The appeals court held that findings that conditions were unconstitutional were supported by evidence, as were findings that officials were deliberately indifferent to the inmate's serious medical needs. The appeals court held that the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) does not require a prisoner to allege or prove serious, permanent physical injury in order to bring an action for violation of his constitutional rights. The appeals court held that the prisoner sufficiently alleged a "physical injury" for the purposes of PLRA, with allegations that excessive heat in his cell made him dizzy, dehydrated, and disoriented, gave him a severe rash, and that smoke from rolled toilet paper "wicks" and frequent use of mace gave him bronchial irritation and a runny nose. The inmate also alleged that the small bunk aggravated his arthritis. According to the court, the inmate did not have to allege that excessive noise in the cell block caused him hearing loss, where his contention was that the noise levels contributed a deprivation of sleep. The appeals court held that the inmate's exposure to feces in his cell, foul water, filth, excessive heat, smoke, and mace, and the lack of outdoor exercise, resulted in a substantial risk of serious harm. The appeals court upheld the inmate's deliberate indifference claim, noting that it was supported by evidence that treatment for the inmate's glaucoma and skin cancer was delayed for substantial periods. (Maximum Security Facility, Lorton Correctional Complex, Dist. of Columbia)

U.S. District Court
DOUBLE BUNKING
CLASSIFICATION
MEDICAL CARE
SEPARATION
WORK

Canell v. Multnomah County, 141 F.Supp.2d 1046 (D.Or. 2001). An inmate brought a § 1983 action alleging that his conditions of confinement in a county jail violated his constitutional rights. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants. The district court held that the inmate did not suffer a constitutionally significant injury, sufficient to support a § 1983 action under the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA), as the result of jail officials' failure to shower and "debug" inmates or test them for communicable diseases before double bunking them and mixing them with the general population. The inmate's alleged injuries consisted of toe fungus, occasional constipation, brief denials of food, sanitation, and water, nose sores, and cold winter temperatures. The court found that the inmate's exposure to a cellmate suffering from acquired immune deficiency syndrome (AIDS) did not violate his rights, even though he was splashed in the eye with vomit from the cellmate, where the inmate had not since been tested as HIV positive. According to the court, the inmate's fear that his cellmates might attack him did not support a § 1983 action even if he was actually attacked once, because the attack did not require him to seek medical attention. The court did not find a constitutional violation that would survive PLRA requirements arising from the inmate's allegations that he was required to wash chairs for 45 minutes, even though the task caused pain in his hands and elevated his blood pressure and stress. The court noted that the inmate must show that he was required to work beyond his strength, that he risked his life or health, or that he suffered undue pain. (Multnomah County Jails, Oregon)

U.S. District Court
BEDS
FLOOR-SLEEPING
MEDICAL CARE
TOILETS

Carlyle v. Aubrey, 189 F.Supp.2d 660 (W.D.Ky. 2001). A former prisoner brought a § 1983 action against a county jail alleging Eighth Amendment violations. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that the prisoner's medical needs were not treated with deliberate indifference, noting that medication was administered twice during the prisoner's one-day stay at the jail, he was intoxicated when arrested, and he admitted that his seizures caused memory loss. The court held that the prisoner was not subjected to unconstitutional conditions of confinement, even though water service in his cell was broken, he was forced to sleep on the floor, and he was fed only a bologna sandwich. The prisoner had admitted that he was offered drinking water on at least two occasions and that officers brought in water to flush the toilet. The court noted that although forcing a prisoner to sleep on the floor for extended periods may amount to an Eighth Amendment violation, the temporary inconvenience of one night spent on the floor does not. (Jefferson County Jail, Kentucky)

U.S. Appeals Court
PLUMBING
SANITATION

Carroll v. Detella, 255 F.3d 470 (7th Cir. 2001). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against state prison officials and state environmental protection officials, seeking damages and injunctive relief on the grounds that the drinking water at two state prisons was contaminated. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that alleged lead contamination in one prison, and radium contamination in another prison, did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment. According to the court, the lead contamination was caused by corrosion of the water pipes, but only when water was still in the pipes overnight, and the inmate had been told to let water run before drinking it in the morning. The environmental protection agency had found the level of radium in the water at the other prison was less than half of the maximum allowed in a revised standard. The court noted that failing to provide a maximally safe environment, one completely free from pollution or safety hazards, is not a violation of the Eighth Amendment. (Stateville and Menard Corr'l Facil., Illinois)

U.S. District Court
CELL CAPACITY
CROWDING

Chilcote v. Mitchell, 166 F.Supp.2d 1313 (D.Or. 2001). A former prisoner and detainees at a federal detention center sued officials alleging they were subjected to unconstitutional conditions of confinement. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the officials, finding no Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment violations from the size of the cell. The court noted that all three occupants of the cell could not be off of their bunks at the same time because the cell was so small, and the occupants were confined in the cell for 20 to 21 hours daily. The court found that the crowding was necessitated by the volume of incoming detainees and the lockdown was needed because of the danger posed by detainees had not yet been evaluated. The cells had been designed to house two inmates and ranged in size from 80.7 to 96 square feet. In a triple-bunk cell, 40 to 45 square feet of floor space is covered by the bunks, sink and toilet. The remaining floor space, 35 to 40 square feet "effectively does not permit all three occupants to be off their bunks at the same time." There are no lockers, chairs or tables in the cells. (Fed. Detention Cent., Sheridan, Oregon)

U.S. District Court
TEMPERATURE

Covillion v. Alsop, 145 F.Supp.2d 75 (D.Me. 2001). An arrestee brought a § 1983 action alleging excessive use of force while he was confined. The district court found that the arrestee failed to show excessive use of force based on the allegedly freezing temperature of his holding cell. The arrestee had alleged that he had been placed in the cell "where they turned the freezer on." and implied that the jail administrator was responsible for cooling the cell. The court noted that the thermostat that controls the cell temperature also controls the temperature of the jail control room, booking room, and visitors' room. (Somerset County Jail, Maine)

U.S. District Court
ASBESTOS

Crawford v. Artuz, 143 F.Supp.2d 249 (S.D.N.Y. 2001). Prison inmates sued officials alleging that the officials did not make a sufficient response to problems caused by the presence of friable asbestos. The court entered judgment for the officials, finding that the inmates failed to show present or future prospects of injury from exposure to asbestos. (Green Haven Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
TOILETS
SANITATION

Despain v. Uphoff, 264 F.3d 965 (10th Cir. 2001). A prison inmate brought a § 1983 action against prison officials alleging Eighth Amendment violations. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the officials and the inmate appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The appeals court held that flooding of the prison's administrative segregation unit was a significant deprivation, as required to support an Eighth Amendment claim, and that there was an issue of material fact as to whether there was an ongoing threat to safety during the flooding that would justify the inmate's exposure to human waste. Because the inmate's extended exposure to human waste as a result of flooding was a violation of clearly established law, the court found that an associate prison warden was not entitled to qualified immunity. The court also found that the inmate stated a claim of excessive use of force in his allegation that a corrections officer indiscriminately discharged pepper spray. (Wyoming State Penitentiary)

U.S. Appeals Court
SANITATION
TEMPERATURE
PLUMBING

Gaston v. Coughlin, 249 F.3d 156 (2nd Cir. 2001). A prisoner brought a § 1983 action alleging that his conditions of confinement violated the Eighth Amendment. The district court dismissed the action and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, vacated in part and remanded. The appeals court held that the prisoner's allegations regarding unsanitary conditions in his cell and exposure to below-freezing temperatures during winter due to unrepaired broken windows, were sufficient to state an Eighth Amendment claim. The prisoner alleged that mice were constantly entering his cell and that the area directly in front of his cell was filled with human feces, urine and sewage water for several days. (Auburn Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
SMOKE

Reilly v. Grayson, 157 F.Supp.2d 762 (E.D.Mich. 2001). A prisoner brought a § 1983 action against a warden, deputy warden, and Michigan Department of Corrections physicians, alleging violation of his Eighth Amendment rights. After a bench trial, the district court ruled that the warden and deputy wardens were deliberately indifferent to the prisoner's serious medical need to be placed in a smoke-free environment, supporting the prisoner's cruel and unusual punishment claims. The court found that the wardens were reckless in their disregard of the prisoner's rights, and awarded the prisoner $18,250 in punitive damages and $36,500 in compensatory damages for the five years of inaction by the wardens. The prisoner had two Individual Management Plans (IMP) which required that he be placed in a smoke-free environment, but the non-smoking regulations in the prisoner's cell block were consistently violated and the wardens were aware of the violations. After receiving notice that the IMPs were not being followed, the wardens continued to do nothing to remedy the situation. The court concluded that the three wardens "...each clearly ignored his supervisory obligations and, as a consequence, should suffer the opprobrium of punitive damages, not so much to deter each of them in the future, but to deter other officials in like positions of ignoring their responsibility." (Trustee Division, State Prison of Southern Michigan)

U.S. District Court
TEMPERATURE

Scotti v. Russell, 175 F.Supp.2d 1099 (N.D.Ill. 2001). An inmate brought a § 1983 action seeking injunctive relief and damages for alleged Eighth Amendment violations. The district court entered judgment for the defendants, finding that the temperature of the inmate's cell was not sufficiently cold as to constitute an Eighth Amendment violation of the inmate's right to adequate shelter. According to the court, temperature logs and maintenance records showed that the heating system was functioning adequately at the time, with the exception of two breakdowns that were quickly repaired. The inmate's medical records showed no indication of temperature-based health complaints. The court also noted that extra blankets were made available to inmates, and the prison supplemented the heating system with a program to insulate cells by taping plastic sheeting over the windows and by cleaning heating ducts. (Stateville Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court TEMPERATURE
HYGIENE
FOOD

Waring v. Meachum, 175 F.Supp.2d 230 (D.Conn. 2001). Inmates brought several class actions against prison administrators and correctional officers alleging constitutional violations during a lockdown. The actions were consolidated and the district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that where a genuine emergency exists, officials may be more restrictive than they otherwise may be, and certain services may be suspended temporarily without violating the Eighth Amendment. The lockdown was precipitated by a series of prisoner assaults on staff and other prisoners. According to the court, the provision of cold food is not, by itself, an Eighth Amendment violation as long as it is nutritionally adequate and is prepared and served under conditions that do not present an immediate danger to the health and well-being of the inmates who consume it. The prisoners had been served primarily sandwiches for lunch and dinner, and cold cereal for breakfast, during an eight-day lockdown. The court noted that the diet was without fruits and vegetables, but that it was imposed for only a short period. According to the court, any failure to provide religious diets during the course of the eight-day lockdown did not violate the Eighth Amendment absent evidence of deliberate indifference. The court noted that one inmate's first meal was confiscated but future meals were delivered, often in an untimely manner, and that a second inmate missed two meals during the lockdown. The court held that a delay in delivering a medically-prescribed diet for six days during the lockdown did not violate the Eighth Amendment. The court found that refusal to allow prisoners to shower during the eight-day lockdown did not rise to the level of an Eighth Amendment violation, nor was failure to provide prisoners with changes of clothing during the lockdown. The court found no constitutional violation in the alleged failure to provide adequate heat the cellblocks during the eight-day lockdown during the winter. Temperatures in the cellblocks were at least 60 degrees, heat could not be controlled by individual officers, and officers promptly covered any windows that were broken by inmates. (Connecticut Correctional Institution at Somers)

U.S. District Court
BEDDING
TEMPERATURE
SANITATION

Wells v. Jefferson County Sheriff Dept., 159 F.Supp.2d 1002 (S.D.Ohio 2001). A former inmate filed a § 1983 action against a county sheriff's department, sheriff and two deputy officers employed at a county jail. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants. The court found that jail officers were not liable for failing to protect the inmate from another prisoner who had previously attacked him. The officers moved the former inmate to a different cell block upon learning of the history between the inmates, and the former inmate did not allege that he experienced any physical injury as the result of being attacked a second time. The court held that the former inmate's allegations that the single blanket he was allowed in a holding cell was not adequate to keep him warm, and that cockroaches climbed on him while he slept, did not state Eighth Amendment claims where he did not complain to any officers or officials that the cell was uncomfortable or unsanitary. (Jefferson County Jail, Ohio)

U.S. Appeals Court
SMOKE

Davis v. New York, 316 F.3d 93 (2nd Cir. 2002). A pro se state prisoner brought a § 1983 action alleging he was exposed to unreasonably high levels of second-hand smoke, in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court held that summary judgment was precluded on the issue of whether the prisoner was exposed to unreasonable levels of second-hand smoke. The court held that the prisoner's claim was not moot, even though he had been transferred to a different housing block and the prison implemented a restrictive smoking policy, because the prisoner was housed in a block without individual cell windows and in conditions similar to those he experienced prior to the transfer. The prisoner also asserted that the prison's new smoking policy was not being enforced. (Attica Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
FOOD
SANITATION

Drake v. Velasco, 207 F.Supp.2d 809 (N.D.Ill. 2002). An inmate sued county corrections officials and a food service company under § 1983, alleging failure to provide him with sanitary meals. The district court denied the defendants' motion to dismiss. The court held that the inmate's allegations supported Fourteenth Amendment claims and a claim of deliberate indifference under § 1983. The court found that the inmate sufficiently alleged sufficient injury. The inmate alleged that the food service company's preparation was so unsanitary as to pose both an immediate risk to the inmate's health, and that the food served hindered his recovery from his ulcer, cirrhosis of the liver, and Hepatitis B and C. The inmate alleged that unsanitary conditions included serving meals on trays that contained spoiled food from previous meals, and inadequate supervision of employees that resulted in improper handling, preparation and sterilization of equipment. (Cook County Jail, Illinois, and Aramark Food Services)

U.S. Appeals Court
TEMPERATURE

Flores v. O'Donnell, 36 Fed.Appx. 204 (7th Cir. 2002). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against corrections officials alleging cruel and unusual punishment. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the officials and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals held that while an issue of fact existed as to whether the duration and severity of cold in the inmate's cell was serious enough to implicate the Eighth Amendment, officials were not deliberately indifferent to the inmate's complaints about the cold. The court noted that in order to assess whether cold cell temperatures violated the Eighth Amendment, the court must consider factors that include the severity of the cold, its duration, whether the prisoner had alternatives means to protect himself from the cold, and the adequacy of such alternatives. According to the court, officials responded to the inmate's complaints by offering him clothing, three hours after he first complained of the cold, on the condition that he wear a mask to prevent him from spitting on officers. The inmate refused, and later received medical attention several times. (Waupun Corr'l Facility, Wisconsin)

U.S. District Court
CROWDING
MEDICAL CARE
PRETRIAL DETAINEE

Foster v. Fulton County, Georgia, 223 F.Supp.2d 1292 (N.D.Ga. 2002). Inmates at a county jail, who had tested positive for human immunodeficiency virus (HIV), brought an action complaining of their conditions of confinement and inadequate medical care. The parties entered into a settlement agreement. Two years later the district court responded to a report that described ten areas in which the county had failed to comply with the terms of the settlement. The court held that continued overcrowding at the jail deprived the HIV-positive inmates of their constitutional right to minimal civilized measures of life's necessities. The court ordered the county to institute additional measures to reduce crowding, including: providing counsel within 72 hours of arrest to all persons accused of minor offenses who could not make bail; expanding the authority of Pretrial Services to include supervision of persons arrested for misdemeanor offenses; eliminating any unreasonable factors used to exclude persons charged with felonies from pretrial release; ensuring persons charged with misdemeanors were offered a reasonable bond; and imposing additional restrictions on the length of time a person could remain in jail without accusation or indictment, or accused or indicted but untried. The court found the county had violated the settlement agreement by failing to refer HIV-positive inmates to outside specialists in a timely manner when the jail's own staff lacked the resources to provide timely care. The court noted that even though the county had eliminated its financial review procedures, other bureaucratic problems remained and resulted in delays of three weeks to six months. The court held that the county failed to employ sufficient numbers of trained correctional staff to meet the health needs of HIV-positive inmates. The court ordered the county to immediately develop and implement a plan to increase security staffing at the jail to the level necessary to provide timely access to medical care for the current population of inmates. The court also ordered the county to avoid unreasonable disruption in the continuity of new inmates' medication, noting that only half of the inmates with a credible history of HIV medications were receiving their first doses of medication within 24 hours after admission. (Fulton County Jail, Georgia)

U.S. Appeals Court
SANITATION
TOILETS

Frye v. Pettis County Sheriff Dept., 41 Fed.Appx. 906 (8th Cir. 2002). A pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against county officials, alleging unsafe and hazardous living conditions at a county jail. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the detainee failed to show that jail officials were deliberately indifferent to his health and safety because the toilet in his cell leaked both sewage and water. Jail staff frequently provided blankets or towels to absorb the water and a plumber had attempted to fix the toilet after the detainee slipped and fell. (Pettis County Jail, Missouri)

U.S. District Court
BEDS
FLOOR-SLEEPING BEDDING
TOILETS
SANITATION
OUT OF CELL TIME
CROWDING

Liles v. Camden County Dept. of Corrections, 225 F.Supp.2d 450 (D.N.J. 2002). Former inmates brought an action against county officials alleging that conditions of confinement violated their Eighth Amendment rights. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants in part, and denied it in part. The court held that no evidence showed that prison mattresses, that were between two and two and one-half inches thick, caused the inmates' back injuries. The court found that the inmates' claims regarding inadequate bedding did not rise to the level required to support a claims of inadequate prison conditions, where the inmates received two sheets and one blanket, but no pillow. The court found that the inmates' claims that they received spoiled food on one occasion, and were served food on trays that smelled, did not rise to the level required to support a claims of inadequate prison conditions. The court held that evidence did not support the claim that shower conditions caused the inmates to break out in rashes. Although the inmates presented an expert report of a "forensic sanitarian," the court noted that the report concluded only that the poor condition of the shower and lack of sanitation "may result" in rashes. Inmates alleged that state laundry services did not adequately clean their laundry, causing them to hand-wash their clothing and dry and store their clothing in their cells. The court held that the inmates failed to show any practice or policy of the prison that caused rashes and infections. The court held that a 22-day lock-down that caused inconvenience and discomfort to the inmates did not violate the Eighth Amendment, although the inmates were allowed only 20 minutes daily outside their cells to shower, use the bathroom, exercise and make phone calls. The court noted that the lock-down went into effect because an inmate had tried to escape out of a prison roof and the roof had to be prepared. The court found that summary judgment was precluded by fact issues as to whether fighting that broke out as the result of prisoners urinating on each other constituted a threat to the health and safety of the inmates. The inmates alleged that violence among inmates broke out when urine splashed on inmates who slept on cell floors next to toilets, due to crowding. (Camden County Correctional Facility, New Jersey)

U.S. District Court
TEMPERATURE

Moore v. Gardner, 199 F.Supp.2d 17 (W.D.N.Y. 2002). An inmate brought a pro se action against prison officials under § 1983 and § 1985, alleging mail tampering and unconstitutional conditions of confinement. The district granted summary judgment, in part, to the defendants, finding that the alleged mail tampering did not result in an actual injury to the inmate. The court denied summary judgment for the defendants on the issue of whether the inmate was subjected to unconstitutionally cold conditions. The inmate alleged he was forced to live in a cold, drafty cell for three weeks during the winter, without his bed sheets and with only one blanket. (Southport Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
CIVIL COMMITMENT

Munoz v. Kolender, 208 F.Supp.2d 1125 (S.D.Cal. 2002). A civil detainee who was confined in a county jail under the provisions of California's Sexually Violent Predator Act brought a § 1983 action against a county sheriff, challenging his confinement and the conditions of his confinement. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the sheriff. The court held that the Act had a dual purpose, to remove dangerous sexually violent predators from society and to provide them with treatment, and that confinement pursuant to the Act was civil in nature, rather than criminal and punitive. The court found that the prisoner's allegations that he was handcuffed while speaking with his lawyer, subjected to strip searches, provided with poor food and with clothes in poor condition, were insufficient to support a § 1983 Eighth Amendment violation. (San Diego County Jail, California)

U.S. Appeals Court
EMOTIONAL
DISTRESS

Napier v. Preslicka, 314 F.3d 528 (11th Cir. 2002). A prisoner brought a pro se action against police officers for emotional injury allegedly resulting from mistaken arrest on a charge unrelated to his current incarceration. The district court dismissed the case as frivolous and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the alleged emotional harm occurred while the prisoner was in custody, for the purpose of the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) section that prohibited a prisoner from bring an action for mental or emotional injury absent a prior showing of physical injury. (Jacksonville, Florida)

U.S. Appeals Court
CELL CAPACITY
FLOOR-SLEEPING

Oliver v. Keller, 289 F.3d 623 (9th Cir. 2002). A pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against a county sheriff and two jail employees, alleging confinement in unconstitutional conditions. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants and the detainee appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The appeals court held that the detainee did not suffer more than a de minimis physical injury from his jail confinement and therefore could not make the required showing for the purpose of the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA). But the appeals court held that the detainee was entitled to seek nominal and punitive damages under the Fourteenth Amendment. The detainee had admitted during a deposition that the back and leg pain he allegedly suffered from sitting and sleeping on benches and the floor of a temporary cell was not serious. The detainee had been temporarily confined on three separate occasions. In one instance he was confined in a temporary holding cell equipped with benches, toilets and sinks. Inmates eat three meals per day in the cell, and are not provided with cots, blankets or pillows. At one time the detainee was housed for 51 hours with approximately 50 other men in a cell measuring 404 square feet. He was transferred to another cell where he spent another 74 hours confined with an average of 18 prisoners in a cell that measured 174 square feet. The detainee described conditions in the cells as "a human carpet." (Clark Co. Detention Ctr., Nevada)

U.S. District Court
NOISE
SANITATION

Oliver v. Powell, 250 F.Supp.2d 593 (E.D.Va. 2002). A prisoner brought a civil rights action alleging various constitutional violations. The prisoner and the defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants on all of the prisoner's claims. The court held that the prisoner's allegations that prison officers deprived him of sleep by keeping him up with their singing, talking and other noise, and that his segregation cell had roaches, a leaky toilet, peeling paint and writing on the wall, did not rise to the level of an Eighth Amendment claim. The court found that these claims did not lie outside of the scope of the ordinary discomfort accompanying prison life, and noted that the prisoner neglected to report plumbing problems or use roach traps. (Southampton Correctional Center, Virginia)

U.S. Appeals Court
DEATH PENALTY

Rahman X v. Morgan, 300 F.3d 970 (8th Cir. 2002). A state prisoner sued prison officials, alleging constitutional violations resulting from his placement in segregation rather than death row. The district court dismissed the claim following a bench trial. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the prisoner was given process sufficient to comply with the due process clause. The appeals court held that there was a rational basis for treating the prisoner differently from other inmates who had been sentenced to death, due to his prior violent assaults and attempts to break out of his cell, which justified housing him in a cell with more secure doors. The prisoner had been sentenced to death for killing a correctional officer and had spent 26 months in segregation, where he was unable to watch television, unlike prisoners housed on death row. The court noted that while in segregation the prisoner was not subjected to the same hardships imposed on prisoners who were placed in segregation for punitive reasons. (Arkansas Department of Correction)

U.S. Appeals Court
SMOKE

Reilly v. Grayson, 310 F.3d 519 (6th Cir. 2002). A prisoner brought a § 1983 action against prison officials alleging violation of his Eighth Amendment right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment. The district court entered judgment for the prisoner and awarded damages. The defendants appealed and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the prisoner had a right not to be exposed to environmental tobacco smoke that presented a serious risk to his health, and to removed from places where smoke hovered. The court affirmed the lower court findings that the prisoner's asthma was a serious medical condition and that it was exacerbated by exposure to second-hand smoke, and that the defendants repeatedly failed to respond to repeated recommendations by medical personnel that the prisoner be moved to a smoke-free setting. The appeals court affirmed the award of actual damages rather than nominal damages in the amount of $36,500, and the award of punitive damages in the amount of $18,250. The court found no abuse of discretion in the district court's award of $51,786 in attorney's fees. (Michigan Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
DOUBLE BUNKING
SMOKE

Sanders v. Kingston, 53 Fed.Appx. 781 (7th Cir. 2002). [unpublished] A state prison inmate brought a § 1983 action alleging that he suffered cruel and unusual punishment due to overcrowding and exposure to second-hand smoke. The district court dismissed the case for failure to state a claim, and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, and vacated and remanded in part. The appeals court held that the inmate's allegations that doubling him in a single cell without giving him a bunk for his mattress, a privacy curtain for bathroom use and a television stand, fell far short of the "extreme deprivation" required to state an Eighth Amendment conditions of confinement claim. The court held that the prisoner stated a § 1983 claim with his allegation that he was exposed to environmental tobacco smoke (ETS) for approximately six weeks and that prison officials exhibited deliberate indifference toward the risk that this exposure constituted a threat to his future health. (Columbia Corr'l Inst., Wisconsin)

U.S. District Court
DOUBLE-CELLING
CLASSIFICATION

Smith v. Muccino, 223 F.Supp.2d 396 (D.Conn. 2002). A state prisoner brought a pro se action alleging that the practice of housing him with violent inmates, sometimes in retaliation for his complaints, violated his constitutional rights. After an agreement to settle the case fell through, the court reopened the case and held that the prisoner's allegations stated a claim for an Eighth Amendment violation. The court noted that the prisoner was not claiming that double-celling was per se unlawful. The prisoner, who is Caucasian and who believes he is perceived to be gay, alleged that he was repeatedly housed with racist and homophobic inmates, and that his requests for a cell change were ignored. (Osborn Correctional Institution, Connecticut)

U.S. District Court
TEMPERATURE

Smith v. U.S., 207 F.Supp.2d 209 (S.D.N.Y. 2002). A federal prisoner filed an action under the Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA) alleging that the Bureau of Prisons breached its duty to provide him with suitable quarters. The district court entered judgment for the government, finding no violation. The inmate alleged that the Bureau failed to adequately heat his cell and that it was so cold that he could see his breath, that his knees swelled and his arthritis worsened, and that he suffered severe stress, anxiety and panic attacks. The court found credible evidence that the cell temperature was within the normal range, and that prison officials immediately responded to the prisoner's complaints by raising the thermostat, checking the heating system, insulating the window, providing extra blankets and a portable heater, and transferring the prisoner to another cell. (Witness Security Unit, Federal Correctional Institution, Otisville, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
CIVIL COMMITMENT

Trovillo v. Venz, 303 F.3d 1256 (11th Cir. 2002). A civilly committed detainee filed a § 1983 action challenging his conditions of confinement. The district court dismissed the case for failure to state a claim and the detainee appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded, finding that the civil detainee is not a "prisoner" for purposes of the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) and therefore the PLRA provision requiring full payment of the filing fee on appeal did not apply. The appeals court held that the district court should have permitted the detainee to amend his complaint. According to the court, the definition of "prisoner" in the in forma pauperis statute applies only to persons incarcerated as punishment for a criminal conviction, and a civil detainee is not a "prisoner." (South Bay Detainee Unit, South Bay Correctional Facility, Florida)

U.S. Appeals Court
SAFETY
SHOWERS

Turner v. Miller, 301 F.3d 599 (7th Cir. 2002). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against prison officials to recover for injuries he allegedly sustained when he was shocked by exposed electrical wires in showers at a correctional center. The district court granted judgment for the officials and the appeals court affirmed, with modifications. The appeals court held that the prisoner failed to show that the officials were deliberately indifferent to his conditions of confinement, where the prisoner never filed a written grievance regarding the exposed wires, and the officials denied that they had ever seen the wires or that they were ever told about the wires. (Stateville Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEGREGATION

Veney v. Wyche, 293 F.3d 726 (4th Cir. 2002). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against prison officials, alleging they treated him differently from other inmates because of his gender and sexual preference, in violation of his right to equal protection. The district court dismissed the claim and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the prison practice of segregating homosexual male inmates was based on legitimate penological interests, and that the gender-related disparate treatment in the housing of homosexuals was rationally calibrated to address legitimate concerns. According to the court, institutions for females are much less violent than those for males, and male inmates were more likely than females to have homophobic attitudes. The court noted that prison officials had an absence of ready alternatives available. (Riverside Regional Jail, Virginia)

2003

U.S. Appeals Court
ALIENS

Al Odah v. U.S., 321 F.3d 1134 (D.C.Cir. 2003). Aliens being detained by the United States government at the U.S. Naval Base at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, brought actions contesting the legality and conditions of their confinement. The district court dismissed the action for lack of jurisdiction and the detainees appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the privilege of litigation did not extend to aliens in military custody outside of United States territory. (U.S. Naval Base at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEGREGATION
DOUBLE-CELLING

Alexander v. Tippah County, Miss., 351 F.3d 626 (5th Cir. 2003). Two state prisoners brought a § 1983 action alleging unconstitutional conditions of confinement. The district court dismissed the case and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the prisoners could not recover for mental or emotional damages as a result of their twenty-four hour placement in an unsanitary isolation cell, where the only claimed injury was nausea suffered by one prisoner that was not severe enough to warrant medical attention. The isolation cell, referred to as "the hole," was a sparse eight-by-eight concrete room without running water or a toilet. The only sanitary facility was a grate-covered hole in the floor that could be flushed from the outside, and the only bed was a concrete protrusion in the wall wide enough for one person. The prisoners were not provided with a mattress, sheets, or blankets, but they conceded that the cell was clean and dry when they were placed in it. They were initially stripped of their clothes but were eventually given boxer shorts to wear. (Tippah County Detention Facility, Mississippi)

U.S. Appeals Court
SMOKE

Atkinson v. Taylor, 316 F.3d 257 (3rd Cir. 2003). An inmate brought a suit under § 1983 claiming that prison officials violated his Eighth Amendment rights by exposing him to environmental tobacco smoke (ETS) that created a serious medical need and posed an unreasonable risk of harm. The district court denied summary judgment for the defendants and they appealed. The appeals court held that the defendant officials were not entitled to qualified immunity on the ETS claim because the right of a prisoner not to be subject to the risk posed by ETS was clearly established, and there was evidence that the inmate was housed for over seven months with "constant" smokers and that officials knew that tobacco smoke was dangerous. The inmate alleged that he suffered numerous symptoms as a result of his exposure to ETS and that no change was made in his housing conditions after he told prison officials about his sensitivity to ETS. (Delaware Multi-Purpose Criminal Justice Facility)

U.S. Appeals Court
JUVENILES
MEDICAL CARE

Austin v. Johnson, 328 F.3d 204 (5th Cir. 2003). The parents of a convicted youth offender who was sentenced to attend a one-day "boot camp," brought a § 1983 action to recover damages after the minor suffered severe symptoms from a heat stroke. The district court rejected the camp directors' immunity defenses and they appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The appeals court held that requiring the minor to perform military-style exercises was neither cruel nor unusual punishment. The court held that the parents' allegation that officials waited nearly two hours before calling an ambulance for the unconscious minor was sufficient to state a claim for deliberate indifference to serious medical needs, and that the defendants were not entitled to official immunity for gross negligence claims. The court found that the Eighth Amendment applied to the convicted minor, even though he had been free to select the date and location of his punishment and his parents could have stayed to observe the camp if they had wanted. The court noted that the minor was not free to leave the camp and was subject to jail time if he failed to comply with camp requirements. (STAR Boot Camp, Harrison County, Texas)

U.S. District Court
SEGREGATION
EXERCISE
OUT OF CELL TIME

Freeman v. Berge, 283 F.Supp.2d 1009 (W.D.Wis. 2003). An inmate challenged the conditions of his confinement. The district court granted qualified immunity to the defendants, finding that depriving an inmate of sensory stimulation or social interaction did not violate the inmate's clearly established rights. The inmate alleged he was denied access to the outdoors, was subject to 24-hour lighting and audio and video-monitoring. The court noted that agreement among mental health professionals regarding the deleterious effects of solitary confinement did not translate into legal notice that the defendants may have been violating the Eighth Amendment. (Supermax Correctional Facility, Boscobel, Wisconsin)

U.S. District Court
SMOKE

Gill v. Smith, 283 F.Supp.2d 763 (N.D.N.Y. 2003). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against a correctional officer, alleging violation of his Eighth Amendment rights by exposure to environmental tobacco smoke (ETS.) The district court held that it was clearly established that prison officials could violate the Eighth Amendment through deliberate indifference to an inmate's exposure to levels of ETS, and that genuine fact issues precluded summary judgment in favor of the officer. The inmate suffered from chronic asthma and breathing conditions, and alleged that the officer smoked while on duty in the law library, the general library, while at his assigned post, while traversing in and about the prison's media center, and while at the law library desk. The inmate allegedly repeatedly asked the officer not to smoke near him. (Auburn Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
STAFFING
SANITATION
FACILITIES

Govan v. Campbell, 289 F.Supp.2d 289 (N.D.N.Y. 2003). An inmate filed a pro se action alleging that county officials violated his Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment rights. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that the inmate's alleged conditions, consisting of unclean shower stalls with rust bubbles, cockroaches that crawled into his orifices while he slept, wild birds that were flying free through the facility, and an unsafe condition that resulted from the on-duty officer's inability to see directly into his cell at all times, did not rise to the level of a constitutional violation. The inmate also alleged that a correctional officer was sleeping while he was supposed to be supervising recreation in a gym. The court noted that the inmate did not assert how he was actually harmed by the conditions. (Albany County Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
CELLS
DOUBLE CELLING

Hurst v. Snyder, 63 Fed.Appx. 240 (7th Cir. 2003) [unpublished]. A state prison inmate brought an action against prison officials, alleging that he was deprived of adequate living space. The district court dismissed the case as frivolous and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that a former state statute that required prison facilities to provide at least 50 square feet of cell space per person did not give the inmate a protected liberty interest in having 50 square feet of cell space. The court found that the amendment of the statute, to delete the express reference to a "per person" space requirement, did not violate the ex post facto clause. (Menard Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
SEGREGATION
SANITATION
HYGIENE

Porter v. Selsky, 287 F.Supp.2d 180 (W.D.N.Y. 2003). A prisoner brought a civil rights action alleging Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment violations. The court held that officials were not deliberately indifferent to conditions that posed a substantial risk of harm to the inmate, even though the inmate was subjected to other inmates who threw feces, set fires, and flooded cells with overflowing toilets. The court noted that the officials spent a great deal of time addressing those acts, cleaning and disinfecting the cells, moving inmates behind plexiglass shields, and punishing the violators. (Special Housing Unit, Wende Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
SEGREGATION
FOOD
EXERCISE

Wilson v. Vannatta, 291 F.Supp.2d 811 (N.D.Ind. 2003). A state prison inmate brought a § 1983 action against corrections officials, seeking damages and injunctive relief. The district court held that the inmate stated claims for excessive use of force, deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs, and Eighth Amendment violations resulting from deprivation of food and exercise.

The inmate alleged that a doctor had prescribed a pain reliever, muscle relaxer, and physical therapy for his medial problems, but that a prison official canceled his treatment because the prison could not afford the cost. The inmate alleged that prison lockup unit staff deprived him of food and recreation, gave him rotten food, reduced his ration every day, and gave him trays with food missing. The inmate allegedly lost twenty-five pounds and suffered from stomach pain and headaches. (Miami Correctional Facility, Indiana)

2004

U.S. Appeals Court
CLASSIFICATION
ISOLATION
LEGAL ASSISTANCE
EXERCISE

Austin v. Wilkinson, 372 F.3d 346 (6th Cir. 2004). State inmates housed at a supermaximum security prison facility brought a class action against corrections officials under § 1983, alleging violations of their procedural due process rights. The district court ruled that officials had violated the inmates' due process right and granted injunctive relief. The court ordered the adoption of a revised version of placement regulations and the officials appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part and remanded. The appeals court held that state inmates enjoyed a due process protected liberty interest in not being placed at a supermaximum facility, but that the district court did not have the power to order state officials to modify their predicates. The appeals court upheld the procedural modifications made by the district court to the state's placement and retention policies, which included increased notice requirements and changes to the administrative appellate procedure. The court noted past erroneous and haphazard placements at the facility, and the availability of administrative segregation to ensure the state's interest in safety. The appeals court found that the proper comparison was within the state's prison system, not between other supermaximum facilities in other states. The court held that confinement at the supermaximum facility imposed an atypical and significant hardship, given the extreme isolation visited upon inmates, lack of outdoor recreation, limitations on personal property rights and access to telephone and counsel, and ineligibility for parole. (Ohio State Penitentiary, Youngstown)

U.S. District Court
CROWDING
SANITATION
MEDICAL CARE
VENTILATION

Brown v. Mitchell, 327 F.Supp.2d 615 (E.D.Va. 2004). The administratrix of the estate of a jail inmate who contracted and died from bacterial meningitis while in jail brought a civil rights action. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants in part, and denied it in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by fact issues as to whether the city had a policy or custom of jail mismanagement, and whether any policy or custom caused the inmate's death. The court also found that there were fact issues as to whether the sheriff violated the Eighth Amendment regarding jail overcrowding. The court ordered further proceedings to determine if the city council was aware of the long history of overcrowding, poor ventilation and structural defects in the jail. The court found that the sheriff did not violate the Eighth Amendment by failing to maintain sanitation in the jail, because sanitation deficiencies were caused by overcrowding, not by her failure to perform. The sheriff was also not found liable for failure to train her staff, where she had an illness-recognition and response program in place which consisted of initial and follow-up training, combined with surprise inspections. The court noted that the guards' failure to respond to the obvious illness of the inmate could be attributed to their failure to apply their training, for which the sheriff was not responsible. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by material issues of fact as to whether the jail physician showed deliberate indifference when he ordered the inmate returned to overcrowded and ill-ventilated quarters, essentially without treatment. (Richmond City Jail, Virginia)

U.S. Appeals Court
TEMPERATURE

Chandler v. Crosby, 379 F.3d 1278 (11th Cir. 2004). Death row inmates brought a class action against state prison officials, alleging that high temperatures in their prison cells during the summer months amounted to cruel and unusual punishment. The district court denied relief following a bench trial and the inmates appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the inmates failed to satisfy the objective component of their Eighth Amendment claim. The court found that the heat was not constitutionally excessive because the building mass generally remained between 80 degrees at night, and 85 to 86 degrees during the day. During the relevant period, the unit experienced temperatures over 90 degrees only nine percent of the time, recorded temperatures over 95 degrees only seven times, and never recorded temperatures over 100 degrees. The court noted that the building, although not air conditioned, had an effective ventilation system, and numerous conditions such as access to cold water, alleviated rather than exacerbated the heat. (Union Correctional Institution, Florida)

U.S. District Court
LAUNDRY

Davidson v. Conway, 318 F.Supp.2d 60 (W.D.N.Y. 2004). A prisoner moved to amend his § 1983 complaint to add additional defendants and to add two causes of action pertaining to his conditions of confinement. The district court denied the inmate's motion. The court held that even assuming that the inmate was issued one blanket, one towel, and one set of laundered bedding per week, the alleged deprivation was not sufficiently serious to constitute cruel and unusual punishment. The court noted that the Eighth Amendment does not mandate comfortable prisons. (Elmira Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
LIGHTING
HYGIENE
TEMPERATURE
LAUNDRY

Gates v. Cook, 376 F.3d 323 (5th Cir. 2004). A death row prisoner brought a suit on behalf of himself and other prisoners confined to death row, alleging that certain conditions of confinement on death row violated the Eighth Amendment's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment. The district court found that a number of conditions violated the Eighth Amendment and issued an injunction designed to alleviate the conditions. The defendants appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part and vacated in part. The court held that the prison's accreditation by a national correctional association (American Correctional Association) was not proof that the conditions of confinement did not violate the Eighth Amendment. The court noted that compliance with association standards could be a relevant consideration, but was not evidence of constitutionality. The court held that evidence supported findings that the probability of heat-related illness was extreme at the death row unit in which the class members were housed, and that corrections officials had displayed deliberate indifference. The court found that lighting in each death row cell was less than twenty foot-candles, in violation of the constitutional rights of the class members. Expert testimony was presented that lighting in the cells was grossly inadequate for the purposes of sanitation, personal hygiene and reading, and that these conditions contributed to further mental health deterioration. The court did not find a constitutional violation in the condition of the inmate laundry, which required inmates to wash their own clothes with bar soap. The court found that parts of the district court injunction that applied to sections of the death row unit that did not house class members exceeded the scope of the litigation and were invalid. The injunction directed the prison to provide fans, ice water, and daily showers when the heat index was 90 degrees or above, or to make such arrangements from May through September. The court found an Eighth Amendment violation due to mosquito infestation coupled with insufficient screen gauge, which exacerbated the heat problems by deterring death row inmates from opening their windows to increase circulation. The court noted that pest infestation problems were linked to chronic sleep deprivation, which exacerbated the symptoms of mental illness. The court found a violation due to "ping-pong" toilets, and that corrections officials were deliberately indifferent to the risk of harm that these toilets presented to death row inmates. Experts established that a serious health hazard resulted when the feces of one inmate bubbled up in the neighboring cell, and that this was exacerbated when toilets overflowed. According to the court, the State Department of Health warned corrections officials every year for the past eleven years that the malfunctioning toilets were a critical public health problem that required immediate attention. According to the court, inmates were afforded insufficient mental health care, in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The court cited the isolation and idleness, squalor, poor hygiene, temperature, and the noise of extremely psychotic prisoners, which created an environment that was "toxic" to the prisoners' mental health. (Mississippi Department of Corrections, Unit 32-C, State Penitentiary in Parchman)

U.S. Appeals Court
TEMPERATURE

Jones-El v. Berge, 374 F.3d 541 (7th Cir. 2004). Prisoners of a "supermax" prison brought a suit challenging their conditions of confinement. After the plaintiff class was certified and a preliminary injunction was entered, a consent decree was approved by the court. The prisoners subsequently moved to enforce the decree. The district court entered an order directing the installation of air conditioning and the defendants appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the district court's order was not a grant of "prospective relief" that was subject to the requirements of the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA). (Wisconsin Secure Program Facility)

U.S. Appeals Court
CELLS
SEGREGATION

Magluta v. Samples, 375 F.3d 1269 (11th Cir. 2004). A former pretrial detainee brought an action against federal officials asserting constitutional claims relating to the conditions of his confinement. The district court dismissed several defendants for lack of jurisdiction and dismissed the case against the remaining defendants for failure to state a claim. The detainee appealed. The appeals court vacated and remanded. On remand, the district court dismissed the detainee's first amended complaint and the detainee appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, vacated in part, and remanded. The appeals court held that the detainee stated a claim that he suffered unconstitutional conditions of confinement and that the defendants were not entitled to qualified immunity. The detainee alleged that he was confined under extremely harsh conditions, that he was placed in solitary confinement and locked in an extremely small closet-sized space, with minimal contact with other human beings for a prolonged time that exceeded 500 days. The detainee alleged that the harsh conditions were imposed solely for the sake of punishment. The court noted that ample federal caselaw existed at the time of the challenged conduct to give fair warning to officials that it was unconstitutional to hold a detainee in solitary confinement 500 days, for punishment, with virtually no procedural protection in the form of periodic reviews. (United States Penitentiary, Atlanta, Georgia)

U.S. District Court
TOILETS

Masonoff v. Dubois, 336 F.Supp.2d 54 (D.Mass. 2004). State inmates filed a class action under § 1983 alleging that conditions of their confinement violated their Eighth Amendment rights. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants in part, and denied it in part. The court held that the facility's superintendent and administrator were not entitled to qualified immunity because a prisoner's right to adequate and hygienic means to dispose of his bodily wastes was clearly established in 1991. The court noted that a state court had required prison officials to inspect toilets at least twice per month and issued specific directions regarding their inspection, cleaning and replacement. The officials allegedly did nothing to alleviate obvious sanitation problems associated with the cleaning and maintenance of the toilets. (Southeast Correctional Center, Massachusetts)

U.S. Appeals Court HANDICAPPED INMATES
CELLS

Miller v. King, 384 F.3d 1248 (11th Cir. 2004). A paraplegic state prisoner brought a § 1983 action alleging Eighth Amendment and Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) violations. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants on most of the claims, and following a jury trial entered judgment for a disciplinary hearing officer on the remaining claims. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part and remanded. The appeals court held that fact issues, as to whether the prisoner was afforded basic levels of humane care and hygiene, precluded summary judgment on the prisoner's § 1983 claims for monetary damages and injunctive relief under the Eighth Amendment. According to the court, the prisoner was "disabled" within the meaning of ADA and had standing to seek injunctive relief against a prison warden. The prisoner was due to remain in isolation for over eight years as the result of more than 180 disciplinary reports. Able-bodied inmates in disciplinary isolation are housed in less stringent units than the building in which the prisoner was housed. Because of the small cell size in his unit, prison policy calls for beds to be removed daily so that wheelchair-bound inmates have some minimal area within which to move around in their cells. The prisoner alleged that there was no room in his cell, making him immobile and restrained for long periods of time, and that prison staff failed to remove the bed from his cell daily. The prisoner also alleged that the showers in the housing unit are not wheelchair-accessible. (Georgia State Prison)

U.S. District Court
ASBESTOS

Pack v. Artuz, 348 F.Supp.2d 63 (S.D.N.Y. 2004). A state prisoner brought a pro se § 1983 action alleging failure to protect him from exposure to potentially dangerous levels of asbestos. The district court held that there was no evidence that the prisoner's Eighth Amendment rights were violated, absent evidence that the level of exposure posed an unreasonable risk of serious damage to his immediate or future health. According to the court, there was no evidence of either the intensity or duration of the alleged exposure in most of the cell block, and even in areas where exposure was assumed, there was no evidence as to the concentration of airborne asbestos fibers or that the inmate had an asbestos-related disease. (Green Haven Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
FAILURE TO PROVIDE CARE
ADA- Americans with Disabilities Act

Phiffer v. Columbia River Correctional Inst., 384 F.3d 791 (9th Cir. 2004). A state inmate filed an action alleging that the state's failure to accommodate his osteoarthritis and osteoporosis violated the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) and the Rehabilitation Act. After the United States Supreme Court vacated the appeals court decision, the case was remanded. On remand, the Appeals Court affirmed and remanded, finding that the state waived its Eleventh Amendment immunity under the Rehabilitation Act by accepting federal funds. (Columbia River Correctional Institution, Oregon)

U.S. Appeals Court
SHOWERS
SAFETY

Reynolds v. Powell, 370 F.3d 1028 (10th Cir. 2004). A state inmate brought a pro se § 1983 action alleging that he was subjected to cruel and unusual punishment by being exposed to a hazardous condition in the prison shower area. The district court entered summary judgment in favor of the defendants and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the alleged slippery floors resulting from a standing water problem in the prison shower area did not rise to the level of a condition that posed a substantial risk of serious harm, even though the inmate was on crutches and had warned officials that he was at a heightened risk of falling. (Uinta IV Maximum Security Facility, Utah)

U.S. District Court
JUVENILES

Smith v. Barber, 316 F.Supp.2d 992 (D.Kan. 2004). Five high school students who were arrested for plotting an armed attack on a school sued city and county officials under § 1983, alleging violations of the Fourth Amendment relating to searches and their arrest, malicious prosecution, and violations of the Eighth Amendment. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held conditions of pretrial detention in a county jail did not violate the Eighth Amendment where state law required the juveniles to be held separate from adults, the students were only held from 11 to 21 days, and they were allowed outside. The court found that the requirement that they clean their own cells did not implicate the Eighth Amendment. The court also held that a detention hearing broke the chain of causation required to support a claim for malicious prosecution. (Labette County Jail, Kansas)

U.S. District Court
USE OF FORCE

Thomas v. Ferguson, 361 F.Supp.2d 435 (D.N.J. 2004). A state prison inmate sued prison officials, alleging that officers inflicted cruel and unusual punishment on him in violation of the Eighth Amendment during an altercation. The district court held that the degree of force applied and the seriousness of the injuries were insufficient to support an Eighth Amendment claim. The extent of the officers' contact consisted of three punches and two shoves, and the inmate's injuries consisted of a broken facial pimple, swollen areas on the cheekbone, and a small laceration on the bridge of his nose. (Special Treatment Unit, Kearny, New Jersey)

U.S. District Court
SMOKE

Bartlett v. Pearson, 406 F.Supp.2d 626 (E.D.Va. 2005). A state prison inmate who was a non-smoker suffering from asthma, brought a § 1983 Eighth Amendment action against corrections officials alleging that being housed in a cell and housing unit with inmates who smoked endangered his health. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held the officials were not deliberately indifferent to the inmate's request for non-smoking housing and they were not indifferent to the inmate's asthma. The court noted that an allegation that exposure to environmental tobacco smoke (ETS) posed an unreasonable risk of serious damage to future health is cognizable under the Eighth Amendment. The prison had a policy aimed at limiting, when practicable, inmates' exposure to ETS, and they twice offered the inmate the option of residing in special or segregated housing. The inmate was moved to a non-smoking area after being housed with smokers for a total of 17 weeks, which the court found to be "not unreasonable" given the level of crowding at the prison and the fact that safety concerns took precedence over smoking preferences. (Sussex II State Prison, Virginia)

U.S. Appeals Court
VENTILATION
HYGIENE

Board v. Farnham, 394 F.3d 469 (7th Cir. 2005). Arrestees who were detained in a county jail following their arrest on murder charges brought a civil rights action against a county sheriff and jail staff following their acquittal and release from jail. The district court denied summary judgment for the defendants and they appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the sheriff was not entitled to qualified immunity on the claim that he violated a detainee's right to receive adequate attention for a serious medical condition, when he allegedly deprived one detainee of toothpaste for over three weeks and another detainee for over 113 days. One detainee suffered dental pain throughout his incarceration and had to have several teeth extracted because of tooth decay. The court denied qualified immunity for jail staff who allegedly deprived a detainee of his asthma inhaler on multiple occasions. The court also denied qualified immunity on the claim that they failed to provide humane health conditions as the result of the allegedly unhealthy condition of the jail's ventilation system. The detainees alleged that the flow of black fiberglass from the ventilation system caused nosebleeds and respiratory problems, and allegedly exacerbated the serious asthma condition of one detainee. (Edgar County Jail, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
FLOOR-SLEEPING OVERCROWDING
PRETRIAL
DETAINEES

Brookins v. Williams, 402 F.Supp.2d 508 (D.Del. 2005). A former pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against a prison warden, alleging violation of his Eighth Amendment rights. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the warden. The court held that forcing the detainee to sleep on the floor, without a mattress, next to a toilet was not punishment and therefore did not violate his due process rights, where the conditions served a legitimate governmental purpose of housing inmates in an overcrowded facility and only lasted for a period of five days. The court found that the warden was not deliberately indifferent to the serious medical needs of the detainee, where the inmate was given all of his medication within a day of being booked, except for medication which the inmate was unable to name for prison medical staff. The detainee was given tests to determine what he would need to treat his detected conditions. (Howard R. Young Correctional Institution, Delaware)

U.S. District Court
SANITATION

Brown v. Williams, 399 F.Supp.2d 558 (D.Del. 2005). A detainee brought an in forma pauperis action against prison officials alleging unconstitutional conditions of confinement. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the officials. The court held that the detainee was not exposed to unreasonably high levels of contaminated water, although water from his cell sink was allegedly discolored, and the detainee fainted shortly after he drank the water. A sample of the water was taken to a laboratory for independent testing and it met or exceeded requisite standards. (Howard R. Young Correctional Institution, Delaware)

U.S. District Court
FLOOR-SLEEPING
USE OF FORCE

Calhoun v. Thomas, 360 F.Supp.2d 1264 (M.D.Ala. 2005). A detainee brought a § 1983 action against a sheriff and deputy sheriff in their individual capacities, raising excessive force, deliberate indifference and conditions of confinement claims. The defendants moved for summary judgment, which the district court granted in part and denied in part. The court held the detainee's allegation that he was deprived of shower shoes, clean clothes and a toothbrush upon his arrival at the jail did not rise to the level of a constitutional level. The court also found no violation in the allegation that he was made to sleep on the floor as the third person in a two-person cell. The court found a potential violation in the alleged conduct of officers during his interrogation. The officers allegedly choked and beat the detainee, who was restrained and posed no threat to anyone's safety, punched him in his gunshot wound, and slammed him into a door several times telling him they wanted to make him suffer as the victim in a robbery and shooting had suffered. The court held that the officers were not entitled to qualified immunity on the excessive force claim. (Pike County Jail, Alabama)

U.S. Appeals Court HANDICAPPED INMATES
ADA- Americans with Disabilities Act

Cochran v. Pinchak, 401 F.3d 184 (3rd Cir. 2005). A blind inmate filed an action alleging that state prison officials violated his rights under Title II of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) by temporarily denying him access to talking books, a talking watch, a useable lock, and his walking cane. The district court entered summary judgment in favor of the officials and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that ADA did not validly abrogate a state's immunity from claims for monetary damages brought by inmates under Title II of ADA. According to the court, Title II conflicted with the policy of giving prison officials wide latitude to create prison policies and anticipate security problems, and the state had a rational basis for regulating the inmate's access to a walking cane, talking book, and tape player. (East Jersey State Prison, New Jersey)

U.S. Appeals Court
SANITATION
TEMPERATURE
TOILETS

Hearns v. Terhune, 413 F.3d 1036 (9th Cir. 2005). A state prison inmate brought a § 1983 action alleging violation of his Eighth Amendment rights related to an attack in prison, and inhumane conditions in a disciplinary segregation unit. The district court dismissed the action and the inmate appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The court held that the inmate's allegations stated a claim that prison officials failed to protect him from attacks by other inmates. The inmate had been beaten and stabbed in a prison chapel by inmates who belonged to another Muslim group. The inmate alleged that the officials knew that numerous Muslim inmates had been subject to attack by a ruling Muslim group in the prison chapel; the chaplain knew that the ruling Muslim group was trying to steal prayer oil from other Muslim inmates; the chaplain informed the ruling group that he had secretly delivered the oil to another inmate; and the chaplain told the ruling group that the inmate did not follow the teachings of Muhammad. The inmate alleged that an officer was not present when he was attacked even though inmates were not allowed in the chapel without supervision. The court held that the inmate's allegations stated a claim that conditions were sufficiently serious to form the basis for an Eighth Amendment violation. The inmate alleged that there was a lack of drinkable water in the prison yard, where temperatures exceeded one hundred degrees. The inmate also alleged that conditions in disciplinary segregation created serious health hazards, including toilets that did not work, sinks that were rusted, and stagnant pools of water that were infested with insects. (Calipatria State Prison, California)

U.S. Appeals Court
ISOLATION
SEGREGATION
MEDICAL CARE

Jarriett v. Wilson, 414 F.3d 634 (6th Cir. 2005). A prisoner brought a civil rights action against prison officials under the Eighth Amendment, alleging deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the prisoner only had an unrecoverable "de minimis injury" for the purposes of his civil rights claim, which was subject to the provisions of the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA). The court found that the officials' refusal to give the prisoner medical treatment was not objectively unreasonable. The prisoner had been put in a small strip cage and held there for 12 hours. He experienced swelling, pain and cramps in his legs as a result, but these injuries were not serious enough to mention to medical staff on the day of his release from the strip cage, or two days later. When he mentioned them two weeks later there were no medical findings. Prison staff had checked on the prisoner's assertions when he told them that he had a leg injury, before they placed him in the strip cage. The prisoner had been placed in the prison's segregation unit for fighting with another inmate. While in segregation, he went on a hunger strike to protest various prison conditions. His cellmate was required to eat his meal in a strip cage in the segregation unit so he would not pass any food to the prisoner during the hunger strike. The strip cage is a mesh steel cage with a small hole through which clothes or other items can be passed. When they later suspected that the prisoner was hiding food in his cell, they placed him in another strip cage next to his cellmate and ordered him to strip. (Trumbull Correctional Institution, Ohio)

U.S. Appeals Court
SMOKE

Kelley v. Hicks, 400 F.3d 1282 (11th Cir. 2005). A prisoner brought an action under § 1983 alleging that prison officials were deliberately indifferent to his future health by allowing him to be exposed to harmful levels of environmental tobacco smoke while he was incarcerated. The district court granted summary judgment for the officials and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court held that the prisoner failed to establish that the warden and assistant warden were deliberately indifferent to the prisoner's future health. The court noted that the facility had a no-smoking policy in place, and any prisoner caught smoking within the facility would be disciplined. According to the court, the prisoner failed to show that the ventilation system was not sufficient. The court found that the prisoner showed at most, that the warden and assistant warden were negligent in enforcing the non-smoking policy. (Coffee County Correctional Facility, Georgia)

U.S. District Court
LIGHTING

King v. Frank, 371 F.Supp.2d 977 (W.D.Wis. 2005). A state prison inmate brought a § 1983 action against corrections officials, alleging undue restrictions on telephone usage and access to written publications, improper cell illumination, and failure to provide adequate mental health care. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the officials. The court held that the inmate was not deprived of a basic human need by the presence of a constantly illuminated nine-watt fluorescent light in his cell, even though he alleged that the light caused him sleeplessness and other problems. The court noted that a registered nurse and a psychologist both examined the inmate and concluded that he suffered no ill effects. The court found that the mental health care that the inmate received was adequate, noting that the inmate received treatment not only from the prison's psychological services unit, but also from his unit's supervisor as well. (Waupun Correctional Institution, Wisconsin)

U.S. Appeals Court
SMOKE

Larson v. Kempker, 405 F.3d 645 (8th Cir. 2005). A state inmate brought an action under § 1983 and the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA), alleging that he was not adequately protected from exposure to second-hand cigarette smoke while he was imprisoned. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the inmate was not entitled to a preliminary injunction. The court held that there was no objective evidence that the inmate was subjected to unreasonably high levels of environmental tobacco smoke (ETS) and no scientific tests were conducted to establish the levels of ETS in his cell. (Crossroads Correctional Center, Missouri)

U.S. Appeals Court
SMOKE

Larson v. Kempker, 414 F.3d 936 (8th Cir. 2005). An inmate brought a civil rights action against prison officials alleging that he was exposed to excessive cigarette smoke while he was confined. The district court awarded summary judgment in favor of the officials and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that evidence was insufficient to establish that the inmate was exposed to unreasonable levels of environmental tobacco smoke (ETS). The court noted that the inmate's expert performed no scientific tests to establish the level of ETS in the inmate's cell, and the inmate did not present any other reliable basis to estimate levels of ETS to which he was exposed, or evidence concerning how those levels of ETS would affect his future health. (Crossroads Correctional Center, Missouri)

U.S. District Court
IDLENESS
SAFETY

Little v. Shelby County, Tenn., 384 F.Supp.2d 1169 (W.D.Tenn. 2005). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against a county and sheriff, alleging that he had been raped in jail in violation of his Eighth Amendment rights. The county stipulated to liability and an order of injunctive relief was issued. Later, the district court found the county in contempt, and the county sought to purge itself of the contempt finding. The court entered a purgation order. The court held that the county and sheriff complied with the Eighth Amendment and purged themselves of contempt through the adoption of a structured reform to correct conditions that included violence, rape and gang control among inmates. In reaching its conclusion, the court considered whether officials took all reasonable steps within their power to comply with the order, which included whether they marshaled their own resources, asserted their highest authority, and demanded the results needed from subordinate persons and agencies in order to effectuate the course of action required by the order. The court praised the county, noting that it had adopted a focused, systemic and information-driven structural reform based on critical expert assessment of essential institutional functions. The county adopted a 14-point remedial scheme that included implementing direct supervision management of inmate cellblocks, improving population management, collecting and utilizing data, and installing an objective inmate classification system. (Shelby County Jail, Tennessee)

U.S. District Court
SAFETY

Littlejohn v. Moody, 381 F.Supp.2d 507 (E.D.Va. 2005). A federal prisoner brought a pro se action against prison officials, seeking injunctive relief and monetary damages. The inmate alleged violation of his constitutional rights when he was shocked by an electrical surge because a buffing machine that he was using did not have a ground-prong in its plug. The district court granted the defendants' motion to dismiss. The court held that one official did not know of a substantial risk of harm at the time the prisoner was shocked because he had sent the buffer to be repaired when it had shocked prisoners in the past, and he reasonably assumed that the machine was safe when it returned. Although the court found that allegations supported a deliberate indifference claim against a prison safety manager and electrical shop foreman, the court granted them qualified immunity because the right to be protected from a significant risk of injury was not clearly established at the time of the incident. (Federal Bureau of Prisons, Virginia)

U.S. District Court
TEMPERATURE
VENTILATION

Moody v. Kearney, 380 F.Supp.2d 393 (D.Del. 2005). A state inmate filed a § 1983 action alleging that prison officials locked him in an unventilated room, causing him to suffer a severely debilitating heat stroke. The district court dismissed the case and the inmate appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. On remand, the district court granted summary judgment for the defendants in part, and denied it in part. The court held that the inmate stated a claim for deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs and that fact issues remained as to whether a private contractor that provided medical services for the prison had a policy of not protecting vulnerable inmates from high temperatures. The inmate alleged that he was receiving anticholinergic medication and was therefore particularly vulnerable to heat stroke, and that prison officials knew about this vulnerability but acted with deliberate indifference by keeping him in a room with no windows, no ventilation, or access to running water when the temperature inside the facility was 120 degrees. (State Correctional Institution, Georgetown, Delaware)

- U.S. Appeals Court
SMOKE
- Patel v. Fleming*, 415 F.3d 1105 (10th Cir. 2005). A pro se prisoner brought a § 1983 action against prison officials, challenging his conditions of incarceration at two federal correctional facilities. The district court dismissed the action and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the prisoner failed to meet the exhaustion requirements of the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA). The prisoner alleged that his Eighth Amendment rights were violated by his forced exposure to secondhand smoke. (Federal Correctional Institute, El Reno, and Federal Transfer Center, Oklahoma)
- U.S. District Court
ISOLATION
LIGHTING
- Scarver v. Litscher*, 371 F.Supp.2d 986 (W.D.Wis. 2005). A state prison inmate sued officials seeking damages for their alleged indifference to his illness and challenging his conditions of confinement. The district court entered judgment in favor of the officials. The court held that the officials did not show deliberate indifference to the inmate's mental illness condition, because he was examined and prescribed various antipsychotic medications. The inmate alleged that the only deficiency in his treatment was that officials failed to provide art supplies when they were requested. The court found that there were fact issues as to whether the inmate was subjected to conditions that were severe enough to violate the Eighth Amendment, but that the officials had qualified immunity from the inmate's damages suit. The court held that placing the mentally ill inmate in a continuously-illuminated maximum security cell without windows was not clearly established to be an Eighth Amendment violation at the time they placed the inmate in the most extreme isolation section of the maximum security prison. (Wisconsin Secure Program Facility)
- U.S. Appeals Court
HYGIENE
SANITATION
SEGREGATION
TOILETS
- Surprenant v. Rivas*, 424 F.3d 5 (1st Cir. 2005). A pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against a county jail and jail personnel, alleging that he was falsely accused of an infraction, deprived of due process in disciplinary proceedings, and subjected to unconstitutional conditions of confinement. A jury found the defendants liable on three counts and the district court denied judgment as a matter of law for the defendants. The defendants appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held conditions of confinement were shown to be constitutionally deficient, where the detainee was placed in around-the-clock segregation with the exception of a five-minute shower break every third day, all hygiene items were withheld from him, he could only access water--including water to flush his toilet--at the discretion of individual officers, and was subjected daily to multiple strip searches that required him to place his unwashed hands into his mouth. (Hillsborough County Jail, New Hampshire)
- U.S. Appeals Court
SMOKE
VENTILATION
- Talal v. White*, 403 F.3d 423 (6th Cir. 2005). An inmate brought an action against a state corrections department and individual officials alleging that his exposure to environmental tobacco smoke (ETS) violated his Eighth Amendment rights. The district court dismissed the claim and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The court held that the prisoner stated a claim that satisfied the objective component of the test for determining deliberate indifference based on exposure to ETS, by alleging that he had been subjected to excessive levels of ETS at the hands of both staff and other inmates and that the prison's ventilation system merely re-circulated smoke-filled air. The inmate provided medical documentation that he suffered from an ETS allergy and establishing that smoke caused him sinus problems and dizziness. The inmate's complaint and exhibits indicated that prison officials were aware of the inmate's ETS allergy and that they smoked and allowed prisoners to smoke in the prison's non-smoking units. (Turney Center Industrial Center, Tennessee)
- U.S. Appeals Court
EXERCISE
MATTRESS
- Thornton v. Snyder*, 428 F.3d 690 (7th Cir. 2005). A state prison inmate brought a § 1983 action against corrections officials, alleging cruel and unusual punishment and seeking money damages. The district court granted summary judgment for the officials on a claim alleging intolerable cell conditions in which the inmate complained of the poor condition of his mattress. The court entered judgment on jury verdict for the officials on a second claim concerning yard exercise privileges. The inmate had alleged that officials denied him the privilege of yard exercise for 7½ months. The inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part and reversed in part. (Pontiac Correctional Center, Illinois)
- U.S. District Court LIGHTS
LIGHTING
- Wills v. Terhune*, 404 F.Supp.2d 1226 (E.D.Cal. 2005). A state prison inmate brought a § 1983 action alleging that constant illumination in the prison's security housing unit constituted cruel and unusual punishment. The inmate moved for a preliminary injunction. The court denied the motion. The court held that the constant illumination did not constitute an unsafe condition of confinement and that the defendants established a valid security purpose for the lighting. The inmate alleged that the low wattage bulb prevented his sleep, but conceded that it was not bright enough to read or write by. (California State Prison, Corcoran)

2006

- U.S. District Court
SMOKE
- Abdullah v. Washington*, 437 F.Supp.2d 137 (D.D.C. 2006). An inmate brought a pro se civil rights action under § 1983 against the District of Columbia and certain jail officials, in their individual and official capacities, seeking damages related to his alleged exposure to second-hand tobacco smoke while confined at a jail. The district court granted the officials' motion to dismiss in part, and denied in part. The court held that the inmate's allegations that he was subjected to an intolerable level of second-hand tobacco smoke while confined at the jail, and that jail officials were deliberately indifferent to his condition because they did not resolve the numerous grievances he filed on the issue, were sufficient to support an Eighth Amendment claim based on exposure to environmental tobacco smoke (ETS). The court found that the inmate's Eighth Amendment right to be free from levels of second-hand smoke that posed an unreasonable risk of serious damage to the inmate's future health was clearly established, and thus, the officials were not entitled to qualified immunity. (Dist. of Columbia Dept. Corrections, Central Det. Facility)

U.S. District Court
HEARING IMPAIRED

Arce v. O'Connell, 427 F.Supp.2d 435 (S.D.N.Y. 2006). A purportedly hearing-impaired inmate brought a pro se suit against employees of a corrections department, alleging that they violated his rights under the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), as well as the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments, by failing to provide reasonable accommodations for his hearing impairment and retaliating against him after he filed grievances regarding the lack of such accommodations. The defendants moved for summary judgment and the court dismissed the case. The district court held that the inmate was not a member of the class protected by a consent decree addressing the treatment of deaf or hard-of-hearing inmates and thus, he lacked standing to move for contempt alleging violations of the decree. The court found that to the extent the inmate suffered from a hearing loss, it was not such as would prevent him from participating fully in "activities, privileges, or programs" as required for him to come within the protections of the consent decree. (New York State Department of Correctional Services)

U.S. District Court
SMOKE

Bacon v. Taylor, 414 F.Supp.2d 475 (D.Del. 2006). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against three correctional officers, alleging denial of his First Amendment right of access to courts, retaliation for exercising his First Amendment free speech rights, and cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants in part, and denied it in part. The court held that the prisoner's allegations that a correctional officer, on one occasion, smoked a cigarette on the tier by another inmate's cell and blew smoke into that inmate's cell, and that on several occasions the correctional officer smoked in the isolated control pod, did not sufficiently allege that the prisoner was exposed to unreasonably high levels of environmental tobacco smoke (ETS) to the degree necessary to state claim a under § 1983 for violation of the Eighth Amendment. (Howard R. Young Correctional Institution, Delaware)

U.S. District Court
HEARING IMPAIRED

Duquin v. Dean, 423 F.Supp.2d 411 (S.D.N.Y. 2006). A deaf inmate filed an action alleging that prison officials violated his rights under the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), Rehabilitation Act, and a consent decree by failing to provide qualified sign language interpreters, effective visual fire alarms, use of closed-captioned television sets, and access to text telephones (TTY). Officials moved for summary judgment, which the district court granted in their favor. The court held that the officials at the high-security facility complied with the provision of a consent decree requiring them to provide visual fire alarms for hearing-impaired inmates, even if the facility was not always equipped with visual alarms, where corrections officers were responsible for unlocking each cell door and ensuring that inmates evacuate in emergency situations. The court held that the deputy supervisor for programs at the facility was not subject to civil contempt for her failure to fully comply with the provision of consent decree requiring the facility to provide access to text telephones (TTY) for hearing-impaired inmates in a manner equivalent to hearing inmates' access to telephone service, even though certain areas within the facility provided only limited access to TTY, and other areas lacked TTY altogether. The court noted that the deputy warden made diligent efforts to comply with the decree, prison staff responded to the inmate's complaints with temporary accommodations and permanent improvements, and repairs to broken equipment were made promptly. The court found that the denial of the inmate's request to purchase a thirteen-inch color television for his cell did not subject the deputy supervisor for programs to civil contempt for failing to fully comply with the provision of a consent decree requiring the facility to provide closed-captioned television for hearing-impaired inmates, despite the inmate's contention that a closed-caption decoder would not work on commissary televisions. The court noted that the facility policy barred color televisions in cells and that suppliers confirmed that there was no technological barrier to installing decoders in televisions available from the commissary. (Wende Correct'l Facility, N.Y.)

U.S. District Court
HEARING IMPAIRED

Figueroa v. Dean, 425 F.Supp.2d 448 (S.D.N.Y. 2006). A state prisoner who was born deaf brought an action against a superintendent of programs at a prison, alleging failure to provide interpreters, visual fire alarms, access to text telephone, and a television with closed-captioned device in contempt of a consent order in class action in which the court entered a decree awarding declaratory relief to prohibit disability discrimination against hearing impaired prisoners by state prison officials. The superintendent moved for summary judgment and the district court granted the motion. The court held that the exhaustion requirement of Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) did not apply to an action seeking exclusively to enforce a consent order. The court found that the superintendent was not in contempt of the consent order, noting that sign language interpreters were provided at educational and vocational programs and at medical and counseling appointments for hearing-impaired inmates as required by consent decree, the prison was equipped with visual fire alarms that met the requirements of the decree, and diligent efforts were being made to comply with the consent decree regarding access to text telephones. (Wende Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEGREGATION
EXERCISE

Fogle v. Pierson, 435 F.3d 1252 (10th Cir. 2006). A state prisoner brought a civil rights action against state prison officials. The district court dismissed the action and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The court held that the district court abused its discretion when it found that the inmate's three-year period of administrative segregation, during which time the prisoner was confined to his cell for all but five hours each week and denied access to any outdoor exercise, was not "atypical" in violation of the prisoner's due process rights. The inmate had escaped from a county jail when he was a pretrial detainee by posing as a visitor and simply walking out of the facility. Although he was quickly apprehended, the incident caused embarrassing media coverage for state prison officials. (Limon Correctional Facility, Colorado)

U.S. Appeals Court
FOOD

Freeman v. Berge, 441 F.3d 543 (7th Cir. 2006). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against prison officials, alleging cruel and unusual punishment. After a jury returned a verdict in favor of the inmate, the district court granted judgment as a matter of law for the defendants, and the inmate appealed. The court of appeals affirmed. The court held that the prison's feeding rule requiring that, when meals were delivered to an inmate's cell, the inmate had to be wearing trousers or gym shorts, was a reasonable condition to the receipt of food in light of security issues and respect for female security officers' privacy. The court found that prison officials' withholding of food from the inmate when he refused to put on trousers or shorts did not constitute the use of food deprivation as punishment, for the purposes of the Eighth Amendment prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment. The court found that prison officials' withholding of food from the inmate when he wore a sock on his head when meals were delivered to his cell was a reasonable condition to the receipt of the food, in light of security issues presented by the possibility that a sock could be used as a weapon if something was inside it. According to the court, withholding of food from the inmate when he refused to remove the sock from his head did not constitute the use of food deprivation as punishment. Inmates in the Supermax are fed their three meals a day in their cells. The prison's feeding rule requires that the prisoner stand in the middle of his cell, with the lights on, when the meal is delivered and that he be wearing trousers or gym shorts. If the inmate does not comply with the rule, the meal is not served to him. The inmate wanted to eat in his underwear, so on a number of occasions over a two-and-a-half-year period he refused to put on pants or gym shorts and as a result was not served. Because he skipped so many meals he lost 45 pounds. (Wisconsin Maximum Security Facility, "Supermax")

U.S. District Court
SMOKE

George v. Smith, 467 F.Supp.2d 906 (W.D.Wis. 2006). A state prisoner sued prison officials under § 1983, alleging deprivation of his free speech rights and deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs. The officials moved for summary judgment and the district court granted the motion in part and stayed in part. The court held that: (1) the officials' ban on the prisoner's receipt of a newsletter on the ground that the newsletter solicited gifts did not violate the prisoner's free speech rights; (2) a prohibition against the prisoner possessing an atlas did not violate his free speech rights; (3) the officials did not violate the prisoner's speech rights in concluding that a magazine advocated behavior consistent with a gang and thus was prohibited by regulation; and (4) the prisoner was not exposed to unreasonably high levels of environmental tobacco smoke. The court found that the prisoner was not exposed to unreasonable levels of environmental tobacco smoke, where the only smoking allowed in the prison was outdoors, and he was not required to stand or sit next to staff or inmates while they were smoking outdoors. The court noted that medical records revealed that the prisoner was seen for complaints relating to asthma only four times in three years, and that he did not claim second-hand smoke was a potential cause of the first three flare-ups. (Oshkosh Correctional Institution, Wisconsin)

U.S. Appeals Court
CLOTHING
FLOOR-SLEEPING
TOTALITY OF CONDITIONS
ISOLATION

Gillis v. Litscher, 468 F.3d 488 (7th Cir. 2006). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 claim against prison officials, alleging that a behavioral modification program imposed on him violated his Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment rights. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the officials and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court vacated and remanded, finding that fact issues precluded summary judgment. According to the court, there were fact issues as to whether the prisoner, who was subjected to a behavioral modification program, was denied the minimal civilized measure of life's necessities and whether prison officials acted with disregard of a substantial risk of serious harm to the prisoner. The appeals court opinion opened with the following statement. "Stripped naked in a small prison cell with nothing except a toilet; forced to sleep on a concrete floor or slab; denied any human contact; fed nothing but 'nutri-loaf'; and given just a modicum of toilet paper-four squares-only a few times. Although this might sound like a stay at a Soviet gulag in the 1930s, it is, according to the claims in this case, Wisconsin in 2002. Whether these conditions are, as a matter of law, only "uncomfortable, but not unconstitutional" as the State contends, is the issue we consider in this case." The facility is an all-segregation facility, designed to house recalcitrant inmates. At the time at issue in this case, the facility used a five-level system of inmate classification, with Level One being the most restrictive. All inmates were placed in Level One upon their arrival at the prison. (Wisconsin Secure Program Facility at Boscobel)

U.S. District Court
FLOOR-SLEEPING
CROWDING
MEDICAL CARE

Hubbard v. Taylor, 452 F.Supp.2d 533 (D.Del. 2006). Pretrial detainees filed suit under § 1983, challenging conditions of their confinement on Fourteenth Amendment due process grounds, and a prisoner imprisoned at the same facility asserted a claim under the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA). The district court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment and plaintiffs appealed. The appeals court vacated and remanded. On remand, the district court granted summary judgment for the defendants. The court held that requiring the pretrial detainees to sleep on a mattress on the floor of their cells for a period of three to seven months did not violate the detainees' Fourteenth Amendment due process rights, because providing sleeping accommodations on the floor was in response to overcrowding at the facility and was not intended to punish. The court noted that even if the pretrial detainees' constitutional rights were violated by requiring them to sleep on mattresses on the floor, the law was not sufficiently clear so that a reasonable official would understand that what he was doing violated a constitutional right, entitling the officials to qualified immunity. (Multi-Purpose Criminal Justice Facility, Delaware)

U.S. District Court
SHOWERS
SANITATION
HYGIENE

J.P. v. Taft, 439 F.Supp.2d 793 (S.D. Ohio 2006). A former juvenile corrections facility inmate sued the facility and individuals, claiming the lack of access to courts to pursue a claim of injury from being assaulted by an officer, and claims of substandard accommodations. The district court denied the defendants' motion for summary judgment. The court held that the inmate had standing to bring a claim that the facility interfered with his access to courts by not making adequate efforts to provide attorneys, and that the inmate stated a claim that the facility interfered with his right of access to court, by not providing an attorney to pursue a legitimate claim that officers unconstitutionally restricted his bathroom privileges.

According to the court, the inmate did not state a claim that conditions of confinement violated his rights under the Eighth Amendment when he alleged that showers were cold, worms were coming in through a drain, and his personal hygiene materials had been lost during a move from one cell to another. The court found that these problems were insufficiently serious.

The court held that the inmate stated claim that conditions of confinement violated his rights under Eighth Amendment, when he alleged that officers frequently denied inmates the opportunity to use a rest room, as a disciplinary measure, forcing them to urinate into objects including latex gloves. (Ohio Dept. of Youth Services, Marion Juvenile Correctional Facility)

U.S. District Court
DOUBLE CELLING
CELL CAPACITY
ODORS
OVERCROWDING
SANITATION
SMOKE

Jones v. Goord, 435 F.Supp.2d 221 (S.D.N.Y. 2006). Inmates brought an action against New York prison officials, challenging the double-celling policy at maximum-security prisons. Double-celling is a practice in which two prisoners are housed in a cell originally designed for one person. The complaint was filed in 1995, and was effectively stayed for some time pending litigation of a companion case challenging the same practice in medium security prisons. After a full trial on the merits, the district court in the medium security case denied the plaintiffs any relief.

The district court dismissed all of the inmates' class claims, but reserved decisions on individual plaintiffs' claims for damages under the Eighth Amendment and the First Amendment. The court held that the practice of double-celling, and the undesirable conditions allegedly created by double-celling of inmates, including facts that inmates were forced to sleep near a toilet, were exposed to cellmates' odors, and kept excess personal property in their cells, did not violate the Eighth Amendment.

The court found that Muslim inmates' claim that double-celling interfered with their First Amendment right to free exercise of religion was not moot after they were no longer being double-celled, where many of the inmates were double-celled on numerous occasions for short periods of time, and the policy of double-celling inmates continued. The defendant's voluntary cessation of a challenged practice does not deprive a federal court of its power to determine the legality of the practice. According to the court, even assuming that the policy of double-celling some inmates in New York's maximum-security prisons burdened religious practices of Muslim inmates by making it difficult for them to pray in their cells. According to the court, the policy was rationally related to the legitimate goal of finding sufficient bed space to house all maximum security inmates, and thus did not violate the inmates' right to free exercise of religion. The court ruled that the inmates were not entitled to amend their complaint to add a claim under the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA).

The court noted that the Eighth Amendment does not guarantee prisoners freedom from any and all sorts of unsavory environs, and that to the extent that conditions are restrictive and even harsh, they are part of the penalty that criminal offenders pay for their offenses against society.

According to the court, the practice of double-celling inmates did not result in a substantial risk of serious harm to inmates due to violence, in violation of the Eighth Amendment, where incident reports indicated that six years after the implementation of the double-celling policy, inmates generally faced a lower risk of assault than they did before the policy was implemented, and there was no evidence that any under-reporting of assaults affected the reporting of incidents in double cells more than the reporting of incidents generally.

The court also found that injury and disease allegedly caused by double-celling did not create an unreasonable risk of serious damage to inmates' health, in violation of the Eighth Amendment, noting that although nine inmates had been injured getting into or out of the top bunk in their cells, and six inmates caught colds from their cellmates, there was no evidence that the design or placement of the bunks was unsafe, or that any inmate actually contracted, or was even exposed to, a serious disease from his cellmate in a double cell.

The court held that alleged mistakes made by New York prison officials in screening dangerous inmates before placing them in double cells in maximum security prisons did not show that New York's double-celling policy subjected inmates to a substantial risk of serious harm, in violation of the Eighth Amendment, where the rate of inmate assaults had declined in the six years after the double-celling policy was implemented.

The court ruled that alleged exposure to excessive levels of secondhand smoke in double cells did not create an unreasonable risk of serious damage to inmates' future health, in violation of the Eighth Amendment, where the state had banned smoking in all its prison facilities, and there was no evidence that inmates in double cells were exposed to unreasonably high levels of secondhand smoke after that policy was adopted. (New York Dept. of Correctional Services)

U.S. District Court
SANITATION

Keel v. Dovey, 459 F.Supp.2d 946 (C.D.Cal. 2006). A state inmate filed a § 1983 action alleging that prison officials violated her civil rights by placing her in administrative segregation pending the investigation of a disciplinary charge against her, and by conducting a disciplinary hearing that violated her procedural due process rights. Officials moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The court held that: (1) the inmate did not have a due process liberty interest in remaining free from administrative segregation prior to a disciplinary hearing; (2) the use of confidential information in a disciplinary hearing did not violate the inmate's right to procedural due process; and (3) the inmate was not denied due process as the result of the officials' refusal to permit her to listen to and read intercepted inmate phone calls. The court noted that the administrative segregation the inmate endured pending disciplinary investigation was not an atypical and significant hardship in relation to the ordinary incidents of prison life. According to the court, even if her cell was unsanitary, birds and mice were present in inmate cells, and she lost her prison job and her ability to participate in religious ceremonies, the inmate did not suffer forfeiture of time credits, she had non-contact visits of one hour in length, and there was no evidence regarding conditions of cells outside of administrative segregation. (California Institution for Women, Chino)

U.S. Appeals Court
PRETRIAL
DETAINEES
FOOD
RESTRAINTS

Lopez v. City of Chicago, 464 F.3d 711 (7th Cir. 2006). An arrestee brought an action against a city and city police officers, alleging the duration and conditions of his detention violated his Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment rights, and asserting a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The district court entered judgment as matter of law in favor of the defendants. The arrestee appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The court found that the arrestee's conditions of confinement civil rights claim for the five-day period between his arrest and his preliminary probable cause hearing was required to be analyzed under the Fourth Amendment, using the "objectively unreasonable" standard, rather than under the Eighth Amendment's "deliberate indifference" standard. The court held that the question was for the jury. The arrestee presented evidence that he was shackled to the wall of an interrogation room for four days, that he was deprived of food, drink, and sleep, and that he was forced to yell for a long period of time before being let out to use the bathroom, and that the defendant officers denied such treatment. The arrestee had been arrested for a murder he did not commit. Following his arrest, the defendants-- all police detectives-- kept him shackled to the wall of a windowless, nine-by-seven-foot interrogation room for four days and nights while they investigated the case. The arrestee had nowhere to sleep but a four-foot-by-ten-inch metal bench or the dirty brick floor. The interrogation room had no toilet or sink; he had to "scream" for the detectives to let him out to use a bathroom. He was given only one bologna sandwich and one serving of juice as food and drink during the entire four days and nights that he was kept in the interrogation room. The detectives questioned him from time to time and made him stand in two lineups. After two-and-a-half days in these conditions, the arrestee started to become disoriented and began hearing voices telling him to confess. He ultimately gave a statement containing a false confession that did not match the details of the crime. On the fifth day of his detention, the arrestee was moved to a city lockup, charged, and finally taken to court. The following day, the police investigation led detectives to another individual who confessed to the murder. The arrestee was released the next day. (Chicago Police Department's Area 5, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
MATTRESS
SEGREGATION

McGoldrick V. Farrington, 462 F.Supp.2d 112 (D.Me. 2006). An inmate brought a civil rights action against state prison officials alleging cruel and unusual punishment and violation of due process. The defendants filed a motion to dismiss. The court held that the prisoner failed to allege any physical injury, and was not deprived of due process. According to the court, the inmate's loss of mattress privileges while housed in the Special Management Unit failed to allege any physical injury that resulted from the removal of his mattress, as required to bring a civil rights action for mental or emotional injury suffered while in custody. (Maine State Prison)

U.S. District Court
TEMPERATURE
SANITATION
VENTILATION

Murray v. Edwards County Sheriff's Dept., 453 F.Supp.2d 1280 (D.Kan. 2006). A former pretrial detainee at a county jail brought a § 1983 action against a county sheriff's department, sheriff, undersheriff, and county attorney, alleging various constitutional violations. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that the inmate's alleged weight loss while he was a pretrial detainee at the county jail did not satisfy the section of the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) requiring a showing of physical injury in addition to mental or emotional injury in order to obtain compensatory damages. The court noted that the inmate's alleged weight loss was contrary to the uncontroverted facts, where the inmate did not allege that he was not fed while at jail but that he was not allowed to exercise out of his cell, and it was not clear how a lack of exercise would have caused weight loss.

The court found that the lack of outdoor exercise for the pretrial detainee at a small county jail did not violate due process, where the cells were large, the detainee did a wide variety of inside exercises during his stay at jail, and no physical deterioration occurred due to failure to obtain outdoor exercise.

The court held that alleged inadequate temperature-control and ventilation, the presence of insects, and a lack of cleaning at the county jail did not violate the due process rights of pretrial detainee, where jail cells were heated and cooled by air conditioning that was on the same ventilation system as the rest of the courthouse in which the jail was located, detainees had the ability to open cell windows and had fans to use in the Summer, detainees were allowed additional blankets in Winter, the jail and courthouse were treated for insects on a monthly basis, and cleaning materials were provided to detainees to use in their cells. (Edwards County Jail, Kansas)

U.S. District Court HANDICAPPED INMATES
SHOWERS

Partelow v. Massachusetts, 442 F.Supp.2d 41 (D.Mass. 2006). A state prisoner whose leg had been amputated brought an action against numerous defendants, including a county correctional center and sheriff, alleging that failure to provide him with handicapped-accessible shower facilities during the renovation of his housing unit violated his federal and state civil rights. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that the officials provided alternative accessible facilities, precluding claims under the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) and the Rehabilitation Act. The court noted that officials provided the prisoner with a chair for use in the standard shower, assigned him to a housing unit with handicapped-accessible showers, promptly transferred him back to his original unit at his request, and ultimately made arrangements for him to shower in the medical unit. The court held that the prisoner could not establish an Eighth Amendment claim, where officials allowed the prisoner to shower in medical unit and made other such accommodations imposing only minor impediments and delays. (Hampden County Correctional Center, Massachusetts)

U.S. District Court
CELL CAPACITY
CROWDING
FLOOR-SLEEPING
SANITATION
TEMPERATURE

Poole v. Taylor, 466 F.Supp.2d 578 (D.Del. 2006). A former pretrial detainee filed a § 1983 action alleging unconstitutional conditions of confinement, and that he was denied adequate medical care. The district court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment. The court held that the detainee's due process rights were not violated when he was required to sleep on a mattress on the floor for over six months in an overcrowded facility that experienced sporadic hot and cold temperatures and insect and rodent infestations. The court noted that the officials had issued numerous work orders for temperature repairs and pest control, the detainee was not denied access to toilet facilities, the officials determined that triple-celling pretrial detainees was a method to deal with their overcrowded facilities, and there was no evidence of intention on the officials' part to punish the detainee. The court found that officials were not deliberately indifferent to the detainee's serious medical needs, in violation of the Due Process Clause, even though he was not hospitalized or sent to a plastic surgeon after he sustained a large cut over his right eye. The court noted that the detainee's treatment included sutures, bandaging of his wound, and administration of medication, as well as a follow-up visit. The detainee was given instructions to contact the medical department for any perceived problems with the wound, and the detainee did not seek additional treatment. (Multi-Purpose Crim. Justice Facility, Delaware)

U.S. Appeals Court
LIGHTING
NOISE
SEGREGATION

Scarver v. Litscher, 434 F.3d 972 (7th Cir. 2006). A state prisoner brought a civil rights action against officials at a "supermax" prison, alleging that his conditions of confinement had aggravated his mental illness. The district court granted summary judgment for the officials and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the officials did not unconstitutionally subject the prisoner to cruel and unusual punishment, absent evidence that they knew that the conditions were making his mental illness worse. According to the court, prison authorities must be given considerable latitude in the design of measures for controlling homicidal maniacs without exacerbating their manias beyond what is necessary for security. The prisoner alleged that the heat in the cells in the Summer interacted with the his antipsychotic drugs and caused him extreme discomfort, and that the constant illumination of the cells also disturbs psychotics. The prisoner alleged that the low level of noise, without audiotapes, a radio, or any source of sound, prevented him from stilling the voices in his head. (Wisconsin Secure Pr

U.S. Appeals Court TEMPERATURE	Spencer v. Bouchard , 449 F.3d 721 (6th Cir. 2006). A former pretrial detainee brought a pro se § 1983 action against a county sheriff and officials of the sheriff's office, alleging overcrowding and inadequate shelter at the jail in violation of Due Process Clause. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants, and detainee appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, vacated in part, and remanded. The court held that the detainee's evidence that county officials had failed to address serious and obvious problems with conditions, namely a continuously cold and wet cell area, for a period of months, especially given additional evidence including officials' alleged wearing of winter coats inside jail, raised a fact issue as to whether officials had been deliberately indifferent to a serious deprivation, precluding summary judgment for the officials. (Oakland County Jail, Michigan)
U.S. District Court CRIPA- Civil Rights of Institutionalized Persons Act PRETRIAL DETAINEES FIRE SAFETY CONDITIONS	U.S. v. Terrell County, Ga. , 457 F.Supp.2d 1359 (M.D.Ga. 2006). The federal government brought a Civil Rights of Institutionalized Persons Act (CRIPA) action against a county, county sheriff, and various other county officials, seeking a determination that county jail conditions were grossly deficient in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. The district court granted the government's motion for summary judgment. The court held that the sheriff and other officials were deliberately indifferent to the jail's gross deficiencies in the areas of medical and mental health care for inmates, protection of inmates from harm, environmental health and safety of inmates, and fire safety, in violation of the due process clause. The court noted that the lack of funds is not a defense to, nor legal justification for, unconstitutional conditions of a jail, for the purpose of analyzing a deliberate indifference claim under the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Even if a defendant argues that it is planning or working towards construction of a new jail to remedy the unconstitutional conditions at the current facility, the failure to implement interim measures to alleviate those conditions demonstrates deliberate indifference, according to the court. (Terrell County, Georgia)
U.S. District Court LIGHTING EQUAL PROTECTION	Walker v. Woodford , 454 F.Supp.2d 1007 (S.D.Cal. 2006). State inmates filed a § 1983 action alleging that prison officials violated their Eighth Amendment rights by refusing to turn off lights in their cells. The inmates alleged that the light prevented them from sleeping adequately, and that this has caused a variety of sleep-related problems. The district court ruled that the state prison's policy prohibiting inmates from covering lights in their cells did not violate the inmates' equal protection rights, even though the policy did not apply in other facilities in the state, absent an allegation that prison officials implemented the policy with the intent to discriminate against inmates, that other inmates at the facility were treated differently, or that inmates at other facilities were similarly situated. (Calipatria State Prison, California)
U.S. District Court SANITATION TEMPERATURE	White v. Crow Ghost , 456 F.Supp.2d 1096 (D.N.D. 2006). An arrestee brought a Bivens action against personnel of a jail operated by the Bureau of Indian Affairs (BIA), alleging failure to provide adequate medical care, unsanitary conditions, and delayed or prevented bond hearings. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants. The court held that jail officials were not deliberately indifferent to the arrestee's medical needs, in violation of his Eighth Amendment rights, where officials provided the arrestee with medical care promptly after learning of his suicide gestures or attempts, and again upon learning he might have an infection. The court noted that when the arrestee's need for medication was established, officials ensured that the medications were administered. The court found that the officials were not deliberately indifferent to any risk of harm to arrestee from his placement in two different, allegedly cold and unsanitary jail cells for a total of four days, and thus such placement did not rise to the level of an Eighth Amendment violation. The court noted that the arrestee was placed in those cells after his suicide gestures or attempts so that he could be monitored, his clothing and bedding was removed for his protection after he tried to hang himself, and cleaning supplies were withheld to protect him. (Standing Rock Agency, Fort Yates Detention Center, North Dakota)
U.S. District Court SMOKE	Williams v. District of Columbia , 439 F.Supp.2d 34 (D.D.C. 2006). A former inmate filed a pro se § 1983 action seeking damages for alleged exposure to second-hand tobacco smoke while he was confined in jail. The district court denied the defendants' motion for summary judgment. The court held that the former inmate's allegations that while he was in jail he was subjected to an intolerable level of environmental tobacco smoke (ETS), that such exposure caused health problems at the time he was confined and posed a risk to his future health, and that the individual defendants were deliberately indifferent to his condition, if true, were sufficient to establish an Eighth Amendment violation. The court found that genuine issues of fact existed, precluding summary judgment. The inmate alleged that inmates and staff in his housing unit smoked tobacco, the unit did not have adequate ventilation or windows or doors that could be opened to remove the tobacco smoke, and his cellmate smoked five packs of cigarettes a day and kept a homemade toilet paper wick burning at all times for the purpose of lighting cigarettes. The inmate said that he experienced nausea and nosebleeds, and he filed a number of grievances. (District of Columbia Department of Corrections, Central Detention Facility)
2007
U.S. District Court CROWDING SANITATION TEMPERATURE	Banks v. York , 515 F.Supp.2d 89 (D.D.C. 2007). A detainee in a jail operated by the District of Columbia Department of Corrections (DOC), and in a correctional treatment facility operated by the District's private contractor, brought a § 1983 action against District employees and contractor's employees alleging negligent supervision under District of Columbia law, over-detention, deliberate indifference to serious medical needs, harsh living conditions in jail, and extradition to Virginia without a hearing. The district court granted the defendants' motion to dismiss in part and denied in part. The court held that dismissal of the detainee's § 1983 claims of cruel and unusual punishment at the District of Columbia jail based on lack of reading material, lack of recreational equipment, failure of the commissary to stock items such as lotions, skin oils, hair oils, and peanut butter, the detainee's exposure to the stench created by regular sewage backups, as well as the jail's use of bunk beds without ladders as required under the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) because the detainee did not allege that he suffered any physical injury. Instead, the detainee alleged mental and emotional injuries. According to the court, the alleged conditions from overcrowding at a District of Columbia jail-- showers infested with bacteria, standing water, various diseases and hundreds of unsanitary and defective mattresses, some of which contained roaches and other insects, did not constitute the deprivation of basic human needs, as required for jail overcrowding to constitute cruel and unusual punishment. The court found that the detainee's allegations that due to lack of heating and ventilation at the jail he suffered from temperatures ranging from 30 to 40 degrees during the winter, that he was not provided with sufficient blankets for cold jail cells, and that such actions were taken with deliberate indifference to his needs and pursuant to policy of Department of Corrections (DOC) were sufficient to state a claim under § 1983 for cruel and unusual punishment through deliberate indifference to a serious medical need. The court noted that warmth is a basic human need, the deprivation of which can amount to a violation of Eighth Amendment protection against cruel and unusual punishment. (Central Detention Facility, D.C. and Correctional Treatment Facility operated by the Corrections Corporation of America)

U.S. District Court
PRETRIAL DETAINEE
CROWDING
FLOOR-SLEEPING
MATTRESS
SANITATION

Desroche v. Strain, 507 F.Supp.2d 571 (E.D.La. 2007). A pre-trial detainee brought a pro se, in forma pauperis action against prison officials, alleging improper conditions of confinement, negligent medical treatment, invasion of privacy, and excessive force. The district court dismissed the action. The court held that the alleged conditions of the detainee's confinement, including being required to sleep on the floor of an overcrowded holding tank, being deprived of a mattress, and being provided with water only in a dirty sink, if proven, did not violate his Eighth Amendment or due process rights, given that he experienced such conditions for only ten days, and that use of sink did not cause him to suffer disease or other serious harm. (River Parish Correction Center, Louisiana)

U.S. District Court
TEMPERATURE

Hadix v. Caruso, 492 F.Supp.2d 743 (W.D.Mich. 2007). Prisoners brought a suit to correct unconstitutional prison conditions necessary for prisoner health and safety, and requested injunctive relief as to a heat-related injury. The district court entered an injunction. The court held that prison officials may not, consistent with Eighth Amendment values, cause the expected deaths of prisoners subject to heat-illness by exposing them to high heat and humidity conditions. According to the court, the requirements for safe Eighth Amendment custody are violated by housing high-risk inmates in facilities which are routinely at heat index levels above 90 during summer months, when it is known that such heat conditions will reliably cause heat injury and death. The court ruled that the prisoners were entitled to an injunction requiring that all prisoners classified at high-risk for heat-related injury be housed in areas in which the heat index was reliably maintained below a heat index of 90. The court noted that the injunction was necessary to prevent irreparable harm, including bodily injury and death, and that the scope of the injunction was narrowly tailored and was the least intrusive means of correction of the Eighth Amendment violation. (Southern Michigan Correctional Facility, Charles E. Egeler Correctional Facility)

U.S. Appeals Court
CIVIL COMMITMENT

Hydrick v. Hunter, 500 F.3d 978 (9th Cir. 2007). Sexual offenders who were civilly confined in a state psychiatric hospital under California's Sexually Violent Predators Act (SVP) filed a class action against various state officials under § 1983, challenging the conditions of their confinement. The district court denied the defendants' motion to dismiss, and the defendants appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part and reversed in part. The court held that the First Amendment claims brought against state hospital officials were based on clearly established law for qualified immunity purposes insofar as they challenged retaliation for filing lawsuits, however, officials had qualified immunity to the extent that the plaintiffs' claim relied on a First Amendment right not to participate in treatment sessions. The court found that the plaintiffs stated a § 1983 claim for violations of their Fourth Amendment rights to be free from unreasonable searches and seizures. The court concluded that hospital officials were entitled to qualified immunity with regard to procedural due process claims, but not substantive due process claims. The offenders alleged that they were subjected to public strip searches, to retaliatory searches of their possessions and to arbitrary seizure of their personal belongings, that they were placed in shackles during transport to the hospital and during visits from family and friends, that they were subjected to restraint even if they did not pose any physical risk, and that they were force-medicated. On appeal to the United States Supreme Court (129 S.Ct. 2431) the court vacated the decision. (Atascadero State Hospital, California)

U.S. District Court
DORMITORIES
DOUBLE CELLING

Jurado Sanchez v. Pereira, 525 F.Supp.2d 248 (D.Puerto Rico 2007). A prisoner's next of kin brought a civil rights action under § 1983 against prison officials, seeking to recover damages for the prisoner's death while he was incarcerated, and alleging constitutional rights violations, as well as state law claims of negligence. The officials moved for summary judgment on the cause of action under § 1983. The district court denied the motion, finding that summary judgment was precluded by the existence of genuine issues of material fact on the failure to protect claim and as to whether the officials had qualified immunity. According to the court, genuine issues of material fact existed as to whether there were enough guards at the prison when the prisoner was killed by another inmate, and whether officials were mandated to perform weekly or monthly searches of cells, which could have prevented the accumulation of weapons used in the incident in which the prisoner was killed. Bayamon 308, an intake center, was considered minimum security with some limitations. The inmate capacity at Bayamon 308 is 144. Although the capacity was not exceeded, some cells, despite being originally built for one inmate, housed two inmates. According to the court, Bayamon 308 does not comply with the 55 square footage minimum requirements for each cell in a continuing federal consent order. Therefore, the individual cell gates are left continuously open, like an open dormitory. At the time of the incident officials did not take gang affiliation into consideration when segregating prisoners. The prisoner did not identify himself as a gang member, nor inform officials that he feared for his life. The facility was under court order to follow a staffing plan that stated the minimum amount of staff, the optimum amount, the fixed positions and the movable positions, pursuant to a lawsuit. Fixed positions, such as control units, cannot be changed under any circumstances, but the movable positions may be modified depending on necessity due to the type of inmate at the facility. The plaintiffs alleged that the defendants did not comply with the staffing plan, while the defendants insisted that they did comply. (Bayamon 308 Facility, Puerto Rico)

U.S. District Court
LIGHTING
OUT OF CELL TIME

Maddox v. Berge, 473 F.Supp.2d 888 (W.D.Wis. 2007). A state prisoner brought a civil rights action under § 1983 against prison officials and employees, alleging that his administrative confinement for participating in a riot violated his Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment rights. The court found that allegations that the prisoner was confined to his cell 23 hours a day and that he was denied “outside recreation” while he was in administrative confinement demonstrated injuries from an objectively serious deprivation, for the purposes of his conditions or confinement claim. The court held that the allegation that the prisoner was subjected to 24-hour illumination stated a claim for violation of his Eighth Amendment rights, although the prisoner did not allege that he suffered any adverse effects as a result of the lighting. The district court held that placement of the prisoner in administrative confinement, which subjected him to highly restricted non-face-to-face visits, lack of communication with other prisoners, nearly complete idleness in a cell that was constantly illuminated, lack of recreation, extremely limited out of cell time, and lack of access to any meaningful programming, was not clearly established as conduct that violated a prisoner’s Eighth Amendment rights, and therefore the warden and secretary of the corrections department had qualified immunity from the prisoner’s damages suit under § 1983. (Green Bay Correctional Institution, Wisconsin)

U.S. District Court
HYGIENE
RESTRAINTS TOILETS

Murphy v. Franklin, 510 F.Supp.2d 558 (M.D.Ala. 2007). A pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against a sheriff and jail administrator, alleging that he was subjected to punitive, degrading and inhumane treatment when, without explanation, he was shackled hands-to-feet to the toilet in an isolation cell, and, on another occasion, shackled to his cot. The district court granted the defendants’ motion to dismiss in part and denied in part. The court held that although the detainee’s complaint against the sheriff and jail administrator did not allege that he was subjected to mistreatment pursuant to any specific official policy, the detainee’s allegations that the sheriff promulgated all policies and procedures in the county jail, that the detainee was placed in an isolation cell and shackled hands-to-feet to the toilet, which was nothing more than a hole in the ground covered by a grate, and that the sheriff ordered the detainee removed from this cell for an interview and then reshackled to the toilet grate, were sufficiently specific to state a § 1983 claim against the sheriff under the theory of supervisory liability. The detainee alleged that without explanation, he was moved into a ‘lockdown’ cell for one day, in which his right hand was cuffed to the frame of his cot and his right leg was shackled to the other end of the cot’s frame. Again without explanation, he was allegedly then moved to an isolation cell, where he was shackled hands-to-feet to the toilet, which is actually nothing more than a hole in the ground. He alleged that he was held in this configuration for almost 12 days and was not released to allow urination or defecation, which caused him to soil himself, and that he was also not given any personal necessities such as clean, dry clothing, personal hygiene items, or bedding. (Elmore County Jail, Alabama)

U.S. District Court OVERCROWDING
STAFFING

Roberts v. County of Mahoning, Ohio, 495 F.Supp.2d 784 (N.D.Ohio 2007). Pretrial detainees and convicted prisoners being held in the custody of an Ohio sheriff at two correctional facilities that were allegedly understaffed and overcrowded brought a § 1983 class action against the county, sheriff, and county commissioners, alleging that conditions of confinement at those facilities were unconstitutional. The district court appointed a special master for the remedial phase of the litigation. A three-judge panel of the district court approved the proposed stipulated order. The district court held that the appointment of a special master had accomplished the court’s original objective and the appointment would be terminated. The court noted that the special master’s reports and other actions had fulfilled the requirement that he “assist the parties, specifically the Defendants, in attempting to find a solution to the problems which created the unconstitutional conditions in the Jail,” and his fourth report had established a mechanism for the litigation’s actual resolution. The first two reports addressed a narrowly avoided crisis that would have resulted from massive layoffs of security staff as a result of a budget shortfall in the county. The third report, filed after passage of a successful ballot issue increasing revenues available for the funding of the MCJC, described the parties’ continued cooperation in attempting to resolve the problems facing the jail, in particular, the need for accelerated collection of the proceeds from the successful bond issue. The court concluded “These reports, to which no party filed any objection, were instrumental in establishing an informational foundation for discussions of possible remedies to the phenomenon of chronic and serious crowding in the jail.” (Mahoning County Justice Center, Ohio)

U.S. District Court OVERCROWDING
STAFFING

Roberts v. Mahoning County, 495 F.Supp.2d 719 (N.D.Ohio 2007). Pretrial detainees and convicted prisoners being held in the custody of an Ohio sheriff at one of two correctional facilities that were allegedly understaffed and overcrowded brought a § 1983 class action against the county, sheriff, and county commissioners alleging that conditions of confinement at those facilities were unconstitutional. The district court held that there was clear and convincing evidence that crowding was the primary cause of the violation of a federal right, and that no other relief besides a prisoner release order would remedy that violation. The release order provided for incarceration of all violent felons and for reopening of all jail facilities under the control of the county to maximum occupancy, while at the same time protecting the constitutional rights of inmates in the county jail facilities. (Mahoning County Justice Center, Ohio)

U.S. District Court
FLOOR-SLEEPING

Thomas v. Baca, 514 F.Supp.2d 1201 (C.D. California 2007). Pre-trial detainees and post-conviction prisoners who alleged they were required to sleep on the floor of county jail facilities brought a civil rights class action suit against a sheriff in his individual and official capacities. The prisoners moved for summary adjudication of certain issues and the sheriff moved for summary judgment, or in the alternative, for summary adjudication. The district court granted the motions in part and denied in part. The court held that undisputed evidence established the custom of forcing inmates to sleep on the floor and that this custom violated the Eighth Amendment, even if the majority of inmates had bunks and floor-sleeping inmates were provided with mattresses. The plaintiffs had presented undisputed evidence that over 24,000 instances of floor sleeping occurred in the jail system in a four month period. The court found that the sheriff was entitled to qualified immunity from liability for the jail’s custom of forcing some inmates to sleep on the floor, where it was not clearly established during the 2002 to 2005 period covered by the suit, that providing inmate with a mattress would not avoid a violation or that floor sleeping violated the Eighth Amendment rights of convicted inmates as well as due process rights of pretrial detainees. (Los Angeles Sheriff Department, California)

U.S. Appeals Court
PRETRIAL DETAINEES
EXERCISE
MEDICAL CARE
VENTILATION

U.S. v. Ramirez-Gutierrez, 503 F.3d 643 (7th Cir. 2007). A defendant pled guilty in the district court to reentering the United States illegally after being deported. On appeal, the court held that the conditions of the defendant's pretrial confinement were not so substandard or onerous as to warrant special consideration at sentencing, and the sentencing judge considered the defendant's claim that he committed crimes because of substance abuse problem. The defendant complained that he was unable to obtain care for his broken tooth, lived in poorly ventilated quarters, and was given inadequate opportunity to exercise during his two and a half month detention. (Kankakee County Detention Center, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEGREGATION
SANITATION
FLOOR-SLEEPING
TOILET

Vinning-El v. Long, 482 F.3d 923 (7th Cir. 2007). A prisoner brought a § 1983 action against two prison officers, alleging that they violated his Eighth Amendment rights by subjecting him to inhumane conditions of confinement in a disciplinary-segregation unit. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the officers based on qualified immunity, and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded, finding that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the officers were deliberately indifferent to a serious condition. The prisoner alleged that, after a fight with his cellmate, he was stripped of his clothing and placed in a cell in the disciplinary-segregation unit where he was not permitted to take any personal property with him. The prisoner asserted that the floor of the cell was covered with water, the sink and toilet did not work, and the walls were smeared with blood and feces. He was allegedly forced to remain in the cell without a mattress, sheets, toilet paper, towels, shoes, soap, toothpaste, or any personal property, for six days. (Menard Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
EXERCISE
ISOLATION
SEGREGATION

Wilkerson v. Stalder, 639 F.Supp.2d 654 (M.D.La. 2007). Two state prisoners brought Eighth Amendment claims for cruel and unusual punishment, and claims under state law, against state officials and prison officials, including the Secretary of the Louisiana Department of Public Safety and Corrections, a prison warden, and members of the lockdown review board, relating to the prisoners' extended lockdown of approximately 28 to 35 years in the prison's closed cell restriction (CCR) unit. The prisoners asserted deprivation of sleep, exercise, social contact, and environmental stimulation. Both prisoners had been charged with and convicted of murdering a correctional officer during a riot. The district court granted summary judgment to the defendants in part and denied in part. The court held that the Secretary of Louisiana Department of Public Safety and Corrections was not liable, as a supervisory official, to state prisoners under § 1983 for the alleged violation of the Eighth Amendment protection against cruel and unusual punishment, absent evidence that the Secretary was aware that the prisoners' extended lockdown allegedly was without a current legitimate penological justification.

The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the prisoners' extended lockdown, for from approximately 28 to 35 years, in prison's closed cell restriction (CCR) unit deprived them of at least one of the basic human needs asserted by prisoners, i.e., sleep, exercise, social contact, or environmental stimulation. The court also found a genuine issue of material fact as to whether there was lack of legitimate penological justification for the extended lockdown of the prisoners, which was relevant to whether prison officials were deliberately indifferent to state prisoners' basic human needs. According to the court, prison officials had fair warning that continued confinement of the prisoners in extended lockdown for over 28 years could be constitutionally infirm, and thus, they were not entitled to qualified immunity from the prisoners' § 1983 claims alleging cruel and unusual punishment under the Eighth Amendment. (Louisiana State Penitentiary at Angola, Louisiana)

2008

U.S. District Court
CIVIL COMMITMENT
DOUBLE CELLING

Alves v. Murphy, 530 F.Supp.2d 381 (D.Mass. 2008). A person who had been civilly committed as a sexually dangerous person (SDP) brought a civil rights action alleging that treatment center officials placed him at a risk of harm by not adhering to certain mandatory procedures prior to implementing a double-bunking policy. The plaintiff also alleged that the officials violated equal protection principles by granting privileges to certain residents at the center, but not to others. A magistrate judge dismissed the action. The judge held that failure of the state treatment center to follow its own procedures regarding double-bunking, standing alone, was not a sufficient basis for a § 1983 claim. The court noted that the First Circuit analyzes the constitutional claims of pretrial detainees, who, like civil committees, may not be punished, under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. But, according to the court, the court draws on Eighth Amendment jurisprudence and applies the "deliberate indifference" standard when analyzing a pretrial detainee's failure-to-protect claims. (Mass. Treatment Center)

U.S. Appeals Court
TEMPERATURE

Bibbs v. Early, 541 F.3d 267 (5th Cir. 2008). A state inmate brought a claim under § 1983 against corrections officers alleging that he was subjected to severe cold in retaliation for filing grievances. The district court granted the officers' motion for summary judgment and the inmate appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether subjecting the inmate to four straight nights of 20-degree temperatures was sufficiently severe to deter the inmate from filing future grievances. The court also found a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the inmate's actions of writing grievances against corrections officers caused the officers to retaliate by turning on "purge" fans, subjecting the inmate to cold temperatures. (Clements Unit, Amarillo, Texas)

U.S. District Court
SEGREGATION
SEPARATION

Cerniglia v. County of Sacramento, 566 F.Supp.2d 1034 (E.D.Cal. 2008). A detainee who was involuntarily confined as a sexually violent predator (SVP) under California law brought a § 1983 action, alleging that his conditions of confinement in a total separation unit in a county jail violated his constitutional rights. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants and the detainee appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. On remand, the district court granted partial summary judgment in favor of the detainee on liability issues. The detainee moved to bar presentation of evidence to the jury of his status as an SVP. The district court granted the motion, finding that the detainee's SVP status was not relevant to the issue of whether his conditions of confinement were reasonably related to legitimate, non-punitive governmental interests, and that the probative value of the detainee's status as an SVP was outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. (Sacramento County Jail, California)

U.S. District Court
PLUMBING
SAFETY
SANTITATION
TOILETS

Cockcroft v. Kirkland, 548 F.Supp.2d 767 (N.D.Cal. 2008). A state inmate brought a pro se § 1983 action against prison officials, alleging Eighth Amendment violations related to toilet and cleaning supply problems. The district court dismissed the action in part. The court held that the defendants were not entitled to qualified immunity from claims that they refused to give the inmate adequate supplies and tools to sanitize his toilet in response to a widespread backflushing toilet problem caused by a design defect, in which sewage would rise up in the toilet of a cell when the toilet in an adjoining cell was flushed. According to the court, the officials' conduct, as alleged, violated the prisoner's clearly established rights under the Eighth Amendment to a minimum level of cleanliness and sanitation. The court found that the official was not entitled to qualified immunity from the state prisoner's § 1983 claim that the official was deliberately indifferent to his safety. The court held that the prisoner's § 1983 claim that a prison official was deliberately indifferent to his safety, in violation of the Eighth Amendment, was not barred by the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) provision that a prisoner may not bring an action for mental or emotional injury suffered while in custody without a prior showing of physical injury, even though the prisoner never suffered any physical injury as a result of the official's alleged acts. The prisoner alleged that the official disclosed to three other inmates that they had been placed on his enemy list at his request, and that this caused him to be considered an informant, which in turn caused him to place nine more inmates on his enemy list. (Pelican Bay State Prison, California)

U.S. District Court
LIGHTING
RESTRAINTS

Davis v. Peters, 566 F.Supp.2d 790 (N.D.Ill. 2008). A detainee who was civilly committed pursuant to the Sexually Violent Persons Commitment Act sued the current and former facility directors of the Illinois Department of Human Services' (DHS) Treatment and Detention Facility (TDF), where the detainee was housed, as well as two former DHS Secretaries, and the current DHS Secretary. The detainee claimed that the conditions of his confinement violated his constitutional rights to equal protection and substantive due process. After a bench trial, the district court held that: (1) the practice of searching the detainee prior to his visits with guests and attorneys violated his substantive due process rights; (2) the practice of using a "black-box" restraint system on all of the detainee's trips to and from court over a 15-month period violated his substantive due process rights; (3) requiring the detainee to sleep in a room illuminated by a night light did not violate the detainee's substantive due process rights; (4) a former director was not protected by qualified immunity from liability for the constitutional violations; and (5) the detainee would be awarded compensatory damages in the amount of $30 for each hour he wore the black box in violation of his rights. The court found that a 21-day lockdown following an attempt at organized resistance by a large number of detainees at the facility, shortly after the breakout of several incidents of violence, was not outside the bounds of professional judgment for the purposes of a substantive due process claim asserted by the detainee. (Treatment and Detention Facility, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
CELLS
TEMPERATURE
TOILETS

Decker v. Dunbar, 633 F.Supp.2d 317 (E.D.Tex. 2008). Affirmed 358 Fed.Appx. 509. An inmate filed a pro se § 1983 action against prison officials, asserting Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment violations, among other constitutional claims. The officials moved for summary judgment and the district court granted the motion. The court held that the officials' conduct in delaying the inmate's use of a restroom for 30 minutes did not amount to deliberate indifference to his medical needs in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. According to the court, the delay in taking the inmate to a restroom was caused by the need to conduct a prisoner count, and the inmate failed to demonstrate that he suffered any injury as a direct result of the delay.

The court found that placement of the inmate in a holding cell for 90 minutes on a day that the outside temperature reached 95 degrees did not amount to cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The court noted that even assuming the holding cell was extremely hot, 90 minutes was not an excessive period of time rising to the level of a constitutional violation.

The court held that the inmate failed to demonstrate that his alleged lack of access to the prison's law library resulted in dismissal of his multiple previously filed criminal appeals and civil cases, and thus the inmate failed to establish an actual injury, as required to prevail on the claim that he was denied access to court. (Texas Department of Criminal Justice, Correctional Institutions Division)

U.S. District Court
EMOTIONAL
DISTRESS

Estate of Trentadue v. U.S., 560 F.Supp.2d 1124 (W.D.Okla. 2008). In a suit arising from the death of a special housing unit (SHU) inmate at a Federal Transfer Center in Oklahoma, the district court ruled in favor of the plaintiff's family members on their claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress under the Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA), and awarded a total amount of $1.1 million in damages to the individual family members. On appeal, the court remanded for additional findings. On remand, the district court held that evidence supported a $250,000 award to the inmate's wife for the extreme and outrageous actions of the federal government in the aftermath of the inmate's death and prior to her viewing the body, including the failure to inform her in advance of the numerous extensive injuries on his body and the fact that an autopsy had been performed. The court found that the siblings who were present when the numerous, extensive, and unexpected injuries to inmate's body were first discovered were entitled to awards ranging from $150,000-$200,000, and brothers who never personally viewed the injuries were entitled to between $50,000 and $100,000. The district court held that the plaintiffs' understandable emotional reaction to the inmate's death was needlessly and recklessly intensified by the United States' failure to inform the family in advance as to the existence of the extensive injuries and that an autopsy had been performed, and throughout the trial, the court heard no explanation for the defendant's silence in this regard. The inmate had been returned to prison as a parole violator and was placed in a segregation single cell at his request. The inmate was found hanging in his cell approximately 20 minutes after the previous routine cell check by correctional officers. Other cuts and abrasions found on his body indicated persistent attempts to cause himself serious injury or death. Permissible items found in the cell supported presumptions that cuts on the body were self-inflicted. (Federal Transfer Center in Oklahoma City, Oklahoma)

U.S. Appeals Court
TEMPERATURE

Gibson v. Moskowitz, 523 F.3d 657 (6th Cir. 2008). The representative of the estate of a mentally disabled inmate who died of dehydration in a state prison brought a § 1983 action against a prison psychiatrist and others, alleging deliberate indifference to serious medical needs, and asserting medical malpractice claims. The district court denied the defendants' motion for summary judgment, and subsequently entered judgment, upon a jury verdict, in favor of the representative. The court awarded $1.5 million in compensatory damages and $3 million in punitive damages. The psychiatrist appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part and reversed in part. The court held that evidence was sufficient to support a determination that the inmate had an objectively serious medical condition and that the psychiatrist subjectively ignored the inmate's serious medical needs. The court found that the compensatory damages award was not excessive and that the representative was entitled to recover punitive damages. The court found that the punitive damages award was not excessive. According to the court, the psychiatrist was in charge of the inmate's treatment team, he admittedly was aware that the temperature in the observation room where the inmate was held exceeded 90 degrees, and that the combination of the inmate's medication and the room temperature was potentially deadly. A psychiatric expert testified that the inmate's medication affected the part of the brain that regulated body temperature and dissipated heat, and another medical expert testified that the inmate's dehydration occurred over a period of several days. Evidence was presented that during that period, the inmate lost 42 pounds. (Riverside Correctional Facility, Michigan)

U.S. District Court
HEATING

Hart v. Bertsch, 529 F.Supp.2d 1032 (D.N.D. 2008). A state inmate brought a § 1983 action against prison officials for violations of his constitutional right to receive necessary medical care. The inmate alleged that the officials failed to provide adequate medical care for his serious medical needs because he had been housed in a cell that utilized "steam heat," and that officials had not provided him with a medical alert button necessary due to his sleep apnea. The officials moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The court held that the officials did not act with deliberate indifference toward the inmate's central sleep apnea condition or alleged sensitivity toward "steam heat," as would have violated the Eighth Amendment prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment. The court noted that the inmate had been subjected to a multitude of physical examinations and diagnostic tests in an effort to diagnose the cause of his breathing complaints, and that the treating physician found no medical or factual basis to support another physician's recommendation that the inmate needed to avoid steam heat. According to the court, the inmate failed to follow through with recommended treatments, and the physician had never received a recommendation that the inmate be provided with a medical alert button, nor would such a procedure have been consistent with the inmate's condition. (North Dakota State Penitentiary)

U.S. Appeals Court
CELL CAPACITY
FLOOR-SLEEPING
OVERCROWDING
PRETRIAL DETAINEES

Hubbard v. Taylor, 538 F.3d 229 (3rd Cir. 2008). Pretrial detainees filed suit under § 1983, challenging conditions of their confinement on Fourteenth Amendment due process grounds. The district court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment and the detainees appealed. The appeals court vacated and remanded. On remand the district court granted the defendants' renewed motions for summary judgment and the detainees again appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that triple-celling of the pretrial detainees was rationally related to prison officials' legitimate governmental interest in trying to manage overcrowding conditions at the prison, for the purposes of the detainees' claim that triple-celling violated their Fourteenth Amendment due process right. The court found that requiring the detainees to sleep on a mattress on the floor of their cells for a period of three to seven months did not violate the detainees' Fourteenth Amendment due process rights. The court noted that although many pretrial detainees did spend a substantial amount of time on floor mattresses, they also had access to 3,900 square foot dayrooms, there was no evidence that the use of the floor mattresses resulted in disease or the splashing of human waste upon the detainees, and over $2.8 million dollars had been spent on capital improvements during the past five years to maintain or elevate the living conditions for prisoners. The court noted that even if the detainees' due process constitutional rights were violated by requiring them to sleep on mattresses on the floor, the law was not sufficiently clear so that a reasonable official would understand that what he was doing violated a constitutional right, entitling the prison officials to qualified immunity in the detainees' suit under § 1983 challenging conditions of their confinement. (Multi-Purpose Criminal Justice Facility, Delaware)

U.S. District Court BEDS
HYGIENE
MATTRESS
MEDICAL CARE
TEMPERATURE

Hubbs v. County of San Bernardino, CA, 538 F.Supp.2d 1254 (C.D.Cal. 2008). A civilly committed sexually violent predator (SVP) brought a civil rights action against a sheriff and county claiming numerous violations of his constitutional and statutory rights. The district court granted the defendants' motion to dismiss in part and denied in part. The court held that the SVP stated a civil rights due process claim against the county and a civil rights due process claim against the sheriff and county regarding conditions of his confinement at the jail. The SVP alleged that policies regarding conditions of confinement and denial of medical care injured him, and that the sheriff did not properly train his subordinate employees to prevent those injuries. The SVP alleged that the defendants did not provide prescribed medications and that a holding cell was cold and did not have a mattress, hygiene supplies, or bed roll. The court found that the SVP stated a Fourteenth Amendment due process claim against the sheriff and county, on allegations that, pursuant to the sheriff's policies, he was neither provided with prescribed medications in a manner directed by his treating physicians, nor allowed to have medications that were sent with him, and those deprivations caused him severe pain and suffering, made him sick and listless, and caused him to suffer from a migraine headache that lasted for four days. The SVP also alleged that he suffered from severe urinary problems, which included great difficulty in emptying his bladder, as a result of the deprivation. (West Valley Detention Center, San Bernardino County, California)

U.S. District Court
ALIENS

Jama v. Esmor Correctional Services Inc., 549 F.Supp.2d 602 (D.N.J. 2008). An alien brought an action alleging that a government contractor that detained her pending asylum proceedings violated the Religious Freedom Restoration Act (RFRA) and state law. After a jury verdict in the alien's favor, the alien moved for attorney fees and expenses. The district court granted the motion, finding that the alien was the "prevailing party, and that the alien's calculation of the percentage of attorney hours devoted to her RFRA claims was reasonable. The attorney fees and expenses approved by the court totaled $642,399. The decision was vacated and the case was remanded by an appeals court in 2009. The district court noted that "...the case arose out of the appalling conditions that prevailed at the detention center in Elizabeth, New Jersey". The appeals court held that the district court could not attribute a portion of the alien's state law tort award to her RFRA claim but that the court may consider the results on the tort claims. The appeals court affirmed the district court's determination of market billing rates. (Esmor Correctional Services, Inc., Elizabeth, New Jersey)

U.S. Appeals Court
HARASSMENT SAFETY
THREATS

Irving v. Dormire, 519 F.3d 441 (8th Cir. 2008). An inmate in the Missouri penal system filed suit under § 1983 against several employees of a state correctional facility alleging multiple violations of his constitutional rights of due process, access to the courts and freedom from cruel and unusual punishment. The district court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment on the due process and access to courts claims, but denied the defendants' request for qualified immunity on the Eighth Amendment claim. The parties appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part and remanded. The court held that the corrections officers' alleged conduct in opening cell doors so as to allow an inmate to attack the plaintiff inmate was sufficiently serious to support a failure to protect claim. According to the court, the inmate's allegations that a corrections officer made several threats to kill the inmate, have him killed or have him beaten were sufficiently serious to form the basis of an injury, as required to support the inmate's Eighth Amendment claim. The court noted that the inmate's right to be free from threats by corrections officers was clearly established at the time the corrections officer allegedly made death threats against the inmate. According to the court, an officer's alleged conduct in threatening the inmate with a can of pepper spray and another officer's conduct in stating that she wanted the inmate dead did not rise to the level of being objectively credible. The court also held that an officer was on clear notice that his alleged conduct in labeling the inmate a "snitch" or a "rat" unreasonably subjected the inmate to the threat of a substantial risk of serious harm at the hands of his fellow inmates. The officer allegedly made three unsuccessful offers of payment to other inmates to assault the inmate, labeled the inmate a snitch in an effort to induce inmates to attack him and even armed another inmate with a razor blade for use in such an attempt. (Jefferson City Corr'l Center, Missouri)

U.S. Appeals Court
MEDICAL CARE
SMOKING
VENTILATION

Lee v. Young, 533 F.3d 505 (7th Cir. 2008). A former state prisoner brought a pro se § 1983 action against prison officials, alleging that the officials exhibited deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs, in connection with the prisoner's exposure to secondhand smoke that allegedly triggered his asthma. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the officials, and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the officials were not deliberately indifferent. According to the court, although the prisoner complained to medical staff, the officials did not ignore the medical staff's advice, since no doctor ever recommended that the prisoner be transferred to avoid exposure to the secondhand smoke. The court noted that medical professionals concluded that the prisoner's asthma was controlled. When the prisoner requested a non-smoking cell he was given one, his cellmate was issued a disciplinary ticket when he smoked in their non-smoking cell, and the ventilation system was repaired when the prisoner complained. (Shawnee Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
CLOTHING
NATURAL LIGHT

Lindell v. Schneider, 531 F.Supp.2d 1005 (W.D.Wis. 2008). A prison inmate brought a § 1983 action against state prison employees, claiming violations of his Eighth and First Amendment rights. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The court granted the motion in part and denied the motion in part. The court held that the employees did not exhibit deliberate indifference to the medical condition of the inmate, in violation of the Eighth Amendment, by limiting him to 2.5 hours of exposure to sunlight per week. The court found that the inmate failed to show a health risk associated with his being forced to use unwashed outerwear when exercising. The court ruled that summary judgment was precluded by fact issues as to whether a corrections officer directly told the inmate that he was being denied access to a desired program because he filed complaints, whether another officer failed to intervene when the inmate was told he was being retaliated against, and as to the existence of direct evidence of retaliation. The court noted that there was evidence that two prison security officers directly stated that the inmate was being placed in restricted housing and denied participation in a desired program because he brought administrative complaints. (Wisconsin Secure Program Facility)

U.S. District Court
FAILURE TO PROVIDE CARE
FOOD
MEDICAL CARE
TEMPERATURE

Murphy v. Gilman, 551 F.Supp.2d 677 (W.D.Mich. 2008). A civil rights action was brought against state prison officials, raising claims arising from the death of a prisoner, who died from dehydration after a four-day period during which he received no medical care and little water and food. A jury found that certain defendants were deliberately indifferent to the prisoner's serious medical needs, the defendants were grossly negligent, and one defendant was liable for intentional infliction of emotional distress. The jury awarded $250,000 in actual damages, and $2,500,000 in punitive damages. The defendants moved for judgment as a matter of law, and to stay enforcement of the judgment. The plaintiff filed a motion for a new trial. The district court denied the motions, finding that evidence supported the finding that an official knew of the obvious risks to the prisoner. The court held that punitive damages of $1,250,000 per prison official defendant was not constitutionally excessive for the dehydration death of a physically vulnerable prisoner, who was trapped without physical necessities or medical care for five days during a heat wave and who was awarded $250,000 in actual damages. The court noted that evidence established that prison officials kept the prisoner's water turned off, knew that the prisoner was not drinking, and knew the prison was on a heat alert. (Bellamy Creek Correctional Facility, Michigan)

U.S. Appeals Court
ADA- Americans with Disabilities Act
MATTRESS
OUT OF CELL TIME

Pierce v. County of Orange, 519 F.3d 985 (9th Cir. 2008). Pretrial detainees in a county's jail facilities brought a § 1983 class action suit against the county and its sheriff seeking relief for violations of their constitutional and statutory rights. After consolidating the case with a prior case challenging jail conditions, the district court rejected the detainees' claims and the detainees appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part and remanded. The court held that the injunctive orders relating to the jail's reading materials, mattresses and beds, law books, population caps, sleep, blankets, dayroom access (not less than two hours each day), telephone access and communication with jailhouse lawyers were not necessary to correct current ongoing violations of the pretrial detainees' constitutional rights. Inmates had alleged that they were denied the opportunity for eight hours of uninterrupted sleep on the night before and the night after each court appearance. According to the court, providing pretrial detainees housed in administrative segregation only ninety minutes of exercise per week, less than thirteen minutes per day, constituted punishment in violation of due process standards. The court also found that the county failed to reasonably accommodate mobility-impaired and dexterity-impaired pretrial detainees in violation of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA). The court affirmed termination of 12 of the injunctive orders, but found that the district court erred in its finding that two orders were unnecessary. (Orange County, California)

U.S. Appeals Court
ADA- Americans with Disabilities Act
EXERCISE
OUT OF CELL TIME
SEGREGATION

Pierce v. County of Orange, 526 F.3d 1190 (9th Cir. 2008). Pretrial detainees in a county's jail facilities brought a § 1983 class action suit against the county and its sheriff, seeking relief for violations of their constitutional and statutory rights. After consolidating the case with a prior case challenging jail conditions, the district court rejected the detainees' claims, and the detainees appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The court held that injunctive orders relating to the county jail's reading materials, mattresses and beds, law books, population caps, sleep, blankets, telephone access, and communication with jailhouse lawyers were not necessary to current and ongoing violations of pretrial detainees' constitutional rights. The court found that an injunction relating to restrictions of detainees' religious rights based on security concerns was narrowly drawn and extended no further than necessary to correct the violation of the federal right of pretrial detainees in administrative segregation. The injunctive order, with its provision for the curtailment or elimination of pretrial detainees' religious rights based on security concerns, provided for no more than a minimum level of ongoing participation in religious activities.

The court held that providing pretrial detainees housed in administrative segregation only 90 minutes of exercise per week, less than 13 minutes per day, constituted punishment in violation of due process standards. The court found that an order requiring that inmates in administrative segregation be permitted exercise at least twice each week for a total of not less than 2 hours per week was necessary to correct the current and ongoing violation.

The court found that the county failed to reasonably accommodate mobility-impaired and dexterity-impaired pretrial detainees in violation of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA). The county did not offer any legitimate rationale for maintaining inaccessible bathrooms, sinks, showers, and other fixtures in the housing areas and common spaces assigned to mobility and dexterity impaired detainees, and the county offered no explanation or justification for the significant differences between the vocational and recreational activities available to non-disabled and disabled detainees.

Termination of injunctive orders requiring that inmates be provided with seating while detained in holding cells, or elsewhere, awaiting transport to or from court and requiring that inmates be given at least fifteen minutes within which to complete each meal did not constitute an abuse of discretion since the treatment of detainees in the county's holding cells and the time allowed for meals did not violate the detainees' constitutional rights.

The court held that restrictions placed on use of the day room, limiting administrative segregation detainees' use of the room to one or two inmates at a time, were reasonably related to institutional security concerns. (Orange County Jail System, California)

U.S. Appeals Court
ALIENS

Rasul v. Myers, 512 F.3d 644 (D.C. Cir. 2008). Former detainees at a military facility in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba sued the Secretary of Defense and commanding officers alleging they were tortured. The detainees asserted claims under the Alien Torture Statute, under the Geneva Conventions, under the Religious Freedom Restoration Act (RFRA) and also asserted Fifth and Eighth Amendment claims on a Bivens cause of action. The defendants moved to dismiss and the district court granted the motion in part and denied the motion as to the RFRA claim. Both sides appealed. The district court affirmed in part and reversed as to the RFRA claim. The court held that the acts of torture allegedly committed against aliens detained at the military base in Cuba were "within the scope of employment" of the military personnel who were allegedly committing such acts, for the purpose of deciding whether the United States should be substituted as defendant. The court found that the aliens were without property or presence in the United States and lacked any constitutional rights and could not assert a Bivens claim against military personnel for alleged due process violations and cruel and unusual punishment inflicted upon them. The court held that the term "persons" as used in the RFRA to generally prohibit the government from substantially burdening a "person's exercise of religion" did not extend to non-resident aliens. (United States Naval Base at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba)

U.S. Appeals Court
SANITATION
VENTILATION
TEMPERATURE
ODORS

Sain v. Wood, 512 F.3d 886 (7th Cir. 2008). A civilly-committed sex offender brought a § 1983 action alleging that his conditions of confinement violated his Fourteenth Amendment due process rights. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of some defendants and denied a motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity for the clinical director of a detention facility. The clinical director appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The court held that the district court did not commit plain error in assuming implicitly that the clinical director was entitled to assert qualified immunity as a state actor. The court found that the offender's alleged conditions of confinement did not amount to inhumane treatment in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. The conditions purportedly included unpleasant odors, lack of air conditioning, peeling paint and the presence of cockroaches which, according to the court, did not amount to inhumane treatment. The court noted that although the alleged conditions were unpleasant, they were not so objectively serious that they could establish a constitutional violation. (Joliet Treatment and Detention Facility, Illinois Department of Human Services)

U.S. District Court
ADA-Americans with Disabilities Act
SAFETY
SHOWERS

Shaw v. TDCJ-CID, 540 F.Supp.2d 834 (S.D.Tex. 2008). A legally blind state inmate brought an action alleging that prison officials failed to remedy unsafe conditions in handicapped showers, in violation of his constitutional rights, Title II of Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), the Rehabilitation Act (RA), and the Texas Tort Claims Act (TTCA). The inmate also alleged that prison medical officials were deliberately indifferent to his serious medical needs. The district court granted summary judgment for the officials. The court held that prison officials did not discriminate against the legally blind inmate as the result of their alleged failure to remedy unsafe conditions in the prison's handicapped showers, and thus the officials were not liable under Title II of Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) for injuries the inmate sustained in a slip and fall accident. (Estelle Unit, Texas Department of Criminal Justice-Correctional Institutions Division)

U.S. District Court
CONDITIONS
EMOTIONAL DISTRESS
FOOD
HYGIENE
MEDICAL CARE
SANITATION

Spotts v. U.S., 562 F.Supp.2d 46 (D.D.C. 2008). Federal inmates brought an action against the United States under the Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA), alleging that Bureau of Prisons (BOP) officials acted negligently by failing to evacuate the prison prior to the landfall of a hurricane. The government moved to transfer venue and the district court transferred the venue to the Eastern District of Texas. The court noted that although the BOP resided in the District of Columbia, the decision to keep the prisoners at the prison before and during the hurricane was made by the BOP's Regional Director in Texas, and sufficient activities giving rise to the inmates' tort claims did not occur in the District of Columbia. The inmates alleged that the warden failed to respond to their concerns about the hurricane, that prison officers handed out plastic bags for the inmates to fill with human waste, that prison officials denied the inmates access to food and medical attention, and that prison staff discouraged the filing of tort claims. The inmates also alleged that BOP agents failed to properly supply the prison during the month that followed the hurricane, and that during that time inmates were forced to live in substandard conditions and suffered various physical and emotional injuries as a result. (United States Penitentiary in Beaumont, Texas)

U.S. District Court
TEMPERATURE

Stutes v. Tipto, 540 F.Supp.2d 516 (D.Vt. 2008). A Vermont inmate incarcerated in Oklahoma in a privately-owned facility brought an action against Vermont prison officials and facility employees claiming cruel and unusual punishment. The inmate alleged that his time spent outdoors in cold weather exposed him to "the potential of hypothermia, frostbite, and cold-related infections such as influenza, ear infections, upper respiratory infections, bronchitis and more." Shortly after his exposure to the cold, he began suffering from flu-like symptoms. The district court dismissed the action. The court held that a state corrections commissioner was not subject to liability under § 1983 for alleged mistreatment of the inmate, even though the inmate sent a letter to the commissioner asking for protection from retaliation, and submitted a formal grievance form to the commissioner after the alleged mistreatment, where there was no indication that the commissioner was responsible for a policy or custom that led to the wrongdoing, or that he failed to properly supervise employees who committed the allegedly wrongful acts. (North Fork Correctional Facility, Oklahoma, Corrections Corporation of America)

U.S. Appeals Court
MATTRESS
SANITATION

Townsend v. Fuchs, 522 F.3d 765 (7th Cir. 2008). A state inmate filed a civil rights suit against a prison official and a correctional officer alleging violation of his due process rights in placing him in administrative segregation for 59 days, and violation of his Eighth Amendment right against cruel and unusual punishment due to unsanitary conditions in segregation. The district court granted the official's motion for partial summary judgment. The court later denied the inmate's motion to amend to add a warden as a defendant and entered summary judgment for the prison official and correctional officer. The inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part and remanded. The court found that the inmate's sleeping on a moldy and wet mattress involved a sufficiently serious prison condition to deny a civilized measure of life's necessities, as required for an Eighth Amendment claim. The court held that summary judgment on the issue of deliberate indifference was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether a correctional officer knew about the condition of the inmate's wet and moldy mattress. (New Lisbon Correctional Institution, Wisconsin)

U.S. Appeals Court
CLOTHING

U.S. v. Reed, 522 F.3d 354 (D.C. Cir. 2008). A defendant was convicted in district court of armed bank robbery, armed carjacking and destruction of property and he appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that requiring the defendant to wear a jumpsuit without underwear did not rise to the level of a coercive police activity that would render the defendant's confession not voluntary within the meaning of the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. (District of Columbia)

U.S. District Court
DEATH PENALTY

Walker v. Epps, 587 F.Supp.2d 763 (N.D.Miss. 2008). Death row inmates brought a § 1983 action against prison officials, challenging the constitutionality of a state's lethal injection protocol, and seeking a preliminary injunction to prevent the state from executing them by lethal injection during the pendency of their action. The state moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The court held that the three-year statute of limitations on the inmates' § 1983 action accrued on the later date of when their individual cases became final on direct review or on the effective date of the state's adoption of lethal injection as a means of execution, which was the date when each inmate knew that, as a matter of right, any impediment to setting an execution date had been removed. (Mississippi Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
LIGHTING

Walker v. Woodford, 593 F.Supp.2d 1140 (S.D.Cal. 2008). A state prisoner filed a civil rights action against a prison and its personnel alleging that prison officials violated his Eighth Amendment rights by refusing to turn off the lights in their cells. The defendants filed a motion for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The court held that the prisoner had to present evidence showing that the prison's 24-hour illumination policy was the cause of his insomnia or related problems before the prison could be required to explain why legitimate penological interests justified it. According to the court, the prisoner's testimony did not establish that the illumination caused the unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain, or that prison personnel were deliberately indifferent to his serious medical needs in not modifying the illumination policy. The court found that prison officials were not plainly incompetent in requiring low-level lighting in prison cells 24 hours per day for security purposes. (Calipatria State Prison, California)

U.S. District Court
BEDDING
MATTRESS
SANITATION
TOILETS

Wesolowski v. Kamas, 590 F.Supp.2d 431 (W.D.N.Y. 2008). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against correction officers and a superintendent, alleging that the defendants subjected him to cruel and unusual punishment and denied him equal protection of the law, in violation of his Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment rights. The district court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment. The court held that the prisoner's rights under the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments were not violated by a soiled mattress, the plexiglass shield over the front of his cell, another inmate's overflowed toilet, the use of a single slot to pass objects through a cell door, the denial of his preferred cleaning materials when other suitable materials were made available to him, or a single two-week period during which the plaintiff's cell was not cleaned. The court noted that the prisoner's complaints related principally to his personal preferences as to the cleanliness of his cell. Prison officials did not display deliberate indifference to the prisoner's complaints, but instead responded quickly and appropriately, in that the prisoner received a new mattress within two days of his request, and he was moved to a new cell without a plexiglass cover within five days of his complaint. (Southport Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
SMOKE

Williams v. District of Columbia, 530 F.Supp.2d 119 (D.D.C. 2008). A former inmate brought a § 1983 action against District of Columbia and corrections officials seeking damages related to his alleged exposure to second-hand smoke while he was in jail. Defendants moved for summary judgment. The court granted summary judgment for the defendants. The court held that a potential future injury to the former inmate arising from his alleged exposure to environmental tobacco smoke (ETS) while he was in jail was too remote and speculative to support standing in the inmate's § 1983 action. The court noted that the expert report submitted by the inmate indicating a increased risk of heart disease and lung cancer for the jail population exposed to ETS during the inmate's period of incarceration did not indicate a probability of harm to the inmate. (District of Columbia Department of Corrections Central Detention Facility)

2009

U.S. District Court
SMOKE

Abuhouran v. U.S., 595 F.Supp.2d 588 (E.D.Pa. 2009). A prisoner brought a negligence action against the United States under the Federal Tort Claims Act alleging prison officials exposed him to excessive amounts of environmental tobacco smoke (ETS). The defendants moved for summary judgment and the district court granted the motion. The court held that the prisoner was precluded, under the discretionary function exception of the Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA), from challenging the warden's designation of smoking areas, as federal regulations explicitly assigned the exercise of choice or judgment to the warden to designate areas subject to ETS. The court noted that the stated policy considerations for implementing the "no smoking areas" in prisons was to provide a clean air environment and to protect the health and safety of staff and inmates, suggesting the designation of smoking areas was the kind of discretionary function the FTCA exception was meant to shield. The court held that under Pennsylvania law, the prisoner failed to present any medical evidence or expert witnesses to establish a causal connection between his exposure to environmental tobacco smoke (ETS) and his alleged injury, as required to prevail on his negligence claim. The court also held that the prisoner failed to present any evidence of an actual injury. (Federal Detention Center, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania)

U.S. District Court
MEDICAL CARE
SMOKE

Adams v. Banks, 663 F.Supp.2d 485 (S.D.Miss. 2009). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against a warden and other prison officials for exposure to unreasonable levels of secondhand smoke, or environmental tobacco smoke (ETS), and for denial of adequate medical care. The defendants moved for summary judgment, and the inmate moved for summary judgment on his claim against a prison nurse. The district court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the inmate was exposed to unreasonably high levels of environmental tobacco smoke (ETS) from cellmates who smoked in his cell and from other inmates in the area outside his cell. The court also found fact issues as to whether the complaints made by the inmate were sufficient for the warden and assistant supervisor to infer that ETS posed a substantial risk of serious harm to him, such that they acted with deliberate indifference to the inmate's situation. The court found that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to the seriousness of the inmate's medical condition as a result of exposure to environmental tobacco smoke (ETS) in his cell, as well as to the nature of a prison nurse's responses to the inmate's three sick call request forms complaining of coughing, chest pains, nausea, dizziness, difficulty breathing and vomiting as a result of exposure to ETS. The court held that neither the warden nor the assistant supervisor were involved in a decision to deny the inmate medical care as a result of exposure to secondhand smoke, and thus they were not deliberately indifferent to the inmate's serious medical needs in violation of the Eighth Amendment. (Wilkinson County Corr'l. Facility, Mississippi)

U.S. Supreme Court
PRETRIAL DETAINEES
OUT OF CELL TIME
ISOLATION

Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. (2009). A Muslim Pakistani pretrial detainee brought an action against current and former government officials, alleging that they took a series of unconstitutional actions against him in connection with his confinement under harsh conditions after separation from the general prison population. The detainee had been placed in a section of a federal detention facility known as the Administrative Maximum Special Housing Unit, where detainees were kept in lockdown 23 hours a day, spending the remaining hour outside their cells in handcuffs and leg irons accompanied by a four-officer escort. The district court denied in part the defendants' motions to dismiss on the grounds of qualified immunity and the defendants appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The United States Supreme Court granted certiorari. The Supreme Court reversed and remanded. The court held that the appeals court had subject matter jurisdiction to affirm the district court's order denying the officials' motion to dismiss on the grounds of qualified immunity, and the detainee's complaint failed to plead sufficient facts to state a claim for purposeful and unlawful discrimination. The court noted that the detainee challenged neither the constitutionality of his arrest nor his initial detention, but rather the policy of holding post-September 11th detainees once they were categorized as of "high interest." (Federal Bureau of Prisons, Metropolitan Detention Center, Brooklyn, New York)

U.S. District Court
EMOTIONAL
DISTRESS
MEDICAL CARE

Baker v. Wilkinson, 635 F.Supp.2d 514 (W.D.La. 2009). A Louisiana state prisoner brought a § 1983 action, in forma pauperis, against a warden, assistant warden, prison operator, and two nurses, alleging that he was denied adequate medical care related to hemorrhoids. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court denied the motion. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the prisoner suffered an injury as a result of the delay in appropriate medical care, whether he was entitled to damages for emotional distress, and whether he was entitled to nominal or punitive damages. (Winn Correctional Center, Louisiana, Corrections Corporation of America)

U.S. District Court
CLOTHING
MATTRESS
RESTRAINTS
SEGREGATION
TEMPERATURE

Bowers v. Pollard, 602 F.Supp.2d 977 (E.D.Wis. 2009). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against correctional facility officials, challenging the conditions of his confinement. The court held that the correctional facility's enforcement of a behavior action plan that regularly denied the inmate a sleeping mattress, occasionally required him to wear only a segregation smock or paper gown, and subjected him to frequent restraint did not deny the inmate the minimal civilized measure of life's necessities and was targeted at his misconduct, and thus the plan did not violate the inmate's Eighth Amendment rights. The court noted that the inmate's cell was heated to 73 degrees, he was generally provided some form of dress, he was granted access to hygiene items, and he was only denied a mattress and other possessions after he used them to perpetrate self-abusive behavior, covered his cell with excrement and blood, and injured facility staff. The court held that the state Department of Corrections' regulations governing procedures for placing an inmate on observational status to ensure his safety and the safety of others, and the procedures for utilizing restraints for inmate safety were sufficient to protect the inmate's liberty interest in avoiding an erroneous determination that his behavior required such measures. The procedures governing observational status required the inmate to be orally informed of the reasons for placement on the status and prohibited placement for more than 15 days without an evidentiary hearing. The procedures governing restraints prohibited restraining an inmate for more than a 12-hour period. (Green Bay Correctional Institution, Wisconsin)

U.S. District Court
CROWDING
FAILURE TO PROVIDE CARE
MEDICAL CARE

Coleman v. Schwarzenegger, 922 F.Supp.2d 882 (E.D.Cal. 2009). State prisoners brought class actions against a governor and other officials, alleging unconstitutional conditions of confinement as to the provision of medical and mental health care. After granting a correctional officer association's motion to intervene as a plaintiff, the motion to convene a three-judge panel was granted, to consider plaintiffs' request for order to reduce prison population. The court held that clear and convincing evidence established that overcrowding was the primary cause of the provision of inadequate medical and mental health care; (2) deficiencies in the provision of medical and mental health care could not be resolved in the absence of a prisoner release order; (3) reduction in the California state prison population to a system-wide cap was warranted; (4) the court's order was the least intrusive means necessary to correct the violations, as required by PLRA; and (5) reduction in the California state prison population to a system-wide cap of 137.5% was warranted. (California Department of Rehabilitation and Corrections)

U.S. District Court
HYGIENE
SEGREGATION
USE OF FORCE

Cusamano v. Sobek, 604 F.Supp.2d 416 (N.D.N.Y. 2009). A former state prisoner brought a pro se action against department of corrections employees, alleging violation of his First, Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment rights as well as the New York Constitution. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants in part, and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact regarding whether a corrections officer was present during, and participated in, the alleged assault of the prisoner. The court noted that an officer's failure to intervene during another officer's use of excessive force can itself constitute excessive force. The court also held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact regarding whether excessive force was used against the prisoner. The court held that the denial of access to toilet paper and soap during the prisoner's confinement in a special housing unit did not constitute an unconstitutional condition of confinement, as required for the prisoner's inadequate prison conditions claim against corrections officers under the Eighth Amendment. The court noted that the deprivation of toilet paper and soap was not continuous, there was no evidence that the prisoner was deprived of any other toiletry items, and there was no evidence that the prisoner requested toilet paper during medical visits. The court found that the actions of the corrections officers toward the prisoner, including the utterance of profanities and the deprivation of amenities, did not cause the prisoner physical injury or psychological injury that was more than de minimis, as required for the prisoner's harassment claim against the corrections officers under the Eighth Amendment. The court found that a corrections officer's failure to include the prisoner's legal documents in the prisoner's personal items when the prisoner was transferred to a special housing unit was unintentional and did not cause the prisoner to be prejudiced during legal proceedings, as required for the prisoner's First Amendment denial of access to courts claim against the officer. (Gouverneur Correctional Facility, Clinton Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
TEMPERATURE

Dace v. Smith-Vasquez, 658 F.Supp.2d 865 (S.D.Ill. 2009). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against prison employees, alleging that his exposure to excessively cold conditions during his incarceration resulted in a deprivation of his Eighth Amendment rights, and that employees unconstitutionally retaliated against him by exposing him to such conditions. The employees moved for summary judgment and the district court granted the motion. The court held that the prisoner failed to establish that alleged excessively cold temperature in his cell for a period of approximately three weeks was sufficiently serious to deprive him of the minimal civilized measures of life's necessities, as would support his Eighth Amendment prison conditions claim. Although the prisoner and other inmates in his cell block had to bundle up to try to stay warm, and the prisoner contracted a case of common cold, there was no concrete, objectively verifiable evidence that demonstrated the degree of cold in the cell during the relevant time period. The court found that prison employees were not deliberately indifferent to the prisoner's complaints regarding cold temperature in his cell during a three-week period, as would support the prisoner's Eighth Amendment prison conditions claim. The court noted that the prisoner testified that he had winter clothing and a blanket and that he used them, employees made efforts to address the prisoner's complaints regarding the situation by submitting work orders for a heating system, and there was no evidence that the employees had authority to do anything else. The court found that the prisoner failed to establish that his prior lawsuit against prison officials and/or his filing of grievances was the "motivating factor" for the alleged actions of prison employees, including exposing the prisoner to extreme cold, not allowing him to go to the commissary, handcuffing him, damaging his property, and not responding to his grievances, as would support his § 1983 retaliation claim against the employees. (Menard Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
ALIENS

Families for Freedom v. Napolitano, 628 F.Supp.2d 535 (S.D.N.Y. 2009). Immigrant advocacy organizations and former immigration detainees brought an action under the Administrative Procedure Act (APA) seeking an order to compel the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) to act on their petition seeking promulgation of regulations to govern conditions in immigration detention facilities operated by Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE).

DHS moved to dismiss. The district court denied the motion, finding that DHS's nearly two-and-one-half year delay in deciding the petition was unreasonable as a matter of law. The court noted that the DHS Office of Inspector General had issued a report detailing significant problems in ICE detention facilities, problems with detainee medical care had been chronicled by the news media, and the petitioners alleged that detainees in DHS custody were dying as result of substandard conditions. (U.S. Department of Homeland Security)

U.S. District Court
CLOTHING
FOOD
RESTRAINTS TEMPERATURE

Gay v. Chandra, 652 F.Supp.2d 959 (S.D.Ill. 2009). A state prisoner, who suffered from antisocial and narcissistic personality disorders, brought a § 1983 action against a psychiatrist who treated him in prison, alleging that conditions of confinement to which the psychiatrist subjected him violated the Eighth Amendment. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the psychiatrist in part, and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the cell where the prisoner was restrained naked was excessively cold, and as to whether the psychiatrist knew that the prisoner would in fact be restrained naked in excessively low temperatures. Similarly, the court found fact issues as to whether the psychiatrist's decision not to allow the prisoner to wear any clothing while he was restrained denied the prisoner a "civilized measure" of life's necessities, and as to whether the psychiatrist was deliberately indifferent to the fact that the prisoner was restrained without clothes. According to the court, summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the psychiatrist's denial of food to the prisoner while the prisoner was restrained for 32 hours constituted an Eighth Amendment violation. The court found that the decision of the psychiatrist to use therapeutic restraints on the prisoner did not, in and of itself, violate the Eighth Amendment; where the psychiatrist's decision to restrain the prisoner was to protect the prisoner from harming himself. The court found that the psychiatrist was not entitled to qualified immunity in the prisoner's § 1983 action alleging Eighth Amendment violations arising from his medical treatment; where a fact issue existed as to whether the psychiatrist violated the prisoner's Eighth Amendment rights, and the prisoner's right to receive medical treatment for his serious medical needs, and his right not to be punished through conditions of his confinement, was a clearly established right. (Tamms Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court CAPACITY
CLOTHING
CONDITIONS
CROWDING
HYGIENE NATURAL LIGHT
NOISE RESTRAINTS SAFETY
SANITATION
STAFFING
TEMPERATURE

Graves v. Arpaio, 633 F.Supp.2d 834 (D.Ariz. 2009). Pretrial detainees in a county jail system brought a class action against a county sheriff and a county board of supervisors, alleging violation of the detainees' civil rights. The parties entered into a consent decree which was superseded by an amended judgment entered by stipulation of the parties. The defendants moved to terminate the amended judgment. The district court entered a second amended judgment which ordered prospective relief for the pretrial detainees. The amended judgment provided relief regarding the following: population/housing limitations, dayroom access, natural light and windows, artificial lighting, temperature, noise, access to reading materials, access to religious services, mail, telephone privileges, clothes and towels, sanitation, safety, hygiene, toilet facilities, access to law library, medical care, dental care, psychiatric care, intake areas, mechanical restraints, segregation, outdoor recreation, inmate classification, visitation, food, visual observation by detention officers, training and screening of staff members, facilities for the handicapped, disciplinary policy and procedures, inmate grievance policy and procedures, reports and record keeping, security override, and dispute resolution. The detainees moved for attorney's fees and nontaxable costs. The district court held that: (1) the class of detainees was the prevailing party entitled to attorney's fees; (2) the initial lodestar figure of $1,239,491.63 for attorney's fees was reasonable; (3) Kerr factors provided no basis for downward adjustment of the initial lodestar; (4) the attorney's fees award would not be reduced for limited success; (5) the amount requested as reimbursement for attorney's fees was fully compensable under the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA); (6) PLRA did not require appointment of class counsel for the award of attorney's fees and non-taxable costs; and (7) the class was entitled to interest on the award of attorney' fees from the date of the court's order ruling in favor of the detainees on the motion to terminate. The court noted that defending and enforcing the judgment for more than five years and obtaining prospective relief required substantial time and labor, the issues presented were not novel but many were difficult and complex, conducting discovery, marshaling evidence, and presenting that evidence during a 13-day evidentiary hearing required considerable skill, commitment of attorneys' time and advancement of costs limited attorneys' ability to take on new cases, and the attorneys would not receive any compensation for their work representing the detainees except as awarded by the court. (Maricopa County Sheriff and Maricopa County Board of Supervisors, Arizona)

U.S. District Court
CONDITIONS
EMOTIONAL DISTRESS
EXERCISE
ISOLATION
SHOWERS

Gray v. Hernandez, 651 F.Supp.2d 1167 (S.D.Cal. 2009). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action, seeking damages and declaratory and injunctive relief, against an acting warden, captain, and two employees in a prison library. The prisoner alleged he was placed in administrative segregation pending the investigation of rule violation charges filed by the two employees, accusing him of attempting to extort money from them by offering to settle his potential suit against them. The district court held that the prisoner sufficiently alleged a chilling of his First Amendment right to file grievances and pursue civil rights litigation by alleging that his placement in administrative segregation caused him mental and financial harms. The court held that the prisoner's allegations that his placement in administrative segregation forced him to endure 24-hour lock-down, lack of medical treatment, only one shower every three days, and lack of exercise did not constitute an allegation of a dramatic departure from the standard conditions of confinement, as would invoke procedural due process protections. The court noted that an inmate does not have a liberty interest, for purposes of procedural due process, in being housed at a particular institution or in avoiding isolation or separation from the general prison population, unless the proposed transfer will subject the inmate to exceptionally more onerous living conditions, such as those experienced by inmates at a "Supermax" facility. (Mule Creek State Prison, High Desert State Prison, Donovan State Prison, California)

U.S. Appeals Court
BEDS
MEDICAL CARE

Griffin v. Arpaio, 557 F.3d 1117 (9th Cir. 2009). A state inmate brought a § 1983 action against a county sheriff and others, alleging cruel and unusual punishment and unsafe living conditions based on their failure to assign him a lower bunk for medical reasons. The defendants moved to dismiss for failure to exhaust administrative remedies under the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA). The district court granted the motion and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed. Although the court found that a prison grievance need only alert the prison to the nature of the wrong for which redress is sought and the inmate's failure to grieve deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs did not invalidate his exhaustion attempt, the inmate did not properly exhaust administrative remedies under PLRA. The court held that the inmate's grievance regarding his need for a lower bunk assignment did not provide sufficient notice of the staff's alleged disregard of his lower bunk assignments to allow officials to take appropriate responsive measures, as required to properly exhaust administrative remedies under the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) before he brought a § 1983 action. The officials responding to the inmate's grievance reasonably concluded that a nurse's order for a lower bunk assignment solved the inmate's problem. (Maricopa County Sheriff, Arizona)

U.S. District Court
CONDITIONS
MEDICAL CARE
STATE REQUIRE-MENTS

Indiana Protection and Advocacy Services Com'n v. Commissioner, Indiana Dept. of Correction, 642 F.Supp.2d 872 (S.D.Ind. 2009). The Indiana Protection and Advocacy Services Commission (IPAS) brought an action against the Indiana Department of Correction, alleging violations of federal and state law in the conditions of custody of mentally ill prisoners. The Department moved to dismiss for lack of standing. The district court denied them motion. The court held that IPAS had an associational standing under the Protection and Advocacy of Mentally Ill Individuals Act (PAMII) to bring suit, and the action was not an intramural dispute between two state agencies that could be resolved by the governor. The court noted that mentally ill prisoners would have standing to sue on their own behalf for violations of federal and state law in the conditions of their custody, and the interests that IPAS sought to protect were not merely germane to the IPAS's purpose, they were its reason for existence. According to the court, IPAS was not a traditional state agency, was independent of the governor, was funded by the federal government under the Protection and Advocacy of Mentally Ill Individuals Act (PAMII), received no state funding and had authority independent of the state to pursue administrative, legal, and other appropriate remedies to ensure the protection of individuals with mental illness who are receiving care or treatment. (Indiana Dept. of Correction)

U.S. District Court
ASBESTOS SMOKE
WORK

Jackson v. Goord, 664 F.Supp.2d 307 (S.D.N.Y. 2009). A state prisoner brought an action against correctional staff and officials, alleging that the defendants had violated his constitutional rights. After granting summary judgment for the defendants with respect to all of the prisoner's claims, except for his environmental claims, the defendants filed a supplemental motion for summary judgment on the environmental claims. The district court denied the motion. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to conditions in the prison auto body shop when the inmate worked there, the risk that the toxic materials in the shop created, and whether the inmate's alleged headaches, nosebleed, and nausea were related to his work at the auto body shop. The court also found that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the prisoner was exposed to asbestos for four to five hours a day over an extended period of time, and whether there was a risk to his health as a result of such exposure. According to the court, summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the prisoner was exposed to an unreasonable risk of serious harm from the prison's water quality or from exposure to cigarette smoke, and whether the prison defendants knew that the prisoner faced substantial risks of serious harm and disregarded those risks by failing to take reasonable measures to abate the risks. The court also found a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the prison superintendent knew of the allegedly ongoing constitutional violations and had the authority to correct the problems and failed to do so. (Green Haven Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
FAILURE TO PROVIDE CARE
MEDICAL CARE
SEGREGATION
SHOWERS

Malles v. Lehigh County, 639 F.Supp.2d 566 (E.D.Pa. 2009). A prisoner, who allegedly contracted Methicillin Resistant Staphylococcus Aureus (MRSA) while incarcerated at a county prison, brought an action under § 1983 against the county prison and the prison medical provider, alleging that the defendants unconstitutionally failed to provide him timely, adequate medical care and to protect him from getting infected, and that the provider was negligent under state law. The district court granted the defendant's motion for summary judgment. The court held that neither prison nurses' perfunctory examinations of the prisoner nor their failure to recognize the prisoner's MRSA for five days constituted deliberate indifference to the prisoner's serious medical needs. The court found that the failure of the county prison and/or the company which contracted with the county to provide medical services to inmates at the prison to fully execute their own plans to more aggressively prevent the spread of MRSA did not provide the basis for the prisoner's Eighth Amendment failure-to-protect claim in his § 1983 action. The court noted that the county and/or the company certainly could provide inmates with conditions that exceeded the relatively low bar of the Eighth Amendment, but they were not required to do that simply because they made plans to do so. The court held that the alleged failure of the county prison and the company which contracted with the county to provide medical services to inmates at the prison to quarantine inmates infected with MRSA, to properly clean and maintain shower facilities, to warn inmates about MRSA and educate them about prevention, and generally to take more precautions against the spread of MRSA did not deprive the prisoner who allegedly contracted MRSA at the prison of life's necessities according to contemporary standard of decency, as would constitute cruel and unusual punishment under Eighth Amendment. According to the court, the county prison and company which contracted with the county to provide medical services to inmates were not deliberately indifferent to the risk that the prisoner would contract MRSA in prison, as would violate the Eighth Amendment, where the prison and company engaged in some efforts to stop the spread of MRSA, even if they did not do everything they could or planned to do. (Lehigh County, Penn., and PrimeCare Medical, Inc.)

U.S. Appeals Court
DISCIPLINE
SEGREGATION

Marion v. Columbia Correction Inst., 559 F.3d 693 (7th Cir. 2009). A prisoner brought a § 1983 action against prison officials alleging he was denied equal protection and due process at a disciplinary hearing which resulted in 240 days of disciplinary segregation. The district court dismissed the complaint and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The court held that the issue of whether 240 days in disciplinary segregation was the type of atypical, significant hardship that would implicate a protected liberty interest could not be decided at the pleading stage. (Columbia Correctional Institution, Wisconsin)

U.S. Appeals Court
CLOTHING
TEMPERATURE

Mays v. Springborn, 575 F.3d 643 (7th Cir. 2009). A prisoner brought an action against prison officials, asserting claims based on strip searches at prisons and alleged retaliation for his complaints about the searches, denial of his request for dietary supplements which he considered to be religious necessities, alleged inadequacy of his diet, failure to issue certain winter clothing items, and censorship of pages in a magazine mailed to him. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the officials on the claims about prison food and clothing and granted the officials judgment as a matter of law on the claims about strip searches, retaliation, and censorship. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, vacated in part, and remanded. According to the court, any failure to issue winter clothing items, including winter underwear, boots, galoshes, sweater, gloves, scarves, or wool socks, did not rise to the level of an objectively serious harm necessary to show an Eighth Amendment violation, absent a showing that the prisoner was forced to be in the cold for long periods of time or that he suffered anything more than the usual discomforts of winter. (Stateville Corr'l. Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
ADA- Americans with Disabilities Act
HANDICAPPED INMATES
MEDICAL CARE
PRETRIAL DETAINEES
PROGRAMS
SHOWERS
TOILETS

Phipps v. Sheriff of Cook County, 681 F.Supp.2d 899 (N.D.Ill. 2009). Paraplegic and partially-paralyzed pretrial detainees currently and formerly housed at a county prison brought a class action against the county and county sheriff, alleging violations of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) and the Rehabilitation Act. The parties cross-moved for summary judgment. The district court denied the motions for summary judgment. The court held that the sheriff waived the affirmative defense that the plaintiffs failed to exhaust their administrative remedies, as required by the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA), where the sheriff raised that defense for the first time in his motion for summary judgment. The court held that paraplegic and partially-paralyzed pretrial detainees who were formerly housed at the county prison were not “prisoners confined in jail” for the purposes of the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA), and thus their civil rights claims were not subject to, or barred by, PLRA. The court held that the pretrial detainees adequately alleged discrimination based on the prison's failure to provide wheelchair-accessible bathroom facilities. According to the court, the detainees met the PLRA physical injury requirement. In addition to alleging mental and emotional harm, the detainees complained of bed sores, infections, and injuries resulting from falling to the ground from their wheelchairs and toilets, which were undeniably physical injuries. According to the court, the county and county sheriff failed to establish that they were not recipients of federal funds, as would render them beyond the reach of the Rehabilitation Act's requirements. The court held that county prison facilities to which the paraplegic and partially-paralyzed pretrial detainees claimed to have been denied access--showers, toilets, and sinks--were “services” and “programs” within the meaning of Title II of ADA, which forbade discrimination against persons with disabilities in the area of public services, programs, and activities. The court found that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the paraplegic and partially-paralyzed pretrial detainees were intentionally discriminated against, and as to whether modifications to county prison facilities requested by the detainees were reasonable. The court found no evidence that the detainees were excluded from electronic monitoring or drug rehabilitation programs by the county department of corrections, as would support their Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) claim. (Cook County Department of Corrections, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
CELLS
TRANSFERS

Savage v. Judge, 644 F.Supp.2d 550 (E.D.Pa. 2009). Prison inmates brought a civil rights action against prison officials for allegedly violating their civil rights in connection with reassignment of the inmates to different cells and assaults allegedly committed upon them. Inmates not only asserted unlawful retaliation claims, but claimed that officials exercised excessive force in violation of their Eighth Amendment rights and unlawfully conspired to violate their rights. The officials moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether prison officials, in separating the cellmates from each other and in transferring one to another facility, were retaliating against the cellmates for their pursuit of grievances, or were taking necessary action to prevent the cellmates from engaging in homosexual activity in a cell. The court also found a genuine issue of material fact as to how an inmate sustained an injury to his face while he was being transferred to another cell. (Graterford L-Unit-RHU, Pennsylvania Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
ADA- Americans with Disabilities Act
FOOD SAFETY
TOILETS
VISITATION

Shariff v. Coombe, 655 F.Supp.2d 274 (S.D.N.Y. 2009). Disabled prisoners who depended on wheelchairs for mobility filed an action against a state and its employees asserting claims pursuant to Title II of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), Title V of Rehabilitation Act, New York State Correction Law, and First, Eighth, and Fourteenth Amendments. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that a state prisoner who depended on a wheelchair for mobility was not required by the administrative remedy exhaustion requirement under the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) to appeal a grievance regarding the height of a food service counter before bringing suit, where the grievance that he filed conceivably was resolved in his favor. The court noted that although the height of a counter was not lowered in response to the grievance, the prison had attempted to remedy the situation by changing the way in which hot food was served from the counter. According to the court, the inability of disabled prisoners who depended on wheelchairs for mobility to access restrooms throughout a state prison rose to the level of an objective violation of the Eighth Amendment, where the prisoners soiled themselves up to several times per week. The court noted that the sheer frequency with which those incidents occurred, not to mention the physical injuries that at least some prisoners had suffered in attempting to use an inaccessible restroom, indicated that the prisoners had been denied a minimal civilized measure of life's necessities or there was an unreasonable risk of serious damage to their future health. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the prison and its employees were deliberately indifferent to the prisoners' restroom needs. The court found that the height of a food service counter and the absence of accessible water fountains throughout the state prison were not conditions that deprived disabled prisoners, who depended on wheelchairs for mobility, of minimal civilized measure of life's necessities and they did not pose an unreasonable risk of serious damage to their future health, as required for a violation of the Eighth Amendment's prohibition on cruel and unusual punishment. The court noted that although one prisoner suffered a burn on his hand caused by hot food or liquid falling from a food service counter, falling or spilled food did not create an unreasonable risk of serious damage to the prisoner's health. The court held that the existence of potholes and broken concrete in state prison yards did not constitute a violation of the Eighth Amendment's prohibition on cruel and unusual punishment as to disabled prisoners who depended on wheelchairs for mobility, even if those prisoners had fallen and suffered injuries as a result. According to the court, the inaccessibility of telephones throughout a state prison, inaccessibility of a family reunion site, inaccessibility of a law library, and malfunctioning of a school elevator, that did not cause any physical harm or pain to disabled prisoners who depended on wheelchairs for mobility, were not the kind of deprivations that denied a basic human need. (New York State Department of Correctional Services, Green Haven Correctional Facility)

U.S. Appeals Court
MEDICAL CARE

Shepherd v. Dallas County, 591 F.3d 445 (5th Cir. 2009). A pretrial detainee sued a county under § 1983, alleging that conditions of confinement, specifically the jail's failure to administer pills he needed to ameliorate chronic hypertension, violated his due process right to medical care while in custody. The district court, entered judgment on jury verdict for the detainee. The county appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the action was an attack on conditions of confinement rather than on episodic acts or omissions of particular jail officials. The court noted that the jail medical director testified that the jail's medical services were inadequate, and a clinical pharmacist testified that the administration of medication at the jail was so inadequate that half or more of the inmates did not receive their prescription medications. The court held that a Department of Justice (DOJ) report concerning jail conditions was not excludable as being more prejudicial than probative, inasmuch as the report was relevant in that it provided strong support for the claim that medical care at the jail was constitutionally inadequate, and, although findings in the report were prejudicial to the county's cause, they were probative as well. (Dallas County Jail, Texas)

U.S. District Court
CELLS
MATTRESS
RESTRAINTS SHOWERS
USE OF FORCE

Zimmerman v. Schaeffer, 654 F.Supp.2d 226 (M.D.Pa. 2009). Current and former inmates at a county jail brought a § 1983 action against the county, corrections officers, and prison officials, alleging that they were abused by officials during their incarceration in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to: (1) whether corrections officers and prison officials knew or should have known that an officer would apply excessive force to the inmate by shocking him when he was restrained and whether they could have prevented the officer's excessive use of force; (2) whether the inmates exhausted administrative remedies by filing grievances regarding use of a restraint chair, lack of mattresses, inability to shower, cell conditions, and issues with mail; (3) whether the use of mechanical restraints against the inmates constituted wanton infliction of pain in violation of the Eighth Amendment; (4) whether an inmate complied with officials when extracted from a cell, rendering the use of oleoresin capsicum spray excessive and unjustified; (5) whether cell conditions posed a substantial risk of harm to inmates and whether corrections officers and prison officials were deliberately indifferent to that risk; and (6) whether the warden of the county jail was aware of and condoned the use of excessive force against inmates at jail. (Mifflin County Correctional Facility, Lewistown, Pennsylvania)

2010

U.S. District Court
CONDITIONS OF CONFINEMENT
TRANSFER

Advocacy Center for Elderly and Disabled v. Louisiana Dept. of Health and Hospitals, 731 F.Supp.2d 603 (E.D.La. 2010). A disability advocacy organization brought an action challenging the Louisiana Department of Health and Hospitals' practice of subjecting incompetent criminal defendants to extended delays in parish jails before their transfer to a mental health facility. The organization moved for a preliminary injunction. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the organization demonstrated a substantial likelihood of success on the merits of its due process claim, and demonstrated a substantial threat of irreparable injury if the injunction did not issue. The court found that the organization demonstrated that the threatened injury outweighed the damage the injunction might cause, and the organization demonstrated that the public interest would not be disserved if an injunction was issued. The organization claimed that the Louisiana Department of Health and Hospitals' practice of subjecting criminal defendants found to be incompetent to stand trial to extended delays in parish jails before their transfer to a mental health facility was not rationally related to the restoration of the defendants' competency, in violation of their due process rights, where incompetent defendants remained in parish jails because mental health facility was full, not because remaining in jail might restore their competency. The court noted that the organization presented evidence that continued incarceration in parish jails could exacerbate the incompetent defendants' mental conditions. The court held that inadequate funding could not excuse the Department's perpetuation of unconstitutional conditions of confinement. (Louisiana Department of Health and Hospitals, Feliciana Forensic Facility)

U.S. District Court
HYGIENE
SANITATION
OUT OF CELL TIME

Antonetti v. Skolnik, 748 F.Supp.2d 1201 (D.Nev. 2010). A prisoner, proceeding pro se, brought a § 1983 action against various prison officials, alleging various constitutional claims, including violations of the First, Fifth, Sixth, Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments. The district court dismissed in part. The court held that the prisoner's allegations were factually sufficient to state a colorable § 1983 claim that prison officials violated the Eighth Amendment by depriving him of needed medical care. The prisoner alleged that he was housed in segregation/isolation, leading to a mental health breakdown, and: (1) that he was seen by mental health professionals eight times over a five year period instead of every 90 days as required by administrative regulations; (2) that mental health professionals recommended he pursue art and music for his mental health but that prison officials denied him the materials; (3) and that the officials' actions resulted in the need to take anti-psychotic and anti-depression medications due to suffering from bouts of aggression, extreme depression, voices, paranoia, hallucinations, emotional breakdowns and distress, unreasonable fear, and systematic dehumanization. The court found that the prisoner's allegations were factually sufficient to state a colorable § 1983 claim for a violation of his First Amendment right of access to courts, where the prisoner alleged that he was housed in segregation for several years and was repeatedly denied materials such as books, paper, pens and envelopes, as well as assistance from a law clerk. The court held that the prisoner's allegations were sufficient to state a colorable § 1983 claim that he was deprived of personal hygienic items and sanitary conditions in violation of the Eighth Amendment, where the prisoner alleged he was regularly deprived of toilet paper and soap, that he was only allowed to shower twice a week, that he was made to strip in dirty showers full of filth and insects, that the unit in which he resided was littered with food and urine and contained open sewers, and that he suffered illness as a result. The court found that the prisoner's allegations that he was subjected to a policy of a minimum of five hours of outside exercise per week but that administrative regulations provided for a minimum of seven hours and controlling consent decrees required eight hours, were sufficient to state a colorable § 1983 claim under the Eighth Amendment.

The court ruled that the prisoner's allegations were sufficient to state a § 1983 claim for violations of the Eighth Amendment prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment where the prisoner alleged that he was locked down for 23 and 24 hours in a cell with a steel door, that prison officials disconnected the intake vent that pulled dust and allergens from the cell, that the prison heating system was not on in the winter, and that as a result of these conditions, he suffered cracked lips and nostrils which bled and refused to heal, as well as difficulty breathing and sleeping. The court held that the prisoner's allegations were factually sufficient to state a colorable § 1983 claim for violations of his Fourth Amendment right to be free of unlawful searches and Eighth Amendment right to be free of cruel and unusual punishment. The prisoner alleged that whenever he was moved from his cell to any other location he was made to stand in a brightly lit shower in full view of female employees, made to strip naked, place his bare feet on a filthy floor covered in insects and scum, spread his buttocks, lift his penis, then put his fingers in his mouth without any opportunity to wash his hands, and that the process was unnecessary because inmates were in full restraints, escorted and solitary at all times. The court found that the prisoner's allegations were sufficient to state a colorable § 1983 Eighth Amendment claim for violation of his right to be free of cruel and unusual punishment where the prisoner alleged the exercise provided to him was to stand in a completely enclosed cage alone, in extreme heat or cold without water, shade, exercise equipment or urinals, and that as a result he suffered sunburns, cracked and bleeding lips and a lack of desire to exercise, resulting in a loss of physical and mental health. (High Desert State Prison, Nevada)

U.S. Appeals Court
ADA-Americans with Disabilities Act
EQUAL PROTECTION
STATE REQUIREMENT

Armstrong v. Schwarzenegger, 622 F.3d 1058 (9th Cir. 2010). A class of disabled state prison inmates and parolees moved for an order requiring state prison officials to track and accommodate the needs of disabled parolees housed in county jails, and to provide access to a workable grievance procedure pursuant to the officials' obligations under the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), Rehabilitation Act, and prior court orders. The district court granted the motion and the state appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part and vacated in part. The appeals court held that: (1) contractual arrangements between the state and a county for incarceration of state prison inmates and parolees in county jails were subject to ADA; (2) the district court's order was not invalid for violating federalism principles; (3) the state failed to show that the order was not the narrowest, least intrusive relief possible, as required by the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA); but (4) there was insufficient evidence to justify the system-wide injunctive relief in the district court's order. The court noted the state's recent proposal to alter its sentencing practices to place in county jails approximately 14,000 persons who would otherwise be incarcerated in state prisons. The court also noted that the state's contracts with counties were not simply for incarceration, but to provide inmates and parolees in county jails with various positive opportunities, from educational and treatment programs, to opportunities to contest their incarceration, to the fundamentals of life, such as sustenance, and elementary mobility and communication, and the restrictions imposed by incarceration meant that the state was required to provide these opportunities to individuals incarcerated in county jails pursuant to state contracts to the same extent that they were provided to all state inmates. The district court's order did not require the state to shift parolees to state facilities if county jails exhibited patterns of ADA non-compliance; rather, the order required that, if the state became aware of a class member housed in a county jail who was not being accommodated, the state either ensure that the jail accommodated the class member, or move the class member to a state or county facility which could accommodate his needs. In finding that statewide injunctive relief was not needed, the court held that evidence of ADA violations was composed largely of single incidents that could be isolated, and the district court's order identified no past determinations that showed class members in county jails were not being accommodated. (California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation)

U.S. District Court
TEMPERATURE
VENTILATION

Blackmon v. Kuuia, 758 F.Supp.2d 398 (S.D.Tex. 2010). A state prisoner brought a civil rights action against prison officials, alleging his exposure to excessive heat violated his Eighth Amendment rights. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The district court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether conditions during the state prisoner's incarceration in a prison unit, which included frequent temperatures into the 100's and insufficient ventilation, and which allegedly had a negative effect on the prisoner's personal health, constituted a denial of the minimal civilized measure of life's necessities. The court held that a prison maintenance supervisor did not act with deliberate indifference to the state prisoner's health or safety in responding to the prisoner's grievance about excessive heat, as required to support an Eighth Amendment claim, where he investigated the prisoner's complaint and gave an appropriate response. According to the court, the state prisoner's right not to be subjected to excessive heat was clearly established at the time he was continually exposed to temperatures into the 90s and 100s, in determining whether prison officials who failed to respond to his complaints about the heat were entitled to qualified immunity in his civil rights action. (Garza East Unit, Beeville, Texas Department of Criminal Justice)

U.S. District Court
MEDICAL CARE
RESTRAINTS TEMPERATURE
USE OF FORCE

Caldwell v. Luzerne County Corrections Facility Management Employees, 732 F.Supp.2d 458 (M.D.Pa. 2010). A county prison inmate brought civil rights claims against prison officials. The officials moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the inmate stated claims of excessive force against prison officials with respect to various incidents in which he was allegedly tased, causing him to hit his forehead on a cell wall, forced to remain on a hard mattress at an uncomfortable angle, causing severe neck pain, strip searched, placed in 5-point restraints, causing swollen and bleeding wrists, pulled forcefully while handcuffed, causing his hands to swell and bleed, punched and slapped in the back while handcuffed, maced, and slammed onto the floor, kicked and punched. The court held that the inmate's allegations that in four incidents occurring over a span of four months he was placed on a mattress at an awkward angle for over 12 hours and subjected to severe pain, not permitted to use the bathroom, eat, drink, or shower while placed in 5-point restraints for many hours, and was refused a blanket while restrained in a cell with broken windows and an air vent blowing directly on him, were sufficient to state a conditions of confinement claim under the Eighth Amendment. The court held that the inmate's allegations that he was subjected by prison officials to excessive force and unconstitutional conditions of confinement, and that the officials' conduct reflected retaliation for his filing of lawsuits against them, stated a claim for retaliation under § 1983. (Luzerne County Corrections Facility, Pennsylvania)

U.S. District Court
EMOTIONAL DISTRESS
JUVENILES

Clark v. Conahan, 737 F.Supp.2d 239 (M.D.Pa. 2010). A juvenile and his parents brought an action against juvenile court judges, a private attorney, juvenile probation staff, the owner of construction company, property owners, and others. They alleged that, in connection with a scheme to divert juvenile offenders to newly constructed privately-owned juvenile detention facilities in return for kickbacks, the defendants violated the juvenile's constitutional rights. The plaintiffs also alleged that the defendants engaged in a Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act (RICO) conspiracy, and alleged false imprisonment and intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED). The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motions in part and denied in part. The court held that the judge was not entitled to immunity for his alleged non-judicial conduct and was not entitled to legislative immunity for budgetary actions he took in his role as president judge. The court held that the juvenile lacked standing to assert a Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act (RICO) action against the defendants because the juvenile asserted that he suffered great emotional distress and loss of earning capacity based on the education that he missed while in custodial detention, which did not demonstrate any concrete monetary loss. (Pennsylvania)

U.S. District Court
EMOTIONAL DISTRESS
HARASSMENT
THREATS
USE OF FORCE

Cummings v. Harrison, 695 F.Supp.2d 1263 (N.D.Fla. 2010). A Black Muslim state prisoner brought a civil rights action against a prison warden and correctional officers, alleging, among other things, that the defendants used excessive force against him in violation of the Eighth Amendment and retaliated against him, in violation of First Amendment, for submitting grievances. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court denied the motion. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether correctional officers' repeated verbal threats, including death threats, combined with physical assaults, against the Black Muslim prisoner caused the prisoner extreme psychological harm, and as to whether the officers maliciously and sadistically used force against the prisoner because he was black or because he practiced the Muslim faith. The court also found that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the prison warden had the ability to remove the Black Muslim prisoner from the supervision of the correctional officer who was allegedly verbally and physically abusing him, but refused to do so, and denied the prisoner's request for protective custody. (Taylor Correctional Institution, Florida)

U.S. Appeals Court
TEMPERATURE

Graves v. Arpaio, 623 F.3d 1043 (9th Cir. 2010). Pretrial detainees in a county jail system brought a class action against a county sheriff and the county supervisors board, alleging violation of the detainees' civil rights. The parties entered into a consent decree which was superseded by an amended judgment entered by stipulation of the parties. The defendants moved to terminate the amended judgment. The district court entered a second amended judgment which ordered prospective relief for the pretrial detainees. The district court awarded attorney fees to the detainees. The sheriff appealed the second amended judgment. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the district court did not abuse its discretion by ordering prospective relief requiring the sheriff to house all detainees taking psychotropic medications in temperatures not exceeding 85 degrees and requiring the sheriff to provide food to pretrial detainees that met or exceeded the United States Department of Agriculture's Dietary Guidelines for Americans. The district court had held that air temperatures above 85 degrees greatly increased the risk of heat-related illnesses for individuals taking psychotropic medications, and thus that the Eighth Amendment prohibited housing such detainees in areas where the temperature exceeded 85 degrees. (Maricopa County Sheriff, Jail, Maricopa County Supervisors, Arizona)

U.S. District Court
CLOTHING
RESTRAINTS

Gruenberg v. Gempeler, 740 F.Supp.2d 1018 (E.D.Wis. 2010). A prisoner, proceeding pro se, filed a § 1983 action against various prison officials, guards and medical staff, alleging violations of the Eighth Amendment. The district court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment. The court held that the prisoner did not have a clearly established right to not be continually restrained without clothing or cover in a cell following his ingestion of a handcuff key, a master key for belt restraints and one of the keys used for opening cell doors, and therefore, prison officials were entitled to qualified immunity in the prisoner's § 1983 action alleging violations of the Eighth Amendment. According to the court, continuous restraint of the prisoner without clothing or cover in a cell did not violate the prisoner's Fourteenth Amendment due process rights, where the prisoner was not restrained for a disciplinary reason, but to ensure prison staff was able to regain possession of a handcuff key, a master key for belt restraints and one of the keys used for opening cell doors following the prisoner's ingestion of them. (Waupun Correctional Institution, Wisconsin)

U.S. Appeals Court
EMOTIONAL DISTRESS
MEDICAL CARE
PRETRIAL DETAINEES

Harriman v. Hancock County, 627 F.3d 22 (1st Cir. 2010). An arrestee brought an action against a county, sheriff, and corrections officers alleging excessive force, false arrest, conspiracy, deprivation of due process, negligence, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The district court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment and the arrestee appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that in the detainee's excessive force claim the detainee's assertion that officers' accounts of his fall in his jail cell were inconsistent and inherently unbelievable was insufficient to defeat the defendants' motion for summary judgment. The court noted that the detainee conceded he had no recollection of an alleged beating, the officers were consistent in reporting that they saw the detainee fall and heard sounds in his cell that resembled a fall, all officers reported that they did not strike the detainee and did not see anyone strike the detainee, and a neurologist did not opine on the cause of the detainee's injuries. (Hancock County Jail, Maine)

U.S. Appeals Court
ADA- Americans with Disabilities Act
SEGREGATION
USE OF FORCE

Johnston v. Maha, 606 F.3d 39 (2nd Cir. 2010). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against employees of a county jail, alleging violations of his constitutional rights and of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) in connection with detention and medical care while in jail. The district court granted the defendants summary judgment. The inmate petitioned for the appointment of counsel in his appeal. The appeals court granted the petition. The court held that the appointment of counsel was appropriate in connection with the inmate's appeal from dismissal of his claim that his placement in solitary confinement, and subsequent excessive force he suffered, violated his constitutional rights, since there was likely merit in the inmate's claims. The court found that it appeared from the inmate's complaint that he might have been a pretrial detainee at the time he was placed in solitary confinement, and thus the claim that the inmate was subjected to excessive force as a detainee would arise under the Fifth, not the Eighth Amendment, because as a detainee he could not be punished at all. The court noted that there was no evidence that the inmate violated any rule or was provided with a pre-deprivation hearing. According to the court, the legal issues were fairly complex, especially with respect to whether the inmate's pretrial detention was substantial enough to give rise to a constitutional violation of a procedural due process right. (Genesee County Jail, New York)

U.S. District Court
DOUBLE CELLING
PLUMBING
SANITATION
VENTILATION

Mitchell v. Dodrill, 696 F.Supp.2d 454 (M.D.Pa. 2010). A federal prisoner initiated a Bivens-type action against the Bureau of Prisons (BOP) employees, making several complaints about various conditions of his former place of confinement. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants in part, and denied in part. The court held that, absent any evidence that the alleged conditions of the prisoner's cell caused harm to the prisoner, and that the Bureau of Prisons (BOP) defendants were deliberately indifferent to that harm, cell conditions did not violate the Eighth Amendment. The prisoner alleged that his cell was in poor condition, with poor welding and rust erosion present at the base of the walls, had inadequate plumbing, was infested with "cockroaches, spiders, worms, mice and other unknown insects," and lacked ventilation. The court found that the prisoner's allegation, that as a special management unit inmate, he was not given the same commissary privileges as a general population inmate, did not rise to the level of a sufficiently serious constitutional deprivation to give rise to an Eighth Amendment claim. The court held that double ceiling of the prisoner did not violate the Eighth Amendment where the prisoner did not allege that he was singled out for double-celling or that his health or life was endangered by the condition. The court noted that double ceiling inmates is not per se unconstitutional, and that considerations that are relevant in determining if double ceiling violates the Eighth Amendment include the length of confinement, the amount of time prisoners spend in their cells each day, sanitation, lighting, bedding, ventilation, noise, education and rehabilitation programs, opportunities for activities outside the cells, and the repair and functioning of basic physical facilities such as plumbing, ventilation, and showers. (Special Management Unit, United States Penitentiary, Lewisburg, Pennsylvania)

U.S. Appeals Court
FAILURE TO PROVIDE CARE
PRETRIAL DETAINEES
TRANSFERS

Nelson v. Shuffman, 603 F.3d 439 (8th Cir. 2010). A pretrial detainee resident of the Missouri Sexual Offender Treatment Center brought a § 1983 action against 13 treatment center officials, alleging violations of his constitutional rights. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of six of the 13 defendants. The remaining seven defendants appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as follows: (1) as to whether the officials recklessly disregarded an objectively serious risk of harm to the pretrial detainee resident by placing him with a roommate who had a history of sexually assaulting vulnerable young males; (2) as to whether the pretrial detainee had a serious medical need and whether a treatment center official deliberately disregarded the need by failing to provide the psychological treatment she prescribed; (3) as to whether officials retaliated against the detainee resident for filing an abuse and neglect charge and several grievances complaining about treatment center officials' failure to provide him necessary psychological treatment; and (4) as to whether officials' transfer of the detainee resident to an unfinished ward that only housed one resident who was confined to shackles twenty-four hours a day was punitive and violated due process by imposing a punishment that had no legitimate institutional objective. (Missouri Sexual Offender Treatment Center)

U.S. Appeals Court
MEDICAL CARE
SEGREGATION

Orr v. Larkins, 610 F.3d 1032 (8th Cir. 2010). An inmate brought a § 1983 claim against prison officials alleging his rights under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment and the Eighth Amendment were violated when he was kept in administrative segregation for nine months. The district court dismissed the complaint as frivolous and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the inmate's nine-month stay in administrative segregation did not constitute an atypical and significant hardship when compared to the burdens of ordinary prison life, as required to support the inmate's claim that his liberty interests under the Fourteenth Amendment were violated. The court found that prison officials who provided the inmate with anti-depressants, and later with anti-psychotic medication, during his nine-month stay in administrative segregation, were not deliberately indifferent to the inmate's worsening mental illness, as required to support the inmate's Eighth Amendment claim. (Eastern Reception, Diagnostic and Correctional Center, Missouri)

U.S. District Court
FACILITIES
SAFETY
SHOWERS

Quarles v. Palakovich, 736 F.Supp.2d 941 (M.D.Pa. 2010). An inmate, whose head and back had allegedly been injured when a portion of drywall ceiling in a prison shower collapsed onto him, filed a pro se § 1983 action against prison officials alleging deliberate indifference to his safety, in violation of the Eighth Amendment. All parties moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the defendants' motion in part, and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the prison's unit manager or correctional officers had subjective knowledge of the dangerous condition of the ceiling in the inmates' shower facilities. (State Correctional Institution at Smithfield, Pennsylvania)

U.S. District Court
CELLS
FOOD
PRETRIAL DETAINEE
SANITATION
TOILETS

Robinson v. Danberg, 729 F.Supp.2d 666 (D.Del. 2010). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against 47 defendants, including various prison officials, alleging various claims arising from acts occurring while he was a pretrial detainee and sentenced inmate. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that allegations that a sergeant and a corporal sergeant "set up" the pretrial detainee in connection with a hearing on a razor incident, and that the detainee was told during a disciplinary hearing that the sergeant and corporal sergeant were going to make the detainee's life miserable, were sufficient for the detainee to state a due process claim. The court also held that a retaliation claim was stated by allegations that the state prisoner received false charges, write-ups and accusations from prison officials, was placed in "the hole" or in isolation on numerous occasions, received numerous threats, was denied food and had foreign objects placed in his food. The inmate alleged that these actions were all in retaliation for exercising his right to file grievances, his statements about suing people, and making those on the outside aware of the prison conditions. The court held that these allegations, when construed liberally, set forth a chronology of events from which retaliation could be inferred. According to the court, allegations that the pretrial detainee was denied dinner on several occasions, the toilet in his cell flooded and he was left in his cell for over seven hours, all of the detainee's uneaten food was shaken on the cell floor while prison staff was collecting food trays, the detainee was placed in a cell with blood everywhere and nothing to be protected from exposure, he was intentionally awoken from sleep, was denied recreation, and was not given supplies to clean urine thrown under his cell door, were sufficient for the detainee to state a claim that his conditions of confinement were in violation of the due process clause of Fourteenth Amendment. (James T. Vaughn Correctional Center, Smyrna, Delaware)

U.S. District Court
LIGHTING
SEGREGATION
TRANSFER

Silverstein v. Federal Bureau Of Prisons, 704 F.Supp.2d 1077 (D.Colo. 2010). A federal inmate brought a civil rights action against the Bureau of Prisons and correctional officers, challenging conditions of his confinement. The district court denied the defendants' motion to dismiss in part. The court held that the allegation that the inmate was indefinitely placed in solitary confinement, isolated from other inmates and correctional facility staff, and subjected to continuous lighting and camera surveillance, was sufficient to allege a liberty interest in conditions of his confinement. The court found that the allegation that the inmate was subjected to solitary confinement for more than two decades was sufficient to state claim under the Eighth Amendment against the Bureau. But, according to the court, the inmate did not have a liberty interest in avoiding transfer to administrative segregation facility. (United States Penitentiary, Administrative Maximum facility, Florence, Colorado)

U.S. District Court
EMOTIONAL
DISTRESS
MEDICAL CARE

Tate v. Troutman, 683 F.Supp.2d 897 (E.D.Wis. 2010). A county jail inmate filed a § 1983 action alleging that officials failed to provide constitutionally sufficient medical care. The inmate moved for the entry of a default judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that a county jail officer and medical officials were not personally involved in the allegedly inadequate medical treatment provided to the inmate after a fall in his cell, and thus were not liable under § 1983 for any compensatory or nominal damages for an Eighth Amendment violation. The court noted that even though the inmate suffered pain after the fall and had blood in his bowel movements, the inmate had a history of severe low back and bilateral neck pain, headaches, and rectal bleeding before the fall. The court held that county jail officials failed to provide adequate medical care for the inmate's dislocated shoulder, in violation of the Eighth Amendment, and thus the inmate was entitled to an award of compensatory damages for past pain and suffering. The court noted that the jail physician refused to see the inmate or speak to him, jail officials rejected the inmate's grievances regarding his inadequate medical treatment, and the inmate experienced physical pain and emotional distress for three or four weeks due to his lack of adequate diagnosis and treatment of his shoulder injury by immobilization. The court concluded that an award of $27,000 was the appropriate amount to compensate the inmate for his past pain and suffering, where the inmate experienced pain and suffering for about one month. The court found that county jail officials showed callous indifference towards the inmate's medical needs, and thus a punitive damages award of $9,000 was warranted to deter or punish the Eighth Amendment violation. The court also found that the inmate was entitled to prejudgment interest on the compensatory damage award at an average monthly prime rate compounded annually from the period beginning on the date of his injury through the date of the entry of judgment. (Milwaukee Country Jail, Wisconsin)

U.S. Appeals Court
EXERCISE
SEGREGATION

Thomas v. Ponder, 611 F.3d 1144 (9th Cir. 2010). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against prison officials, alleging violations of the Eighth Amendment. The district court granted the officials' motion for summary judgment and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The court held that the prison officials knew that a serious risk of harm existed for the prisoner, who was denied exercise for nearly 14 months, as required for the prisoner's § 1983 action. According to the court, officials made and reviewed a decision to keep the prisoner confined without out-of-cell exercise, and the prisoner submitted repeated written and oral complaints. The court found that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether prison officials acted reasonably in confining the prisoner for nearly 14 months. The court noted that officials may be more restrictive than they otherwise may be if a genuine emergency exists, and certain services may be suspended temporarily, but the court found that even where security concerns might justify a limitation on permitting a prisoner to mingle with the general prison population, such concerns do not explain why other exercise arrangements are not made. (Salinas Valley State Prison, California)

U.S. Appeals Court
LIGHTS

Torres v. O'Quinn, 612 F.3d 237 (4th Cir. 2010). An inmate brought an action against state prison officials, complaining that the officials failed to repair a malfunctioning night-light in his prison cell, resulting in a disturbing strobe effect. The district court dismissed the complaint for failure to state a claim upon which relief could be granted. The inmate appealed and the appeals court affirmed. The inmate then brought a separate action against prison officials, alleging a constitutional violation due to the prison's prohibition of his subscription to commercially available pictures of nude women. The district court dismissed the action for failure to state a claim upon which relief could be granted, the inmate appealed, and the appeals court dismissed the appeal. The inmate then moved for a partial refund of filing fees that had been collected from his prison trust account, challenging the prison's practice of withholding 40 percent of his account to satisfy the filing fee requirement for his two appeals. The appeals court found that PLRA required that no more than 20 percent of an inmate's monthly income be deducted to pay filing fees, irrespective of the total number of cases or appeals the inmate had pending at any one time. The court held that granting the inmate a partial refund of fees was not warranted since the amounts withheld from the inmate's account were actually owed and were properly, if excessively, collected. (Red Onion State Prison, Virginia)

U.S. District Court
FOOD

Varricchio v. County of Nassau, 702 F.Supp.2d 40 (E.D.N.Y. 2010). A detainee brought a § 1983 action against a county and officials, alleging civil rights violations. The defendants moved for dismissal. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the detainee adequately alleged that he was denied his right to a speedy trial and that he was presumptively prejudiced by the delay, as required to state a § 1983 claim for a Sixth Amendment violation. The detainee alleged he was held for two years in prison prior to receiving trial for the charge of violating a protective order, and that he was subsequently found not guilty. The court held that the detainee adequately alleged that his conditions of confinement constituted cruel and unusual punishment, as required to state an Eighth Amendment claim. The detainee alleged that he received tainted food that contained bodily waste, soap, metal pins, and staples, and that, when he went on a hunger strike to protest his legal situation, deputy sheriffs were taking bets on when he would start eating again. (Nassau County Sheriff's Department, New York)

U.S. District Court
CLOTHING
EQUAL PROTECTION
FOOD

Williams v. Ozmint, 726 F.Supp.2d 589 (D.S.C. 2010). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against correctional facility officials, alleging violations of the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments. The officials filed a motion for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The court held that sanctions imposed upon an inmate who committed sexual misconduct offenses while imprisoned, including wearing a pink jumpsuit for 90 days and eating meals earlier, were rationally related to penological interests, and therefore, did not violate equal protection. According to the court: (1) the jumpsuit provided visual identification to officials, especially female officers; (2) that the inmate had a recent history of sexual misconduct; (3) activity and movement restrictions lessened the risk of the inmate committing another offense that could result in transmission of blood-borne pathogens; and (4) the jumpsuit served as disincentive to engage in the conduct in the first instance. The court found that the requirement that an inmate who committed sexual misconduct offenses while imprisoned wear a pink jumpsuit did not create an objectively intolerable risk of harm in violation of the Eighth Amendment, where the policy was not applied maliciously and sadistically, and absent an imminent and substantial risk of serious harm. (Ridgeland Correctional Institution, South Carolina)

2011

U.S. District Court
CELLS
CROWDING
USE OF FORCE

Bailey v. Hughes, 815 F.Supp.2d 1246 (M.D.Ala. 2011). A state prisoner brought an action against a county sheriff's department, a sheriff, corrections officers, and others, alleging unconstitutional deprivations of his rights while in custody in a county jail. The defendants moved to dismiss and for an award of attorney fees. The district court granted the motions. The district court held that: (1) neither the Fourteenth Amendment nor the Fourth Amendment's excessive force prohibition applied to the sentenced offender; (2) the sheriff and supervisory officials were entitled to qualified immunity; (3) allegations did not state an Eighth Amendment claim based on jail overcrowding; (4) the officers' alleged conduct in tasing the prisoner did not violate the Eighth Amendment; (5) allegations did not state a § 1983 claim for an unconstitutional strip search; (6) placement of the prisoner alone in closet-sized cell for eight hours after the alleged incident did not amount to unconstitutional confinement; and (7) the officers' alleged conduct in searching the prisoner's cell did not amount to retaliation for prisoner's prior lawsuit. The court noted that the prisoner admitted that he repeatedly refused the officers' verbal commands and fled his cell, he was repeatedly warned that he would be shocked if he did not comply with the officers' commands, and he was shocked by a taser only once before he fled his cell and then two to three times after he did so. (Houston County Jail, Alabama)

U.S. District Court
EMOTIONAL DISTRESS
PROGRAMS

Banker v. County of Livingston, 782 F.Supp.2d 39 (W.D.N.Y. 2011). A female patient brought an action against a county and the company that provided court-ordered alcohol treatment and counseling services, alleging she was sexually abused by a counselor while undergoing treatment and counseling. The defendants moved to dismiss and the district court granted the motions. The court held that the plaintiff's allegation that she was required to make unescorted visits to a male area of the jail in order to receive alcohol abuse medication that was mandated as a condition of probation, did not state a claim of a constitutional magnitude as would give rise to the county's municipal liability under § 1983. According to the court, the county's alleged requirement that the plaintiff walk unescorted through portions of the male population jail to receive her medication was not so outrageous as could give rise to the county's liability for negligent infliction of emotional distress (NIED) under New York law, where nothing indicated that the plaintiff's physical safety was threatened. (Livingston County Council on Alcohol and Substance Abuse, Livingston County Jail, New York)

U.S. District Court
DOUBLE CELLING
CELL CAPACITY
CROWDING
MATTRESS
SAFETY

Bradley v. Mason, 833 F.Supp.2d 763 (N.D. Ohio 2011). State inmates filed a § 1983 action asserting multiple causes of action pertaining to their convictions and conditions of confinement. The district court dismissed the case, finding that class certification was not warranted, where the inmates made no attempt to define the class, many claims were specific to named plaintiffs, and the plaintiffs were proceeding pro se.

The court held that a pretrial detainee had no reasonable expectation of privacy in telephone calls made from within jail to individuals other than his attorney, and thus jail officials did not violate the detainee's Fourth Amendment rights by monitoring his calls to his former spouse.

The court found that overcrowded conditions at the county jail, which required two inmates to share a cell designed for one and required inmates to eat meals in their cells, did not amount to cruel and unusual punishment, in violation of the pretrial detainee's due process rights and an inmate's Eighth Amendment rights, absent a showing that conditions of confinement deprived them of the minimal civilized measure of life's necessities, or subjected them to a health risk. The inmates claimed that one inmate was required to sleep on a mattress on the floor cell, which allegedly adds clutter to the floor and increases the risk of injury. The inmates alleged that the jail has more inmates than the day rooms can accommodate at meal time, and inmates are therefore required to eat meals in their cells. (Cuyahoga County Jail, Ohio)

U.S. District Court
SMOKE

Davidson v. Desai, 817 F.Supp.2d 166 (W.D.N.Y. 2011). An inmate at a state prison filed a pro se § 1983 action against prison officials and medical staff alleging that they had been deliberately indifferent to his serious medical needs, and had interfered with his attempts to file grievances regarding his medical care, in violation of the First, Eighth, and Fourteenth Amendments. The defendants moved alternatively for judgment on the pleadings and for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the state inmate's shoulder surgery, related to his degenerative disc disease, was delayed because of the inmate's refusal to submit to a pre-operative chest x-ray, or whether it was delayed due to the prison's deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs. The court also found that the inmate's breathing difficulties and possible asthma did not constitute "sufficiently serious conditions" under the Eighth Amendment, and thus prison officials' failure to house the inmate in a prison infirmary where levels of allergens were allegedly lower than levels in other parts of prison was not deliberate indifference. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the inmate suffered serious health problems caused by exposure to environmental tobacco smoke (ETS), and whether officials knew of, yet disregarded an excessive risk to the inmate's health. (Elmira Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
EMOTIONAL DISTRESS
HARASSMENT

Green v. Floyd County, Ky., 803 F.Supp.2d 652 (E.D.Ky. 2011). The guardian for an inmate, who was severely beaten by fellow inmates during his incarceration, brought a § 1983 action against prison guards for injuries arising from the beatings. The defendants moved for judgment on the pleadings. The district court denied the motion. The court held that the § 1983 one-year statute of limitations was tolled (postponed) by a Kentucky statute since the inmate was "of unsound mind." According to the court, allegations that prison guards stood by while prison inmates led another inmate around by a leash and forced him to act like a dog were sufficient for the inmate's guardian to state a claim of the tort of outrage, under Kentucky law, against the prison guards. The guardian alleged that jail employees improperly classified the inmate, assigning him to a communal cell, and told his cellmates that he had pled guilty to abusing a minor. The guardian alleged that for several days, three of the defendant prison guards turned a blind eye as the cellmates brutally tortured the inmate. According to the guardian, one guard saw the cellmates lead the inmate around by a leash and merely asked them to remove it, and later "egged the prisoners on" by asking them "where's your dog tonight?" After prolonged beatings, the cellmates finally alerted the guards when it appeared the inmate might be dying. The guardian alleged that the inmate suffered a number of broken bones and was in a near-vegetative state, and that, as a result of his injuries, he was incapable of making decisions for himself. (Floyd County, Kentucky)

U.S. District Court
MEDICAL CARE
SANITATION

Hale v. Rao, 768 F.Supp.2d 367 (N.D.N.Y. 2011). An inmate brought an action against prison officials alleging deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs, and alleging that the conditions of his confinement violated the Eighth Amendment. Prison officials moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court excused the state inmate's failure to exhaust administrative remedies prior to bringing the claim in federal court because prison staff had thrown out a grievance filled out by another inmate on the inmate's behalf, refused to provide the inmate with the materials needed to file another grievance, and threatened to physically assault him if he attempted to utilize the grievance procedure. The court noted that the inmate was illiterate and had a poor understanding of the grievance procedure. The court held that the inmate was adequately treated following an alleged assault by a corrections officer, precluding the inmate's claim under the Eighth Amendment alleging deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs. The inmate received medical treatment including at least ten stitches to close the open wounds on his left shin, and an x-ray of his leg to determine if the bone was fractured. Medical staff later re-evaluated his leg injury, cleaned the wound, and provided pain killers. The court found that allegations by the inmate that prison conditions were unsanitary due to the presence of insects in an infirmary room, and that medical staff pulled a staple out of his abdomen by hand, failed to establish the inmate's claim under the Eighth Amendment that his conditions of confinement constituted cruel and unusual punishment, absent evidence that the conditions at the prison prevented the inmate from receiving appropriate medical care. (Downstate Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
CLOTHING
EMOTIONAL DISTRESS
EXERCISE
LIGHTING
MEDICAL CARE
SANITATION
SEGREGATION

Holmes v. Fischer, 764 F.Supp.2d 523 (W.D.N.Y. 2011). A state inmate filed a § 1983 action alleging that prison officials violated his constitutional rights by subjecting him to non-random urinalysis drug testing, confining him in a special housing unit (SHU), and denying medical care. The defendants moved for a more definite statement, to strike the complaint, and to dismiss. The district court denied the motion. The inmate alleged that, while incarcerated in a special housing unit (SHU): (1) he was routinely cuffed from behind, aggravating left shoulder and leg conditions resulting from previous injuries, (2) he was subjected to continuous illumination in his cell, rendering it impossible to sleep; (3) officials interfered with the inmate grievance he attempted to file regarding constant SHU cell illumination; (4) he was denied dental floss; (5) he was denied, during winter months, proper boots, gloves, hat, and thermos; (6) he was exposed to feces thrown by mentally-ill inmates confined to SHU; (7) he was denied proper medical treatment and tests; and (8) he was subjected to urinalysis testing which so traumatized him as to cause physical harm. The court held that these allegations were sufficient to state claims under the Eighth Amendment for cruel and unusual punishment and deliberate indifference to necessary medical care. According to the court, the inmate's allegations that he was subjected to urinalysis based on reports from confidential informants whose credibility and reliability had not been confirmed, despite the complete absence of any history of drug use, and that two random urinalysis tests to which he was subjected were done to retaliate against him for filing inmate grievances regarding non-random urinalysis testing, were sufficient to state an unreasonable search claim under the Fourth Amendment. The court found that the inmate's allegation that, as a result of repeated non-random urinalysis drug testing to which he was subjected, he suffered physical harm, including insomnia, nausea, headaches, burning eyes, aggravation of an old gunshot wound, inability to exercise, and appetite loss, was sufficient to state a cruel and unusual punishment claim under the Eighth Amendment. (Elmira Correctional Facility, and Southport Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
CLASSIFICATION

Murray v. Bledsoe, 650 F.3d 246 (3rd Cir. 2011). An inmate brought a pro se petition for judicial review of a decision of the Federal Bureau of Prisons (BOP) rejecting his claim that he had a right to choose his cellmate. The district court denied relief, and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the inmate had no Ninth Amendment right to choose his cellmate. (Special Management Unit, United States Penitentiary, Lewisburg, Pennsylvania)

U.S. District Court HANDICAPPED INMATES
ADA-Americans with Disabilities Act
FACILITIES
PROGRAMS
SHOWERS
TOILETS

Pierce v. County of Orange, 761 F.Supp.2d 915 (C.D.Cal. 2011). Pretrial detainees in a county's jail facilities brought a § 1983 class action suit against the county and its sheriff, seeking relief for violations of their constitutional and statutory rights. After consolidating the case with a prior case challenging jail conditions, the district court rejected the detainees' claims, and the detainees appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. On remand, the court held that: (1) a sub-class was properly defined as mobility-impaired and dexterity-impaired pretrial detainees; (2) the detainees were subject to physical barriers to accessibility of jail facilities, in violation of ADA; (3) certain categories of programs, services, and activities were not similarly available to the detainees, in violation of ADA; (4) the county failed to establish that accommodations requested by the detainees would require fundamental alteration or produce an undue burden, or that current conditions were reasonably related to the facilities' legitimate interests; (5) the county's revised grievance procedure satisfied ADA; and (6) the least intrusive means to compel the county to remedy physical barriers and disparate provision of programs, services, and activities to detainees was to allow the county to draft a proposed plan. The court held that the widespread injunctive relief ordered by the district court, which addressed the county's failure to accommodate detainees with respect to toilets and showers, as well as programs, activities, and services, was narrowly drawn, extended no further than necessary to correct violations of the detainees' federal rights, and was the least intrusive means necessary to correct violation of those federal rights, as required by the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA). (Orange County Jail System, California, including the Central Jail Complex, the Intake Release Center, the Men's Central Jail, the Women's Central Jail and the James A. Facility Musick and the Theo Lacy Facility)

U.S. District Court ODOR
SANITATION

Rodriguez-Sanchez v. Acevedo-Vila, 763 F.Supp.2d 294 (D.Puerto Rico 2011). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against a prison warden and a director of corrections for alleged violation of his Eighth Amendment right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment. The district court held that the prison warden was liable for an Eighth Amendment violation but the inmate was not entitled to a judgment against the director of corrections. The court found that the inmate was entitled to $1,000 per day for pain and suffering and to a punitive damages award of $10,000 from the warden. According to the court, the warden was liable to the inmate for violating the inmate's Eighth Amendment right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment because the inhumane conditions to which the inmate was subjected in his cell included the lack of an adequate place to sit, no working toilet, shower runoff water channeled through the cell, and foul odors. The court held that these conditions were the result of design and not of accident or happenstance, and were known to the prison officials in charge and in control, including the warden. (Correctional Institution Annex 296, Guayama, Puerto Rico)

U.S. District Court
BEDDING
CLOTHING
ISOLATION
JUVENILES LIGHTS
PROGRAMS
TEMPERATURE

Troy D. v. Mickens, 806 F.Supp.2d 758 (D.N.J. 2011). Two juvenile delinquents brought a § 1983 action against mental health providers and the New Jersey Juvenile Justice Commission (JJC), alleging that the actions of the defendants while the delinquents were in custody violated the Fourteenth Amendment and New Jersey law. One of the plaintiffs was 15 years old when he was adjudicated as delinquent and remained in custody for a total of 225 days. For approximately 178 of those days, the delinquent was held in isolation under a special observation status requiring close or constant watch, purportedly for his own safety. Although the delinquents were placed in isolation for different reasons, the conditions they experienced were similar. Each was confined to a seven-foot-by-seven-foot room and allowed out only for hygiene purposes. The rooms contained only a concrete bed slab, a toilet, a sink, and a mattress pad. One delinquent was allegedly held in extreme cold, and the other was allegedly isolated for four days in extreme heat. Both were denied any educational materials or programming, and were prevented from interacting with their peers. One delinquent's mattress pad was often removed, a light remained on for 24 hours a day, and he was often required to wear a bulky, sleeveless smock. Both delinquents were allegedly denied mental health treatment during their periods in isolation.

The defendants filed a motion for summary judgment. The district court denied the motion. The court held that there was no evidence that a juvenile delinquent housed in New Jersey Juvenile Justice Commission (JJC) facilities was educated about filing a form with a social worker as the procedure for filing an administrative grievance, as required for the procedure to be available to the delinquent to exhaust his § 1983 claims against JJC and mental health providers. The court also found that there was no evidence the New Jersey Juvenile Justice Commission (JJC) provided written notice to the juvenile delinquent housed at JJC facilities of the opportunity to appeal their disciplinary sanctions, which would have triggered the requirement that he appeal each sanction within 48 hours of notice, as required to exhaust administrative remedies.

The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to: (1) whether the New Jersey Juvenile Justice Commission (JJC) and mental health providers were deliberately indifferent towards conditions of confinement, in protecting and in providing medical care for the juvenile delinquent housed in JJC facilities; (2) whether placing the juvenile delinquent housed in temporary close custody and special observation status implicated a liberty interest; (3) whether a juvenile delinquent housed in New Jersey Juvenile Justice Commission (JJC) facilities had procedural due process protections available to him upon a change of status; (4) whether the juvenile delinquent had a liberty interest implicated in his transfer to a more restrictive placement; (5) whether the juvenile delinquent had sufficient procedural due process protections available to him upon transfer to a more restrictive placement; and (6) whether the New Jersey Juvenile Justice Commission (JJC) and mental health providers acted with malice or reckless indifference. (New Jersey Juvenile Justice Commission, Juvenile Medium Security Facility, New Jersey Training School, Juvenile Reception and Assessment Center)

U.S. District Court
CROWDING
MEDICAL CARE
SANITATION
USE OF FORCE

U.S. v. Cook County, Illinois, 761 F.Supp.2d 794 (N.D.Ill. 2011). The U.S. Department of Justice (DOJ) brought an action against a county, alleging conditions in a county jail violated the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment. Following entry of a consent decree, the county moved for entry of a prisoner release order. The district court denied the motion. The court held that while overcrowding was a primary cause of the unconstitutional conditions at the jail and a prisoner release order was the least intrusive form of relief for overcrowding in the jail, the proposed prisoner release order was not narrowly drawn or sufficiently specific, and thus the grant of the order was not warranted. The court noted that conditions of overcrowding caused guards to resort to excessive force, incidents involving guards' use of excessive force were more frequent on days the jail was overcrowded, overcrowding caused grossly unsanitary and unhealthy conditions, and chronic overcrowding of the jail's medical facilities resulted in inadequate medical and mental-health care. According to the court, the proposed order did not explain or justify the number of inmates who would be affected by the order or the number of inmates that would be released annually, did not specify which class or classes of prisoners would be eligible for release or what grounds were to be used in deciding whether an inmate should be released on their own recognizance or released on electronic monitoring, or provide assurance that adequate funding would be available for electronic monitoring equipment or that prisoners released to electronic monitoring would be effectively monitored. (Cook County Jail, Illinois)

2012

U.S. District Court
ADA- Americans with Disabilities Act
STATE REQUIREMENTS

Armstrong v. Brown, 857 F.Supp.2d 919 (N.D.Cal. 2012). Disabled state prisoners and parolees brought a class action against state prison officials, alleging violations of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) and the Rehabilitation Act. Seventeen years later, plaintiffs moved for an order requiring officials to track and accommodate the needs of class members housed in county jails and to provide a workable grievance procedure. Following remand to allow the development of additional evidence, the prisoners and parolees filed a renewed motion. The district court granted the motion and entered an enforce order. The court held that: (1) officials' efforts to comply with ADA, the Rehabilitation Act, and prior orders were inadequate and ineffective on a system-wide level; (2) system-wide injunctive relief was appropriate; (3) district court would not abstain from exercising its jurisdiction over matters pertaining to county jails; (4) a stay of the prior order was not warranted; and (5) the district court would exercise its retained jurisdiction to enforce the injunction. The court held that state officials were obliged to ensure ADA-compliant conditions for prisoners and parolees that they housed under their own authority in county jails. (California Youth and Adult Corrections Authority, Board of Prison Terms, Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
SMOKE

Baker v. U.S., 670 F.3d 448 (3rd Cir. 2012). A prisoner, proceeding pro se, brought an action against the government and others under the Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA), alleging personal injuries caused by his exposure to second-hand smoke while incarcerated. The district court granted the defendants' motion to dismiss and the government's motion to dismiss. The appeals court affirmed on other grounds. (McKean Federal Correctional Institution, Pennsylvania)

U.S. District Court
MATTRESS
MEDICAL CARE

Bell v. Luna, 856 F.Supp.2d 388 (D.Conn. 2012). A state inmate brought a § 1983 action against prison officials and a prison doctor, alleging that the defendants subjected him to unconstitutional conditions of confinement and showed deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs, in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The defendants moved to dismiss for failure to state claim. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the state prison doctor was not deliberately indifferent to the inmate's health in failing to take sufficient measures to treat the inmate's joint and back pain, or in failing to prescribe the inmate with an analgesic cream, as would violate the inmate's Eighth Amendment rights. The court found that forcing the inmate to go nearly seven months with a torn, partially unstuffed, unhygienic mattress was a condition of confinement sufficiently serious to implicate the Eighth Amendment. According to the court, the inmate's allegations that a unit manager "willfully, wantonly, and maliciously disregarded" the inmate's repeated requests for an adequate and hygienic mattress stated a claim under § 1983 against the manager for cruel and unusual punishment in violation of his Eighth Amendment rights. The court held that the unit manager was not entitled to qualified immunity from the inmate's § 1983 claim where the law of the Second Circuit would have put the manager on notice at the time of the alleged violation that failing to provide the inmate with an hygienic, working mattress for over half a year ran afoul of the Eighth Amendment. (MacDougall-Walker Correctional Institution, Connecticut)

U.S. District Court
EXERCISE
MEDICAL CARE PROGRAMS
TRANSFER
WORK

Catanzaro v. Harry, 848 F.Supp.2d 780 (W.D.Mich. 2012). A state prisoner, proceeding pro se, brought a § 1983 action against a state department of corrections, department officials, a warden, parole board members, and numerous prison and department employees, alleging violation of his due process rights, violation of the Fourth Amendment, denial of adequate medical care, his right to free exercise of religion, equal protection, access to courts, and retaliation. The district court held that: (1) the prisoner had no protected interest in early release on parole; (2) the requirement that the prisoner complete a sex-offender treatment program as condition for parole did not violate the Due Process Clause as the condition for parole did not exceed the sentence imposed on the prisoner; (3) the prisoner's conditions at sex-offender treatment facility did not implicate the prisoner's right to procedural due process, notwithstanding the fact that the prisoner did not have access to recreational facilities or a law library, the prisoner could not work, the prisoner had to arrange for his own health care, and the prisoner did not have the opportunity to attend religious services; (4) the transfer of the prisoner to facility for sex-offender treatment program did not violate his right to substantive due process; and (5) the prisoner stated a claim for violation of Free Exercise Clause. (Cooper Street Correctional Facility, Residential Sex Offender Program (RSOP) at the Kalamazoo, and Probation Enhancement Program in Muskegon, Michigan)

U.S. District Court
FOOD
MEDICAL CARE
SHOWERS

Dilworth v. Goldberg, 914 F.Supp.2d 433 (S.D.N.Y. 2012). A released pretrial detainee and his wife brought an action against a county, its health care corporation, and 47 related individuals, for federal and state claims arising from his confinement at a county jail. The district court partially dismissed the claims and the plaintiffs moved to amend. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court found that New York's three-year limitations period began to run on the date in which the pretrial detainee was directed by an officer to sign fraudulent papers indicating he caused his own injuries and that would waive his legal claims against the county and jail officials. According to the court, it was appropriate for the now-released pretrial detainee to amend his complaint to assert his section 1983 unconstitutional conditions of confinement claim, under the Eighth Amendment, against the officer, since there were sufficient allegations in the proposed pleading to support the claim. The court noted that loss of consortium claims are not cognizable under § 1983 because they do not involve an injury based on a deprivation of the plaintiff's rights, privileges, and immunities. The detainee, an African-American, was detained in the jail when he slipped and fell on wet wax that had been left on a corridor floor by a trustee inmate. He "suffered severe injuries to his head, back, and right arm, and lost consciousness due to the fall."He was taken the jail infirmary and given a " cursory " examination, which allegedly resulted in the understatement of his actual medical condition. Rather than allowing him to return to his cell to rest, he was ordered to go to a visit and he was threatened with a charge of disobeying a direct order if he did not comply. He suffered several subsequent health problems but was not taken to an outside source of medical care. He was given a wheelchair and assigned to a dormitory with inmates who had medical problems. While confined in the dorm he was allegedly denied meals on several occasions, was not able to take a shower, and was refused pain medication. He alleged further complaints about his treatment and conditions. (Westchester County Department of Corrections, New York Medical College, Westchester County Health Care Corporation, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
CLOTHING
ISOLATION
RESTRAINTS

Gruenberg v. Gempeler, 697 F.3d 573 (7th Cir. 2012). A state prisoner, proceeding pro se, filed a § 1983 action against various prison officials, guards, and medical staff, alleging violations of the Eighth Amendment. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that: (1) the prisoner did not have a clearly established right to not be continually restrained without clothing or cover in a cell for five days following his ingestion of a handcuff key, the master key for belt restraints, and the key used for opening cell doors, where restraint had been imposed to keep the prisoner from re-ingesting those keys; (2) the continuous restraint of the prisoner without clothing or cover in a cell for five days did not violate his Fourteenth Amendment due process rights; (3) the prisoner's Fourth Amendment and Fourteenth Amendment substantive due process claims were barred; and (4) the district court did not abuse its discretion by ruling that the prisoner was competent to advance his case and was not entitled to appointed counsel. (Waupun Correction Institution, Wisconsin)

U.S. District Court
EMOTIONAL
DISTRESS
EQUAL PROTECTION

Harris v. Hammon, 914 F.Supp.2d 1026 (D.Minn. 2012). A prisoner brought a § 1983 action against a county and various officials with the state department of corrections (DOC), alleging violations of the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments, as well as state law claims for false imprisonment, intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED), and negligent infliction of emotional distress (NIED). The defendants moved for summary judgment and for judgment on the pleadings. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that there was no evidence of a continuing, widespread pattern of misconduct on account of county employees in not releasing prisoners pursuant to court orders, as required for the prisoner's § 1983 failure-to-train claims against the county for alleged violations of the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments. The prisoner had been held for more than five days after a judge ordered his release pending his appeal. According to the court, the former prisoner's allegations were sufficient to plead that department of corrections (DOC) employees were deliberately indifferent to the prisoner's liberty rights under the Fourteenth Amendment, as required to state a § 1983 claim for violations of his due process rights based on his continued detention after a court ordered his release. The prisoner alleged that he had a court order for his release but he was returned to prison, that a judge faxed and mailed the release order to the prison after being contacted by the prisoner's attorney the next day, that the judge's clerk also telephoned employees to inform them that the prisoner was to be released, that one employee did not respond to calls from the prisoner's attorney, that another employee told the attorney he would have to hand deliver a certified copy of order by the end of her shift in three minutes so that the prisoner could be released before the weekend, and that employees told the attorney several days later that they might not be able to release the prisoner because the order could be invalid. The court also held that the prisoner's allegations were sufficient to plead that his continued detention, after his release was ordered by a judge, violated a clearly established right, as required to overcome qualified immunity for department of corrections (DOC) employees. (Lino Lakes Correctional Facility, Ramsey County Jail, Minnesota)

U.S. Appeals Court
CIVIL COMMITMENT
CONDITIONS
PROGRAMS

Hydrick v. Hunter, 669 F.3d 937 (9th Cir. 2012). Sexual offenders who were civilly confined in a state psychiatric hospital under California's Sexually Violent Predators Act (SVP) filed a class action against various state officials under § 1983, challenging conditions of their confinement. The district court denied the defendants' motion to dismiss, and the defendants filed an interlocutory appeal. The appeals court affirmed in part and reversed in part. Certiorari was granted. The United States Supreme Court vacated and remanded. On remand, the appeals court held that the defendants were entitled to qualified immunity. According to the court, the civilly committed persons failed to plead plausible claims against the state hospital's administrators and supervisory officials in their individual capacities, and thus the administrators and officials were entitled to qualified immunity from liability for money damages under § 1983, where there was no allegation of a specific policy or custom that caused constitutional deprivations, and no specific allegations regarding each defendant's purported knowledge of deprivations. (Atascadero State Hospital, California)

U.S. Appeals Court
ADA- Americans with Disabilities Act DINING SHOWERS
TOILETS

Jaros v. Illinois Dept. of Corrections, 684 F.3d 667 (7th Cir. 2012). A former inmate sued the Illinois Department of Corrections, its Director, and several employees claiming violations of the Rehabilitation Act, the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), and the Eighth Amendment. The district court dismissed the complaint for failure to state a claim, and the former inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, vacated in part, and remanded. The appeals court held that the inmate's allegations that his use of the toilets and showers at the prison was made more difficult by the absence of grab bars did not state an Eighth Amendment claim, where the inmate was able to shower four times a month. He also missed meals on occasion because he could not walk fast enough to the cafeteria. The court found that the prisoner pleaded a plausible claim for failure to make reasonable accommodations under the Rehabilitation Act where he alleged that the Department of Corrections refused to accommodate his disability, and consequently kept him from accessing meals and showers on the same basis as other inmates. (Vandalia Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
DISCIPLINE
ISOLATION
PRETRIAL DETAINEES

Johnston v. Maha, 845 F.Supp.2d 535 (W.D.N.Y. 2012). A pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against a county sheriff, employees of a county jail, and others, alleging, among other things, violations of his Eighth Amendment right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment and his Fourteenth Amendment right to due process. The district court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment, and the detainee appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, vacated in part, and remanded for further proceedings. On remand, the district court held that: (1) a fact issue as to whether a correctional officer assaulted the detainee precluded summary judgment on the detainee's Eighth Amendment claim; (2) summary judgment was precluded by fact issue as to whether the detainee was twice placed in isolation as a form of punishment without being given advance notice or opportunity to be heard; and (3) summary judgment was precluded by a fact issue as to whether the detainee exhausted administrative remedies as to the claim that a correctional officer placed him in an isolation cell without prior notice. (Genesee County Jail, New York)

U.S. District Court
EMOTIONAL
DISTRESS
MEDICAL CARE

Jones v. Correctional Medical Services, Inc., 845 F.Supp.2d 824 (W.D.Mich. 2012). The personal representative of the estate of an inmate, who died of viral meningoenzephalitis while under the control of the Michigan Department of Corrections (MDOC), brought an action against prison officials and personnel, as well as the company which contracted to provide medical services to the inmate and the company's employees, alleging that the defendants violated the inmate's Eighth Amendment right to adequate medical care. The representative also asserted state law claims for gross negligence and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The court held that the company that provided medical services to inmates under a contract with the Michigan Department of Corrections (MDOC) could not be held liable under § 1983 on a supervisory liability theory in the action brought by the personal representative, but the company was subject to suit under § 1983. The court found that the personal representative failed to establish that policies or customs of the company which provided medical services to inmates under contract with the MDOC were involved in the inmate's treatment, as required to sustain a § 1983 Eighth Amendment claim against the company based on the inmate's alleged inadequate medical treatment. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the doctor employed by company was aware of the serious medical needs of the inmate, as to whether the doctor's treatment of the inmate displayed deliberate indifference, and as to whether the doctor's inaction or delay proximately caused the inmate's death. (Ernest Brooks Facility, Michigan, and Correctional Medical Services)

U.S. Appeals Court
CIVIL COMMITMENT
CONDITIONS

Lane v. Williams, 689 F.3d 879 (7th Cir. 2012). Convicted sex offenders who, after completing their sentences, remained in state custody as civil detainees pursuant to the Illinois Sexually Violent Persons Commitment Act, brought a § 1983 action, alleging constitutional problems with the conditions of their confinement at a treatment facility. The district court granted summary judgment to the defendants and the detainees appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that security restrictions on face-to-face interactions between the civil detainees held in different units within the state's treatment facility for sexually violent persons (SVP) did not constitute treatment decisions which, as a matter of due process, had to be made by health professionals, merely because the security restrictions affected treatment options. The court found that requiring the civil detainees to use United States Mail, rather than the facility's internal mail system, to send letters to detainees in the facility's other units did not violate the detainees' First Amendment associational rights, even if the facility's internal mail system was a superior means of sending letters. The court noted that commitment under the Illinois Sexually Violent Persons Commitment Act is civil and may be for purposes such as incapacitation and treatment, but not for punishment. As a general matter, persons who have been involuntarily civilly committed are entitled to more considerate treatment and conditions of confinement than criminals whose conditions of confinement are designed to punish. (Rushville Treatment and Detention Center, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
EXERCISE
ADA- Americans with Disabilities Act

Norfleet v. Walker, 684 F.3d 688 (7th Cir. 2012). An Illinois state prisoner, who was wheelchair-bound due to a "nerve condition," brought an action against several prison employees, alleging that refusing to allow him to engage in physical outdoor recreational activity violated the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA). The prisoner was housed in segregation, therefore confined to his one-person cell 23 hours a day. The district court dismissed the action and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court vacated and remanded. The appeals court found that an alleged prison "quorum rule" that will not allow a disabled inmate to engage in outdoor recreation unless at least nine other disabled inmates want to do so as well, seemed arbitrary. The court noted that recreation, including aerobic exercises that cannot be performed in a cell, is particularly important to the health of a person confined to a wheelchair. According to the court, whether seven weeks without such recreation can result in serious harm to someone in the plaintiff's condition is a separate question not yet addressed in the litigation. (Pinckneyville Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
ISOLATION
MEDICAL CARE

Parkell v. Danberg, 871 F.Supp.2d 341 (D.Del. 2012). A state inmate who developed a staphylococcus infection brought an action against the corporation that contracted with the prison to provide medical services to inmates and the corporation's employees, alleging under § 1983 that the defendants were deliberately indifferent to his serious medical needs, in violation of Eighth Amendment. The inmate also alleged that the corporation violated his substantive due process rights by refusing to treat him while he was housed in isolation. The defendants moved to dismiss for failure to state a claim. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The district court held that the inmate stated a § 1983 Eighth Amendment medical needs claim against the employee with his allegations in his complaint that: (1) an employee of the corporation refused to examine the inmate; (2) the employee ignored the inmate's complaints of an infected arm, and refused to administer a pain reliever; (3) over the next few days his condition worsened and correctional officers notified the on-duty physician regarding the inmate's condition; and (4) the physician performed a medical procedure on the inmate's elbow approximately one week following his visit with the employee. The court found that the inmate stated a § 1983 Eighth Amendment medical needs claim against the corporation with his allegations that the corporation had policies, customs, or practices of refusing to treat the inmate, who developed a staphylococcus infection, particularly when he was housed in isolation. According to the court, the inmate stated a § 1983 substantive due process claim against the corporation with his allegations that he was subjected to conditions significantly worse than other inmates under similar circumstances, and that because of his security classification, the corporation refused to treat him while housed in isolation, and refused to enter his cell to provide treatment while he was housed in the infirmary. (Howard R. Young Corr'l. Institution, Delaware)

U.S. District Court
SEGREGATION

Peoples v. Fischer, 898 F.Supp.2d 618 (S.D.N.Y. 2012). A state prisoner who was housed in segregation for over two years brought an action against prison officials, alleging the defendants violated his right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment. After the district court dismissed the prisoner's complaint in part, the defendants moved for reconsideration. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the prison officials were arguably put on sufficient notice that a sentence of three years of special housing unit (SHU) confinement for a non-violent infraction of prison rules could well be found to be grossly disproportionate and, therefore, in violation of the Eighth Amendment, such that the conduct of the prison officials in sentencing the prisoner to such a sentence could be found to have violated the prisoner's clearly established right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment. The court denied qualified immunity for the prison officials, noting that numerous courts had found that long stretches of segregation could constitute cruel and unusual punishment, and courts had repeatedly determined that the conditions of segregated confinement were unconstitutional if they did not meet certain minimum standards. The court noted that the prisoner was housed in segregation for over two years even though there was never any finding that he posed a threat to the safety of others or the security of the prison. (Upstate Correctional Facility, Green Haven Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
ADA- Americans with Disabilities Act
EXERCISE
MEDICAL CARE
PRETRIAL DETAINEES

Pierce v. County of Orange, 905 F.Supp.2d 1017 (C.D.Cal. 2012). Pretrial detainees in a county's jail facilities brought a § 1983 class action suit against the county and its sheriff, seeking relief for violations of their constitutional and statutory rights. After consolidating the case with a prior case challenging jail conditions, the district court rejected the detainees' claims, and the detainees appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. On remand, following a bench trial, the district court entered a final judgment and a permanent injunction, and the detainees renewed their motion for attorney fees. The district court granted the motion. The court held that: (1) attorneys were entitled to compensation for time spent taking calls from inmates and performing pre-trial preparation; (2) time spent unsuccessfully opposing a motion for sanctions was not compensable as part of fee award; (3) a 50%/50% split between pre-appeal constitutional claims and Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) claims was appropriate; (4) reduction in the fee award in the amount of 30% was warranted based on the detainees' limited success on their constitutional claims; and (5) application of a multiplier to the lodestar calculations, under the provisions of the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) was not warranted. The case began in 2001, a class of pre-trial detainees in the Orange County, California, jails, filed a lawsuit against the County under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 for violations of their Fourteenth Amendment due process rights for the County's operation of the County jails in an unconstitutional manner. Allegations included depriving detainees of opportunities for exercise and restricting their ability to practice religion. (Orange County, California)

U.S. Appeals Court
CHANGE OF CONDITIONS
SAFETY
SEGREGATION

Rezaq v. Nalley, 677 F.3d 1001 (10th Cir. 2012). Federal inmates, who were convicted of terrorism-related offenses, brought an action against the Federal Bureau of Prisons (BOP) and BOP officials, alleging that they had a liberty interest in avoiding transfer without due process to the Administrative Maximum Prison (ADX). The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The inmates appealed. The appeals court held that the action was not moot, even though the inmates were currently housed in less-restrictive facilities when compared to ADX, where the inmates' transfers to less-restrictive facilities did not completely and irrevocably eradicate the effects of the alleged violation because the inmates were never returned to their pre-ADX placements, and some prospective relief remained available. The court found that the inmates did not have a liberty interest in avoiding conditions of confinement at Administrative Maximum Prison (ADX), and thus the inmates were not entitled to due process in the BOP's transfer determination. According to the court, the inmates' segregated confinement related to and furthered by the BOP's legitimate penological interests in prison safety and national security, conditions of confinement at ADX, although undeniably harsh, were not extreme, inmates' placements at ADX did not increase the duration of their confinement, and the inmates' placements at ADX were not indeterminate, as the inmates were given regular reevaluations of their placements in the form of twice-yearly program reviews. (Administrative Maximum Prison, Florence, Colorado)

U.S. Appeals Court
HYGIENE
MEDICAL CARE
PRETRIAL DETAINEES
SEPARATION

Rice ex rel. Rice v. Correctional Medical Services, 675 F.3d 650 (7th Cir. 2012). Following a pretrial detainee's death while incarcerated, his parents, representing his estate filed suit pursuant to § 1983, alleging among other things that jail officials and medical personnel had deprived the pretrial detainee of due process by exhibiting deliberate indifference to his declining mental and physical condition. The district court entered summary judgment against the estate. The estate filed a second suit reasserting the state wrongful death claims that the judge in the first suit had dismissed without prejudice after disposing of the federal claims. The district court dismissed that case on the basis of collateral estoppel, and the estate appealed both judgments. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The appeals court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether jail officials were deliberately indifferent to the pretrial detainee's conditions of confinement, and whether his conditions of confinement were sufficiently serious to support his Fourteenth Amendment due process claim. The court noted that whether the detainee himself created the unsanitary conditions was a fact relevant to the claim, but given detainee's mental condition, it did not foreclose the claim. The court found that the estate failed to show that the detainee's assignment to an administrative segregation unit of the jail for approximately seven months violated the detainee's due process rights, where the estate failed to identify feasible alternatives and to tender evidence supporting the contention that the detainee likely would have fared better in one of those alternative placements. The court held that jail officials did not employ excessive force, in violation of due process, to the pretrial detainee who had been fighting with his cellmate and failed to comply with a directive that he step out of his cell which he refused to leave for 18 hours, by spraying his face with pepper foam, and placing him in a restraint chair. The court held that jail officials did not have notice of a substantial risk that the mentally ill pretrial detainee might be assaulted by other inmates, as required to support the pretrial detainee's claim of deliberate indifference in violation of due process. The court noted that while jail personnel were aware that the detainee had a hygiene problem, they had no notice that he was at risk of assault because of that problem, particularly within the more secure confines of the administrative segregation unit. The court found that neither jail guards or supervisors were deliberately indifferent to the risk that the mentally ill pretrial detainee might engage in a behavior such as compulsive water drinking that would cause him to die within a matter of hours and did not consciously disregarded that risk, and therefore they were not liable for his death under § 1983. According to the court, while a factfinder might conclude that the guards exhibited a generalized recklessness with respect to the safety of the inmates housed in the administrative segregation unit by failing to conduct hourly checks of the unit, there was no evidence that the guards or supervisors were subjectively aware of the possibility that the detainee might injure himself to the point of death before anyone could intervene. (Elkhart County Jail, Indiana)

U.S. Appeals Court
FOOD

Taylor v. Dormire, 690 F.3d 898 (8th Cir. 2012). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against prison officials, alleging that the officials refused to feed the prisoner for several days while he was restrained in connection with his removal from his cell, based on his declaration of his cellmate as an enemy. The district court entered judgment on the jury's verdict for the officials. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The appeals court held that the district court's error was not harmless as to its failure to give the prisoner's requested instruction on nominal damages. The court noted that the jury had been instructed that damages constituted a required element of a verdict in favor of the prisoner and that if any element was not proven then the verdict had to be in favor of prison officials. According to the court, the jury must have considered the damages issue, since it wrote a symbol for "zero" in the space on the verdict form for damages. (Jefferson City Correctional Center, Missouri)

U.S. District Court ALIENS
CLOTHING
EQUAL PROTECTION
FOOD
MEDICAL CARE PROGRAMS
SANITATION

U.S. v. Maricopa County, Ariz., 915 F.Supp.2d 1073 (D.Ariz. 2012). The United States filed an action against a county, the county sheriff's office, and the sheriff in his official capacity, relating to treatment of Latinos, including jail detainees, and asserting claims for violations of the Fourth Amendment, retaliation in violation of the First Amendment, violations of equal protection and due process, and discrimination on the basis of race, color, or national origin in violation of Title VI and the Violent Crime Control and Law Enforcement Act. The defendants filed motions to dismiss. The district court denied the county's motion, and granted the sheriff and sheriff's office motions in part and denied in part. The court held that the sheriff's office was an entity that was not capable of being sued in its own name. The court held that the allegations stated a claim under Title VI for disparate impact discrimination, stated a claim for retaliation in violation of the First Amendment, and that the allegations satisfied the requirements for pleading the municipal liability of the county. According to the court, allegations by the United States, that officers from the county sheriff's office routinely and unlawfully targeted Latinos through pretextual traffic stops, crime suppression sweeps, and worksite raids, and that as a result Latinos were far more likely to be deprived of their constitutional rights than non-Latinos, stated a claim for disparate impact discrimination under Title VI by programs or activities receiving federal financial assistance. The court also found that allegations that a former Arizona county attorney acted in concert with the county sheriff's office and the sheriff to file a baseless lawsuit accusing people who had publicly criticized the defendants, and to file baseless state bar complaints against attorneys who spoke out against defendants, and that the defendants used unjustified arrests to intimidate and retaliate against critics of their immigration policies, stated a claim under the Violent Crime Control and Law Enforcement Act for retaliation for exercising First Amendment rights. (Maricopa County Sheriff's Office, Sheriff Joseph M. Arpaio, Arizona)

U.S. District Court
CONDITIONS
SEGREGATION

Vogelfang v. Capra, 889 F.Supp.2d 489 (S.D.N.Y. 2012). A female state inmate filed a pro se § 1983 action against a prison's correction officers, officials, and medical staff, asserting 25 claims contesting the conditions of her confinement and the conduct of the staff. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the inmate's complaint stated due process claims based on insufficient notice of a disciplinary hearing and on the inmate's allegedly improper removal from a disciplinary hearing. According to the court, the pro se state inmate's allegations that she was denied access to a computer failed to state a claim against prison officials for due process violations absent allegations that such denial constituted an atypical and significant hardship to her. Although the inmate claimed that it was impossible for her to perform legal work because courts no longer accepted hand-written documents, the court did not prohibit hand-written documents and had accepted them on prior motions in the inmate's case. The court held that the inmate stated a First Amendment retaliation claim under § 1983 against a male prison correction officer by alleging that the officer had written a false inmate misbehavior report (IMR) against her three days after she had filed a grievance against him for performing a degrading sexual act in front of her, and that because of the false report she had been forced to spend three months in the prison's special housing unit (SHU). (Bedford Hills Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
EMOTIONAL DISTRESS
FOOD
SEGREGATION

Watison v. Carter, 668 F.3d 1108 (9th Cir. 2012). A state inmate brought a pro se § 1983 action against prison officials, alleging violations of his federal constitutional rights and Nevada laws. The district court dismissed the complaint with prejudice pursuant to the in forma pauperis (IFP) statute, and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded with instructions. The court held that the humiliation that the state inmate suffered during an alleged incident did not rise to the level of severe psychological pain as required to state an Eighth Amendment claim. The inmate alleged that a correctional officer entered the inmate's cell while the inmate was on the toilet and, while the inmate was still on the toilet, rubbed his thigh against inmate's thigh and smiled in sexual manner, then left the cell laughing. The court found that the inmate sufficiently alleged a First Amendment retaliation claim against a correctional officer and an associate warden by alleging that he engaged in protected conduct by filing grievances against the officer and alleging: (1) that the officer and the associate warden took adverse actions against him, including filing of a false disciplinary charge against him, placing him in administrative segregation, and telling lies that resulted in denial of his parole, and (2) that such adverse actions were taken shortly after, and in retaliation for, the filing of grievances, and that the adverse actions, which involved more than minimal harms, had no legitimate penological reason. The court held that the inmate sufficiently alleged a First Amendment retaliation claim against a correctional officer by asserting that he had filed grievances against the officer, who allegedly refused to give him his breakfast, that the officer mentioned grievances during same interaction in which the officer refused to give the inmate his breakfast, that the officer's conduct was retaliatory, and that the inmate also asked during the same interaction to file an additional grievance about the denial of breakfast. (Nevada State Prison)

U.S. District Court
ADA- Americans with Disabilities Act
BEDS
FACILITIES
SHOWERS
TOILETS

Wilkins-Jones v. County of Alameda, 859 F.Supp.2d 1039 (N.D.Cal. 2012). A detainee at a county jail who had limited mobility and deformed hands as a result of systemic lupus and rheumatoid arthritis brought an action against the contractor that provided medical care assessment services for detainees, and its employees, alleging violations of Title II of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), the California Disabled Persons Act (CDPA), and the California Unruh Civil Rights Act. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that: (1) the private contractor was not liable as a public entity or instrumentality under the ADA; (2) the contractor qualified as a "business establishment," under the California Unruh Civil Rights Act; (3) the complaint properly asserted a deprivation of full and equal accommodations, as required to state a claim under the California Unruh Civil Rights Act; (4) the allegations were insufficient to assert intentional discrimination, as required to state a claim against the contractor for violation of the California Unruh Civil Rights Act; (5) the CDPA applied to county jails and the accommodations and services provided therein; and (6) the allegations stated a claim against contractor under the CDPA. The jail inmate who had limited mobility and deformed hands alleged that she was unable to use the toilet in the jail as needed, causing her injuries, and that she was deprived of access to jail's facilities, beds, showers, walkways, and benches. According to the court, this properly asserted a deprivation of full and equal accommodations, as required to state a claim against the private contractor that contracted with county to provide medical care assessment services for the county jail. (County of Alameda, California)

U.S. District Court HANDICAPPED INMATES
PRETRIAL DETAINEES
SAFETY

Woods v. City of Utica, 902 F.Supp.2d 273 (N.D.N.Y. 2012). A wheelchair-using, paraplegic arrestee sued a city, police officer, a county, a former sheriff, and county corrections officers, bringing federal causes of action for violations of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), the Rehabilitation Act, and Fourteenth Amendment equal protection and due process. The arrestee alleged that he was lifted out of his wheelchair and placed on the floor of a sheriff's van, forcing him to maneuver himself onto a bench seat which caused his pants and underwear to fall, exposing his genitals, that he was not secured to the bench with a seatbelt, causing him to be thrown about the passenger compartment and suffer leg spasms during his ride to the jail, that he was forced to urinate into an empty soda bottle and handle his sterile catheter with his hands that were dirty from moving himself around the floor of the van, and that the county corrections officers stood by as he struggled to maneuver himself out of the van and into his wheelchair while other inmates watched. The city and county defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court held that: (1) the city did not fail to accommodate the arrestee's disability, for purposes of the ADA and Rehabilitation Act claims; (2) summary judgment was precluded by fact issues as to whether the arrestee was denied the benefit of safe and appropriate transportation by the county on the day of his arrest when he was moved from a police station to a county jail; (3) the county was entitled to summary judgment to the extent the arrestee's claims involved his transportation from the jail to court proceedings on two other dates; (4) fact issues existed as to whether the county defendants were deliberately indifferent to the paraplegic inmate's known medical need for suppositories every other day, in violation of due process, but they were not deliberately indifferent to his need for catheters and prescription pain medication; and (5) the county defendants were not entitled to qualified immunity. The court noted that while the county defendants disputed the arrestee's version of the facts, corrections officers all denied receiving any training regarding how to transport disabled inmates. (Utica Police Department, Oneida County Correctional Facility, New York)

2013

U.S. District Court
BEDS
SAFETY

Alvarado-David v. U.S., 972 F.Supp.2d 210 (D.Puerto Rico 2013). A prisoner brought an action against the United States under the Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA), alleging he fell out of his bunk and hit a toilet bowl, breaking his frontal teeth and upper lip because the United States' failed to provide prisoners with ladders to climb to their bunks. The United States moved to dismiss for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction under the FTCA's discretionary function exception. The district court granted the motion. The court held that the decision by Bureau of Prisons (BOP) personnel not to provide ladders or other equipment for the prisoners to climb to their bunks fit within the discretionary function exception to the FTCA. The court noted that no rules or regulations governed the use of ladders or bunk beds in correctional facilities, and the decision not to provide ladders in correctional facilities for safety reasons, as ladders could be broken off and used as weapons or escape devices, was grounded in considerations of public policy. (Metropolitan Detention Center, Guaynabo, Puerto Rico)

U.S. District Court
LIGHTING
SANITATION
VENTILATION

Ames v. Randle, 933 F.Supp.2d 1028 (N.D.Ill. 2013). An inmate brought § 1983 Eighth Amendment claims against various employees of the Illinois Department of Corrections (IDOC) who allegedly were responsible for the conditions of the inmate's confinement. The defendants filed a motion to dismiss. The court denied the motion, finding that the inmate adequately pled that Illinois prison officials were deliberately indifferent, as required to state a § 1983 Eighth Amendment claim. According to the court, the inmate alleged that he repeatedly advised the official about the prison's detrimental living conditions and that the official did not make an effort to remedy the conditions, that he informed another official about the intolerable living conditions and that this official did not make an effort to remedy the conditions, and that he discussed the intolerable living conditions with other officials, each of whom also failed to make any efforts to remedy the living conditions. The inmate claimed that he was subjected to unsanitary conditions, a lack of ventilation, and continuous lighting that interfered with his sleep. He also alleged that his housing area had dried bodily fluids on the wall of his cell and a strong odor of ammonia from his uncleaned toilet, that there was pest infestation accompanied by filth and feces, and that there was a complete lack of basic cleaning supplies or even garbage bags. He also cited filthy soiled bedding, missing or dilapidated, and sometimes dangerously damaged cell furniture and fixtures, and badly peeling toxic paint. The inmate suffered from endocarditis, an infection of the lining of the heart, which he claimed was due to the conditions of his confinement, and from which his "numerous, almost constant, fungal infections" stemmed. (Stateville Correctional Center, Illinois Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
EMOTIONAL
DISTRESS
SEGREGATION

Aref v. Holder, 953 F.Supp.2d 133 (D.D.C. 2013). Current and former prisoners brought an action against the Bureau of Prisons (BOP), BOP officials, and the Attorney General, claiming that their First and Fifth Amendment rights were violated when they were placed in Communications Management Units (CMUs), in which their ability to communicate with the outside world was seriously restricted. Following dismissal of all but the procedural due process and First Amendment retaliation claims, the defendants moved to dismiss the First Amendment claims. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that: (1) the prisoner's release from BOP custody rendered moot his official-capacity claims for equitable relief; (2) a second prisoner sufficiently alleged a First Amendment retaliation claim; but (3) the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) barred the prisoners' individual-capacity claims against a BOP official for mental or emotional injury. (Federal Correctional Institutions in Terre Haute, Indiana, and Marion, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
HEARING IMPAIRED

Armstrong v. Brown, 939 F.Supp.2d 1012 (N.D.Cal. 2013). Prisoners brought a class action against the Governor of California, the state Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation and a number of related directors and executive officers, seeking to enforce prior orders requiring the defendants to provide sign language interpreters (SLI), and to hold the defendants in contempt for violations. The district court granted the motion to enforce the prior orders. The court held that setting a policy which failed to provide SLIs for hearing-impaired inmates during rounds by psychiatric technicians warranted enforcement of the order against the defendants, and the defendants' failure to provide SLIs for hearing-impaired inmates at classes attended by deaf inmates also warranted an enforcement order. But the court decided that civil contempt sanctions were not appropriate because officials were making substantial efforts to reach compliance with the orders by voluntarily increasing both contract and civil services positions for qualified SLIs. (Substance Abuse Treatment Facility, California Department of Rehabilitation and Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
CIVIL COMMITMENT
TOILETS

Arnzen v. Palmer, 713 F.3d 369 (8th Cir 2013). Patients at a state Civil Commitment Unit for Sex Offenders (CCUSO) brought a § 1983 complaint against CCUSO administrators, challenging placement of video cameras in CCUSO restrooms, and moved for a preliminary injunction to stop their use. The district court denied the motion as to cameras in "dormitory style restrooms" but granted an injunction ordering that cameras in "traditional style bathrooms" be pointed at a ceiling or covered with lens cap. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that CCUSO conducted a "search" by capturing images of patients while occupying single-user bathrooms, and that CCUSO did not conduct a reasonable search by capturing patients' images, thereby constituting a Fourth Amendment violation. The appeals court found that the district court did not abuse its discretion in issuing preliminary injunctive relief. The court noted that the patients had a reasonable expectation of privacy in a single-person bathroom when there was no immediate indication it was being used for purposes other than those ordinarily associated with bathroom facilities, and that involuntarily civilly committed persons retain the Fourth Amendment right to be free from unreasonable searches that is analogous to the right retained by pretrial detainees. According to the court, the facility did not conduct a reasonable search of its involuntarily committed patients by capturing images of patients while they occupied single-user bathrooms in a secure facility, thereby constituting a violation of Fourth Amendment, where the cameras did not provide administrators with immediate alerts concerning patient safety or prevent assaults or dangerous acts, and less intrusive methods were available for administrators to use to prevent illicit activities by patients. (Iowa Civil Commitment Unit for Sex Offenders)

U.S. District Court
TEMPERATURE
ADA- Americans with Disabilities Act
MEDICAL CARE

Ball v. LeBlanc, 988 F.Supp.2d 639 (M.D.La. 2013). State death row inmates brought a § 1983 action against a state department of corrections and state officials, seeking declaratory and injunctive relief based on allegations of violations of the Eighth Amendment, the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), and the Rehabilitation Act. The district court granted declaratory and injunctive relief in part and denied in part. The court held that the temperature and humidity of cells presented a substantial risk of harm to death row inmates, as required for their claims against the prison and officials, alleging the conditions of confinement violated the Eighth Amendment. The court noted that: (1) the inmates were regularly subjected to temperatures above 90.5 degrees and heat indices above 100 degrees; (2) the heat index inside death row tiers was often higher than that outside the facility; (3) inmates were subjected to consecutive days with heat indices above 100 degrees; (4) inmates were at risk of heat-related illnesses including heat stroke and worsening of their underlying conditions, which included diabetes, hypertension, and uncontrolled blood pressure; and (5) two inmates were over age 55, increasing the risk for them. The court found that prison officials had knowledge that the heat and humidity in death row tiers placed inmates at a substantial risk of harm, as required to find the officials were deliberately indifferent to the serious medical needs for the purpose of the inmates' Eighth Amendment claims. The inmates had submitted multiple administrative complaints regarding the heat, and officials responded that they knew it was "extremely hot." According to the court, prison officials disregarded the substantial risk of serious harm to death row inmates regarding heat and humidity in cells, as required to find that the officials were deliberately indifferent to the serious medical needs for the purpose of the inmates' Eighth Amendment claims, where the officials did not take any actions to reduce the heat conditions despite knowledge of the conditions.

The court found that there was no evidence that death row inmates were limited in any major life activities due to their medical conditions, including hypertension, obesity, and depression, as required for their claims against the prison and officials, alleging violations of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) and the Rehabilitation Act. (Louisiana State Penitentiary)

U.S. District Court
EMOTIONAL DISTRESS
MEDICAL CARE
TRANSFERS

Benton v. Rousseau, 940 F.Supp.2d 1370 (M.D.Fla. 2013). A pretrial detainee, who alleged that he was beaten by drivers while being transported to prison, brought a § 1983 action against drivers of a private company which was in the business of transporting prisoners throughout the State of Florida. The district court held that the inmate established a § 1983 First Amendment retaliation claim and a § 1983 Fourteenth Amendment excessive force claim. According to the court: (1) the prisoner engaged in constitutionally protected speech because he complained about conditions of his confinement in the transport vehicle; (2) the driver of transport vehicle engaged in adverse or retaliatory conduct by pulling the inmate out of the van and onto the ground and beating and kicking the inmate; and (3) there was a causal connection between the driver's retaliatory action and inmate's protected speech, in that the incident would not have occurred but for the inmate's complaints regarding conditions of his confinement. The court noted that the inmate's injuries included headaches and facial scars, and his injuries, although perhaps not serious, amounted to more than de minimis injuries. The court ruled that the inmate was entitled to $45,012 in compensatory damages because the inmate had scarring on his face and suffered from headaches and numbness in his side, he suffered the loss of a $12 shirt, and he suffered mental and emotional anguish as a result of actions of drivers of transport van, who kicked and beat him. The court held that the inmate was entitled to punitive damages in the amount of $15,000 based on the violation of his First and Fourteenth Amendment rights by the drivers. The court noted that although the drivers were no longer employed by their private employer, the employer did not investigate after the incident nor did it punish the drivers for their actions, and imposition of punitive damages would deter the drivers from taking similar actions in the future. (United States Prisoner Transport, Hernando County Jail, Florida)

U.S. Appeals Court BEDS
CROWDING
EXERCISE
FLOOR-SLEEPING
MEDICAL CARE
PRETRIAL DETAINEES
SHOWERS
TOILETS WINDOWS

Budd v. Motley, 711 F.3d 840 (7th Cir. 2013). A state inmate filed a § 1983 action alleging that, as a pretrial detainee, he was subjected to unconstitutional conditions of confinement at a county jail and that the sheriff was deliberately indifferent to his medical needs. The district court dismissed the complaint, and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, vacated in part, and remanded. The appeals court held that the detainee's allegations were sufficient to state a plausible claim under the Due Process Clause for subjecting him to unconstitutional conditions of confinement. The prisoner alleged that: (1) on one occasion he was confined with eight inmates in a portion of the county jail intended for three; (2) he had to sleep on the floor alongside broken windows and cracked toilets; (3) on another occasion he and other inmates had to sleep on the floor even though shower water leaked there; (4) cells had broken windows, exposed wiring, extensive rust, sinks without running water, toilets covered in mold and spider webs, and a broken heating and cooling system; (5) inmates were denied any recreation; and (6) the jail furnished inmates with no supplies to clean for themselves.

The appeals court found that county jail officials were not deliberately indifferent to the pretrial detainee's serious medical needs, in violation of the Due Process Clause even if he was dissatisfied with the treatment he received from a jail nurse. The court noted that the detainee was taken to see a nurse as soon as he informed the officer on duty about his leg wound, he was taken to a hospital promptly after writing a letter to the sheriff asking to see a doctor, and the detainee received medical attention, medication, testing, and ongoing observation at the hospital. (Edgar County Jail, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
EMOTIONAL
DISTRESS
MEDICAL CARE

Canales v. Gatzunis, 979 F.Supp.2d 164 (D.Mass. 2013). A former county jail inmate brought an action in state court against a county sheriff's department, the sheriff, the jail superintendent, a state public safety commissioner, and others, alleging the defendants subjected him to reckless, negligent, and cruel medical treatment. Some defendants moved to dismiss for failure to state a claim. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court found that because the county sheriff's department and other county defendants voluntarily removed to inmate's action to federal court, the defendants did not enjoy Eleventh Amendment immunity against any Massachusetts Tort Claims Act (MTCA) claims they would be subject to in state court as a result of waiver.

The court held that the former jail inmate's allegations that the county defendants had a "disorganized medical program" at the jail and failed to maintain a "quality assurance program," and that the jail failed "to maintain adequate and accurate medical records," insufficiently pled that the jail superintendent was personally involved in misinforming the inmate that he had HIV and mistakenly administering another prisoner's HIV medication to the inmate, as would subject the superintendent to supervisory liability for his subordinates' alleged Eighth Amendment violations under § 1983. According to the court, the inmate's allegations that the "defendants" told the inmate that he had HIV and administered HIV medication to him, even though he did not have HIV, did not sufficiently state that the county jail superintendent was personally involved with the inmate's medical treatment or otherwise took any action with respect to the inmate, as would support the inmate's intentional infliction of emotional distress claim against the superintendent, in his individual capacity, under Massachusetts law. (Suffolk County House of Correction, Massachusetts)

U.S. Appeals Court
BEDDING
LIGHTING
RESTRAINTS TEMPERATURE

Chappell v. Mandeville, 706 F.3d 1052 (9th Cir. 2013). A state prison inmate brought a § 1983 action against prison officials, alleging violations of the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments. The defendants moved for summary judgment on the ground of qualified immunity and the district court granted summary judgment as to some, but not all, of the claims. The defendants appealed. The appeals court reversed. The appeals court held that: (1) it was not clearly established that subjecting the prison inmate to a contraband watch violated the Eighth Amendment prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment, and thus prison officials were entitled to qualified immunity on the Eighth Amendment claim; (2) the contraband watch was not such an extreme change in conditions of confinement as to trigger due-process protection; and (3) it was not clearly established whether a state-created liberty interest existed with regard to the contraband watch, and thus officials were entitled to qualified immunity on the claim that the inmate's right to due process was violated because he was not provided with an opportunity to be heard by the official who ordered contraband watch. The contraband watch conditions included 24-hour lighting, mattress deprivation, taping the inmate into two pairs of underwear and jumpsuits, placing him in a hot cell with no ventilation, chaining him to an iron bed, shackling him at the ankles and waist, and forcing him to eat "like a dog." (California State Prison, Sacramento)

U.S. District Court
CROWDING
FAILURE TO PROVIDE CARE
MEDICAL CARE

Coleman v. Brown, 922 F.Supp.2d 1004 (E.D.Cal. 2013). State prison inmates brought Eighth Amendment challenges to the adequacy of mental health care and medical health care provided to mentally ill inmates and the general prison population, respectively. The inmates moved to convene a three-judge panel of the district court to enter a population reduction order that was necessary to provide effective relief. The motions were granted and the cases were assigned to same panel, which ordered the state to reduce the prison population to 137.5% of its design capacity. The state moved to vacate or modify the population reduction order. The district court denied the motion. The three-judge panel of the district court held that: (1) the state's contention that prison crowding was reduced and no longer a barrier to providing inmates with care required by the Eighth Amendment did not provide the basis for a motion to vacate the order on the ground that changed circumstances made it inequitable to continue applying the order; (2) the state failed to establish that prison crowding was no longer a barrier to providing inmates with care required by the Eighth Amendment; and (3) the state failed to establish it had achieved a durable remedy to prison crowding. (California Department of Rehabilitation and Corrections)

U.S. District Court CAPACITY
CROWDING
MEDICAL CARE

Coleman v. Brown, 960 F.Supp.2d 1057 (E.D.Cal. 2013). California prisoners with serious mental disorders brought a class action against a Governor, alleging that due to prison overcrowding, they received inadequate mental health care, in violation of the Eighth Amendment prohibition of cruel and unusual punishment. Separately, California prisoners with serious medical conditions brought a class action asserting constitutional claims similar to those in the other action. In the case concerning mental health care, the district court found Eighth Amendment violations and appointed a special master to oversee the development and implementation of a remedial plan. In the case concerning medical care, the State stipulated to a remedial injunction, and, after the State failed to comply with that injunction, the district court appointed a receiver to oversee remedial efforts. A three judge district court panel consolidated the two cases and the panel entered a remedial order requiring the State to reduce its prison population to 137.5 percent of design capacity within two years. The Governor appealed. The United States Supreme Court affirmed the population reduction order. The district court subsequently denied the defendants' motion to vacate or modify the population reduction order, and directed the defendants to comply with the population reduction order. The defendants' moved to stay the order directing compliance pending appeal to the United States Supreme Court. The district court denied the motion, finding that: (1) the State was not likely to succeed on the merits of the prisoners' lawsuit challenging prison conditions; (2) the State would not be irreparably injured absent a stay; (3) issuance of a stay would substantially injure the prisoners; and (4) the public interest favored denying the stay. (California)

U.S. District Court ALIENS
FOOD
MEDICAL CARE

Dhiab v. Obama, 952 F.Supp.2d 154 (D.D.C. 2013). An alien who was engaged in a voluntary hunger strike while detained at the U.S. Naval Base at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, moved for a preliminary injunction against force-feeding him and the administration of medications related to the force-feeding without his consent. The district court denied the motion, finding that it lacked jurisdiction to consider the motion. (U.S. Naval Base at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba)

U.S. District Court BEDS
FOOD HYGIENE
OVERCROWDING
PRETRIAL DETAINEES
SAFETY
SANITATION

Duran v. Merline, 923 F.Supp.2d 702 (D.N.J. 2013). A former pretrial detainee at a county detention facility brought a pro se § 1983 action against various facility officials and employees, the company which provided food and sanitation services to the facility, and the medical services provider, alleging various constitutional torts related to his pretrial detention. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motions in part and denied in part. The district court held that fact issues precluded summary judgment on: (1) the conditions of confinement claim against a former warden in his official capacity; (2) an interference with legal mail claim against a correctional officer that alleged that the facility deliberately withheld the detainee's legal mail during a two-week period; (3) a First Amendment retaliation claim based on interference with legal mail; and (4) a claim for inadequate medical care as to whether the detainee's Hepatitis C condition was a serious medical condition that required treatment and whether the provider denied such treatment because it was too costly. The detainee asserted that overcrowding at the county detention facility, which allegedly led to the detainee being forced to sleep and eat his meals next to open toilet, and led to inmate-on-inmate violence, contributed to his assault by another inmate. According to the court, the long-standing conditions of confinement whereby the county detention facility was overcrowded for at least 24 years and facility officials "triple-celled" inmates, allegedly leading to unsanitary conditions, amounted to a "custom" for the purposes of the former detainee's § 1983 Fourteenth Amendment conditions of confinement claim against a former warden in his official capacity. The court held that the food service provider's serving the detainee cold meals for a 45-day period while the kitchen in the county detention facility was being renovated, was not "punishment," as would support the inmate's § 1983 Fourteenth Amendment conditions of confinement claim against the provider, absent evidence that the food served to the detainee was spoiled or contaminated, that a significant portion of the detainee's diet consisted of such food, or that the food service caused more than a temporary discomfort. The court also held that the alleged actions of the food service provider in serving the detainee one food item when another ran out, failing to serve bread with the inmate's meal, serving the inmate leftovers from days before, serving juice in a dirty container on one occasion, serving milk after its expiration date, and serving meals on cracked trays that caused the detainee to contract food poisoning, did not amount to a substantial deprivation of food sufficient to amount to unconstitutional conditions of confinement, as would violate the inmate's due process rights. (Atlantic County Justice Facility, New Jersey)

U.S. District Court
CROWDING
JUVENILES

E.A.F.F. v. U.S., 955 F.Supp.2d 707 (W.D.Tex. 2013). Unaccompanied alien minors brought an action against Office of Refugee Resettlement (ORR) officials, alleging they were physically and sexually abused while they were in detention awaiting final adjudication of their immigration status. The officials moved for partial summary judgment. The district court granted the motions. The court noted that a person detained for deportation is equivalent to a pretrial detainee, and a pretrial detainee's constitutional claims are considered under the Due Process Clause. The court held that the officials could not be held liable for due process violations that occurred when the unaccompanied alien minors were physically and sexually abused as a result of alleged overcrowding at a detention facility, where they were being held while awaiting final adjudication of their immigration status, and where there was no evidence that the officials were responsible for decisions regarding the facility's capacity.

According to the court, isolated incidents of physical and sexual abuse by staff members at the detention facility were insufficient to put the officials on notice of a substantial risk of future abuse, as required to hold the officials liable for deliberate indifference in failing to protect the minors' safety in violation of their due process rights. The court noted that other incidents of alleged abuse were investigated by the Texas Department of Family and Protective Services and did not result in any abuse findings. The court found that officials' failure to systematically interview minors concerning their abuse allegations did not amount to deliberate indifference to their safety in violation of their due process rights, where officials spoke to some of the minors during their monitoring visits, and clinicians were on-site and available to speak with the minors on a regular basis. The court held that the officials could not be held liable in their supervisory capacities on a theory of failure to train or supervise, for due process violations arising from alleged physical and sexual abuse by staff members at the detention facility, where staff members received training in behavior management and de-escalation techniques, officials responded to reports of abuse by recommending or providing further training, officials adopted safety policies designed to prevent abuse, and officials recommended that staff members work in pairs and they were unaware that staff members were working individually. (Nixon facility Operated by Away From Home, Inc., Texas)

U.S. Appeals Court
BEDDING
CLOTHING FOOD DINING MEDICAL CARE
ISOLATION
SEGREGATION

Earl v. Racine County Jail, 718 F.3d 689 (7th Cir. 2013). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against a county jail and various jail officers, asserting claims for denial of due process and deliberate indifference to his serious medical condition. The district court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment, and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the inmate's five days on suicide watch were neither long enough nor harsh enough to deprive him of a due-process-protected liberty interest, where: (1) the only changes to the inmate's meals were that trays upon which food was served were disposable foam rather than plastic; (2) eating utensils were quickly removed after each meal; (3) the inmate was not denied bedding but was given a mattress and a blanket; (4) the inmate was denied writing materials for only the first 48 hours; and (5) rather than being prohibited human contact, deputies were assigned to closely and personally monitor the inmate to ensure his safety. The court found that jail officers were not deliberately indifferent to the inmate's allergic reaction to suicide garments in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The court noted that after the inmate told an officer about his allergic reaction to a suicide gown, the officer called a nurse who immediately examined the inmate and gave him cream and medication, and the officers appropriately deferred to the nurse's medical decision that the inmate did not need different garments because there was no sign of rash or bumps on the inmate. (Racine County Jail, Wisconsin)

U.S. District Court
FACILITIES
HYGIENE
SANITATION
TOILETS

Florio v. Canty, 954 F.Supp.2d 227 (S.D.N.Y. 2013). A prisoner, proceeding pro se, brought a § 1983 action against a warden and a corrections officer, alleging violations of the Eighth Amendment. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion. The court held that the prisoner's exposure to human waste on two occasions, for a total of less than a few hours, did not give rise to a serious risk of substantial harm. The prisoner alleged that prison officials waited 10 to 30 minutes after two separate incidents of a toilet overflowing to release the prisoner from his cell and having the prisoner clean the cell with inadequate cleaning gear and without training, allegedly resulting in the prisoner developing a foot fungus. The court held that this was not deliberate indifference to a substantial risk to his health and safety, as would violate the Eighth Amendment. The court noted that officials acted to alleviate the unsanitary conditions, the overflow also occurred in approximately 20 other cells, and the prisoner was not prevented from bathing or washing his clothes after the incidents. (Anna M. Kross Center, Rikers Island, New York City Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
CIVIL COMMITMENT
HOT WATER

Grohs v. Yatauro, 984 F.Supp.2d 273 (D.N.J. 2013). A civilly-committed resident at a special treatment unit (STU) operated by the New Jersey Department of Corrections (NJDOC) brought action against NJDOC officials, alleging violations of his substantive due process rights under § 1983. The district court held that the resident's claims against the officials in their official capacities were barred by sovereign immunity. The court held that the resident's allegations adequately pled the officials' personal involvement in his complaint that: (1) there were visibly leaking steam pipes in a special treatment unit (STU) for which trash cans were used to collect water; (2) NJDOC officials personally toured STU; (3) STU received numerous written complaints from residents about inadequate hot water; and (4) an STU assistant administrator told the resident that defective piping valves were too expensive to repair. The court found that the officials were subject to liability under § 1983 in their individual capacities. The court held that NJDOC officials were not entitled to qualified immunity from the civilly committed resident's § 1983 conditions of civil commitment claim under the Due Process Clause, arising from inadequate hot water at a special treatment unit (STU) in which he was housed. (Special Treatment Unit, Avenel, Middlesex County, New Jersey)

U.S. District Court
FACILITIES
SAFETY

Hannon v. Beard, 979 F.Supp.2d 136 (D.Mass. 2013). Twenty-seven state inmates filed a § 1983 action against the Massachusetts Department Of Correction (MDOC), UMass Correctional Health (UMCH), the governor, and prison officials, alleging violations of their right to be free of cruel and unusual punishment by exposing them to harmful environmental conditions, First Amendment rights by retaliating against them for filing grievances and law suits, fundamental right of access to courts, and due process and equal protection rights. The officials moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion, finding that the Eleventh Amendment barred claims against MDOC and UMCH, and that the inmates failed to state plausible Eighth Amendment claims and First Amendment retaliation claims. According to the court, the inmates' allegations that they were exposed to unsafe levels of toxins at a facility were not enough to show that the alleged deprivation was objectively serious, and thus were insufficient to state a plausible Eighth Amendment claim. The court noted that the inmates did not allege specific facts that would support a finding that environmental toxins were actually present, that the inmates were actually exposed to those substances, and that exposure caused injury. (UMass Correctional Health, and Massachusetts Dept. of Correction, Souza Baranowski Correctional Center)

U.S. Appeals Court
DISCIPLINE
SEGREGATION
CELLS
EXERCISE
SHOWERS

Hardaway v. Meyerhoff, 734 F.3d 740 (7th Cir. 2013). A state prisoner who had spent six months in segregation as punishment for a disciplinary misconduct charge which was later expunged, filed a § 1983 action, alleging that the segregation violated his due process rights. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the prisoner's placement in disciplinary segregation in a cell with a solid metal door and a confrontational cell mate for 182 days, with only weekly access to the shower and the recreation yard, did not amount to atypical and significant hardships, as required to establish a deprivation of the prisoner's due process liberty interests, where the prisoner was not deprived of all human contact or sensory stimuli. The court found that the state prison officials were entitled to qualified immunity for their conduct in placing the prisoner in disciplinary segregation, as the disciplinary segregation did not violate any clearly established right. (Menard Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
ADA- Americans with Disabilities Act
PRETRIAL DETAINEES

Kramer v. Conway, 962 F.Supp.2d 1333 (N.D.Ga. 2013). A pretrial detainee at a county jail brought an action against the jail, the jail administrator, and a county sheriff, alleging that conditions of his confinement violated his right to practice his Orthodox Jewish faith, that the defendants violated his right to possess legal reference books, and that the defendants failed to accommodate his physical disabilities. The detainee moved for a preliminary and a permanent injunction and moved for leave to file a second amendment to his verified complaint. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court denied the motions in part and granted the motion in part. The court held that the pretrial detainee's allegation that the county jail denied him books needed to practice his Orthodox Jewish religious faith failed to establish a violation of the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA), absent evidence that the county jail received federal funds in connection with its policies limiting the number and type of books allowed in cells. The court held that the county jail's policy of limiting the number of religious books that the pretrial detainee, an Orthodox Jew, could keep in his cell, but providing him access to others that were not in his cell, was based on legitimate penological interests, and thus, did not violate the detainee's rights under the Free Exercise Clause. According to the court, a uniformly applied books-in-cell limitation was reasonable in a facility that housed 2,200 inmates, the limitation was applied in a neutral way and the expressive content of books was not considered, books in sufficient quantities could be used as weapons and presented fire and obstacle hazards, access to other books was made by exchanging out titles and by allowing the copying of parts or all of a text, and the detainee was not denied access to nine religious books he claimed were required in practicing his faith, but rather, argued only that access was required to be more convenient.

The court found that the jail's policy of prohibiting hard cover books in cells, including limiting religious texts to those that did not have hard covers, was based on legitimate penological interests, and thus, did not violate rights of the pretrial detainee, an Orthodox Jew, under the Free Exercise Clause. The court noted that evidence at hearing on the detainee's motion for injunctive relief showed that hardcover books posed safety and security risks because hard covers could be used to conceal contraband and because of their potential use as weapons, the policy was applied in a neutral way, and the expressive content of books was not considered.

The court found that the jail's policy of limiting package mail to four pounds was based on legitimate penological interests, and thus, did not violate rights as applied to the pretrial detainee, an Orthodox Jew, under the Free Exercise Clause when the jail rejected one of detainee's packages that contained more than four pounds of books. The court noted that the jail received a large volume of mail and other items each day, all of which had to be searched for contraband and threats their contents could pose to the safety and security of inmates and jail officials, the policy was applied in a neutral way, and the expressive content of books was not considered.

The court held that the jail's policy that limited the number and type of books allowed in a cell did not violate the pretrial detainee's Due Process rights, where there was no evidence that the policy was intended to punish the detainee, the jail's policies prohibiting hard cover books and limiting the number of books allowed in a cell were reasonably related to legitimate penological interests, and the jail gave the detainee substantial access to legal materials by increasing the time he was allowed in the library and liberally allowing him to copy legal materials to keep in his cell. The court held that the jail, the jail administrator, and the county sheriff's denial of a typewriter in the pretrial detainee's cell to accommodate his alleged handwriting disability did not violate the detainee's rights under Title II of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA). The court noted that the detainee was able to write by hand, although he stated he experienced pain when doing so. According to the court, if the detainee chose to avoid writing by hand he had substantial access to a typewriter in the jail's law library, there was no permanent harm from the handwriting he performed, there was no evidence the detainee was not able to adequately communicate with lawyers and jail officials without a typewriter in his cell, and the accommodation of an in-cell typewriter would impose an undue burden on jail personnel because metal and moving parts of typewriter could be used as weapons. (Gwinnett County Jail, Georgia)

U.S. Appeals Court
CLOTHING
FOOD

Mays v. Springborn, 719 F.3d 631 (7th Cir. 2013). A former state prisoner brought an action against prison officials, asserting claims based on strip searches at prisons and alleging retaliation for his complaints about the searches, denial of his request for a dietary supplements which he considered to be religious necessities, inadequacy of his diet, failure to issue certain winter clothing items, and censorship of pages in a magazine mailed to him. The district granted summary judgment in favor of the officials on the claims about prison food and clothing and granted the officials judgment as a matter of law on the claims about strip searches, retaliation, and censorship. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, vacated the judgment with respect to the strip searches, and remanded. On remand, the district court entered judgment, upon a jury verdict, in favor of the officials as to the strip search claims, and the prisoner again appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The appeals court held that: (1) even if there was a valid penological reason for the strip searches conducted on a prisoner, the manner in which the searches were conducted was itself required to pass constitutional muster, and (2) a jury instruction requiring the prisoner to negate the possibility that strip searches would have occurred even if there had been no retaliatory motive was plain error. (Stateville Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
MEDICAL CARE
PRETRIAL DETAINEES
SANITATION
SEGREGATION
SHOWERS
TOILETS

Nelson v. District of Columbia, 928 F.Supp.2d 210 (D.D.C. 2013). A detainee brought a § 1983 claim against the District of Columbia arising from his stay in jail. The defendant moved to dismiss and the district court granted the motion. The court held that denial of one telephone call and access to stationery during the detainee's five-day stay in a "Safe Cell," which was located in the jail's infirmary, did not implicate his First Amendment right of free speech or right of access to courts. The court found that the detainee's alleged exposure to "dried urine on the toilet seat and floor" and garbage during his five-day stay, along with the denial of a shower, did not rise to the level of a Fifth Amendment due process violation. According to the court, placement of detainee in a Safe Cell was not motivated by a desire to punish the detainee, but rather by a nurse's desire to attend to the detainee's ailments after his "legs and back gave out" twice. The court noted that denial of the detainee's request to have the cell cleaned was for the non-punitive reason that the detainee would not be in the cell that long. (D.C. Jail, District of Columbia)

U.S. District Court
ADA- Americans with Disabilities Act
HYGIENE
MEDICAL CARE
SAFETY

Newell v. Kankakee County Sheriff's Department, 968 F.Supp.2d 973 (C.D.Ill. 2013). A disabled federal detainee who was housed at a county jail for two months brought an action against the county sheriff's department and county officials under § 1983 and the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA). The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court denied the motion. The court held that the detainee's allegations that the county officials developed, supervised, and enforced policies and practices of the jail, ensured that grievances were received in the proper manner and were properly responded to, and were aware of his serious medical needs and his grievances, yet turned a blind eye to the situation, were sufficient to state a claim against the officials in their individual capacities in his civil rights action alleging he was denied medical care and kept in unsafe and unhealthy conditions while he was housed at the county jail. The detainee allegedly had multiple disabilities that he sustained in an auto accident, including weakness and numbness in his left side and he partially dragged his left leg. He also had incontinence with urine and bowel movements and required the use of adult diapers. He was unable to stand still without assistance, which made showering and using the toilet difficult. The detainee alleged that despite his obvious disabilities and medical issues, he was assigned to a regular dorm on the top floor of the jail, and a to a top bunk. He had to hop on one leg to go up or down the stairs and needed assistance from other inmates to get into and out of his bunk. He was allegedly not given adult diapers until his third day at the jail, and even then, he was not given an adequate supply of diapers and would sometimes sit in a soiled diaper for days, and in clothes with urine and feces on them. He alleged that he was not given enough biohazard bags, and the soiled diapers and bags piled up in his cell. One day, when there was no one to assist the detainee, he fell while attempting to get out of his bunk and he sat for two hours until someone came to help him. As a result, his left leg worsened and his right leg was numb, he could not walk at all and was forced to crawl down stairs on his buttocks, and scoot along the floor and walk on his hands.

The court found that the detainee's allegations that he was denied medical care and kept in unsafe and unhealthy conditions while he was housed at the county jail, and that the jail was not an exceptionally large facility, were sufficient to state claim against the corrections officer working at the jail in his individual capacity. According to the court, the situation described by the inmate, if true, would have been obvious to any correctional officer working in the area in which the inmate was housed.

The court held that the detainee's allegations that correctional staff at the county jail acted pursuant to an official policy or custom not to perform a medical intake, investigate inmates' medical issues or complaints about problems with walking if they were ambulatory, nor provide sufficient medically-necessary hygiene items such as adult diapers to inmates, among other things, were sufficient to allege that an official policy or custom was a "moving force" in the alleged violation of his rights, as required to state official capacity claims under Monell. The court held that the detainee's allegation that he was barred from basic facilities on the basis of his disabilities while he was housed at the county jail was sufficient to allege discriminatory intent, as required to state an ADA claim against the county sheriff's department. (Jerome Combs Detention Center, Kankakee, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
SEGREGATION
PRETRIAL DETAINEES

Potts v. Moreci, 12 F.Supp.3d 1065 (N.D.Ill. 2013). A pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against a county, employees of the county jail in their individual capacities, and a sheriff, in his individual and official capacities, alleging retaliation in violation of his First Amendment rights, deprivation of his procedural due process and equal protection rights, denial of access to the courts, municipal liability, and statutory indemnification. The sheriff moved to dismiss the claims asserted against him. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court found that the detainee who allegedly was placed in a segregation unit at the county jail without adequate grounds and without an opportunity to contest such placement stated a claim for a procedural due process violation against the sheriff, in his individual capacity, under § 1983. The court noted that the sheriff's personal responsibility for the detainee's placement in segregation could be assumed in determining whether the detainee adequately pleaded the claim, and the detainee also sufficiently alleged the sheriff's knowledge of the detainee's allegedly unconstitutional confinement in segregation by asserting that the sheriff attended periodic meetings at which the detainee's confinement was discussed, which permitted the inference that sheriff knew about the challenged conduct and facilitated, approved, condoned, or turned a blind eye to it. The court held that the detainee sufficiently pleaded the sheriff's personal involvement in the alleged misconduct of jail employees in singling out the detainee for arbitrary treatment during his confinement in a segregation unit, subjecting him to living conditions that were inconsistent even with conditions of other detainees in a segregation unit, and thus stated a § 1983 claim for class-of-one equal protection violation against the sheriff. (Cook County Jail, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
ASBESTOS
FACILITIES
MEDICAL CARE

Pratt v. City of New York, 929 F.Supp.2d 314(S.D.N.Y. 2013). A prisoner brought a § 1983 action against a city, its Commissioner of Corrections, and other prison officials, alleging cruel and unusual punishment in violation of Eighth Amendment based on the prison's failure to address and mitigate asbestos exposure in prison dormitories. The district court denied the defendants' motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim. The court held that the prisoner stated a § 1983 claim that the prison's failure to address and mitigate friable asbestos exposure constituted cruel and unusual punishment under the Eighth Amendment, by alleging that the prison dormitory was contaminated with asbestos and that prison maintenance deliberately avoided testing potentially contaminated pipes and older floor tiles for asbestos exposure. According to the court, exposure to friable asbestos poses a sufficiently serious risk to a prisoner's health as to constitute a serious deprivation, as an element of a claim of cruel and unusual punishment under the Eighth Amendment. The prisoner alleged that most of the facility pipes and the ceiling heating system were deteriorating due to roof leaks, and that leaking water captured small asbestos particles ("friable asbestos") from the deteriorated pipes and heating system and brought the friable asbestos into the dormitory. According to the prisoner, the friable asbestos is also blown throughout the dormitory by the ceiling heating system. The prisoner was a licensed asbestos remover. (Anna M. Koss Center, Rikers Island, New York City, N.Y.)

U.S. District Court
CLASSIFICATION
EQUAL PROTECTION
RACIAL DISCRIMINATION
SAFETY
THREATS
USE OF FORCE

Randle v. Alexander, 960 F.Supp.2d 457 (S.D.N.Y. 2013). An African-American state inmate with a history of serious mental illness brought an action against officials of the New York State Department of Corrections and Community Supervision (DOCCS), correctional officers, and mental health personnel, alleging under § 1983 that the defendants were deliberately indifferent to his serious medical needs and that he was retaliated against, in violation of his First Amendment rights, among other claims. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the correctional officers' alleged actions in forcing the inmate to fight a fellow inmate, and threatening to beat the inmate with a baton and engage in a joint cover-up if the two inmates did not "finish" their fight within a specified area of the prison, which ultimately resulted in the fellow inmate sustaining fatal injuries in the fight, had no legitimate penological purpose, and was far afield of the species of force employed to restore or maintain discipline. The court held that the alleged actions reflected indifference to inmate safety, if not malice toward the inmate, as supported the inmate's § 1983 Eighth Amendment failure to protect claim. According to the court, the alleged forced fight between the inmate and a fellow inmate, orchestrated, condoned, and covered up by correctional officers was an objectively serious violation of the inmate's Eighth Amendment right to reasonably safe conditions of confinement, and the intent evinced by such activity was, at the very least, one of indifference to inmate safety, supporting the inmate's § 1983 Eighth Amendment conditions of confinement claim against the officers.

The court held that the African-American state inmate's allegations in his complaint that a correctional officer arranged inmates in his company so that white inmates were close to officers' posts, whereas black inmates were placed further away, that white inmates were given superior jobs, that the officer's efforts in forcing a fight between the inmate and a fellow inmate were done purposefully for his amusement because both inmates were black, and that the officer's treatment of the inmate and other black inmates was motivated by his intent to discriminate on the basis of race and malicious intent to injure inmates, stated a § 1983 equal protection claim against the officer. The court ruled that the correctional officers were not entitled to qualified immunity from the inmate's § 1983 Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment claims because inmates had a clearly established right to remain incarcerated in reasonably safe conditions, and it was objectively unreasonable to threaten inmates until they agreed to fight each other in front of prison officials.

The court found that the inmate stated an Eighth Amendment inadequate medical care claim against mental health personnel. The inmate alleged that he had a history of serious mental illness, that his symptoms increased following a forced fight with a fellow inmate, that the inmate attempted suicide on three occasions, two of which required his hospitalization, that prison mental health personnel evidenced deliberate indifference to his medical needs, as they recklessly disregarded the risk the inmate faced as result of special housing unit (SHU) confinement, and that the inmate was confined to SHU despite a recommendation that he be placed in a less-restrictive location. (Green Haven Correctional Facility, Protective Custody Unit, New York State Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
LIGHTING
MEDICAL CARE
ADA- Americans with Disabilities Act

Randolph v. Wetzel, 987 F.Supp.2d 605 (E.D.Pa. 2013). A state inmate brought an action against public officials employed by the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania and prison medical providers, alleging, among other things, that the defendants violated the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) and provided inadequate medical treatment. The defendants moved for summary judgment, and the inmate cross-moved for partial summary judgment. The district court granted the defendants' motions in part and denied in part, and denied the inmate's motion. The district court held that state prison officials were not deliberately indifferent to the inmate's allegedly serious medical condition, in violation of the Eighth Amendment, in requiring the inmate to use a wheelchair to access outdoors for "yard time" or to see visitors, rather than transporting the inmate on a gurney. The court noted that the officials relied on the medical providers' judgment that the inmate was able to sit up and get into a wheelchair. The court found that the allegedly excessive bright lighting at prison facilities which was left on for 24 hours-a-day, was related to a legitimate penological concern of providing security for staff and inmates, and thus the lighting did not violate the Eighth Amendment. (SCI Graterford, SCI Greene, Pennsylvania)

U.S. District Court
FLOOR-SLEEPING
MEDICAL CARE
USE OF FORCE

Robinson v. Phelps, 946 F.Supp.2d 354 (D.Del. 2013). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against prison officials alleging excessive force and failure to protect. The district court held that the prisoner stated cognizable and non-frivolous claims for excessive force, failure to protect, and denial of medical care. The prisoner alleged that on one occasion a sergeant assaulted him and that a lieutenant arrived during the assault and that he sustained injuries but was denied medical care by these officers and other prison personnel, that another sergeant shoved and pushed him when he was taken to a medical grievance hearing, making his injuries worse, that this sergeant shoved him to the ground while escorting him to the shower, and then dragged him when he could not get up, requiring that he be taken away by stretcher, and that other officers later choked him until he lost consciousness.

The court found that the prisoner also stated cognizable and non-frivolous Eighth Amendment claims against a prison physician for denial or delay of medical treatment; the prisoner alleged that after he was assaulted by a corrections officer, he was seen by the physician, who would not prescribe pain medication and advised the prisoner that he would be x-rayed within seven to ten days, but the x-rays were not taken for a month and a half, and he alleged that some months later he was taken to an outside facility for a magnetic resonance imaging (MRI) of the neck and back. According to the court, the prisoner's allegations were sufficient to state an Eighth Amendment claim that the physicians denied his requests for medically necessary accommodations. The prisoner alleged that medical officials did not authorize his housing on a lower bunk and, as a result, he slept on the floor, that an officer later moved him to an upstairs cell even though he knew that the prisoner required lower housing due to his neck and back injuries, and that the prisoner showed the officer a memo from a superior officer indicating the prisoner needed the housing. (James T. Vaughn Correctional Center, Delaware)

U.S. Appeals Court
CLASSIFICATION
SAFETY

Smith v. Sangamon County Sheriff's Dept., 715 F.3d 188 (7th Cir. 2013). A pretrial detainee filed suit under § 1983 against a sheriff's department to recover for injuries sustained when he was severely beaten by another inmate housed in a maximum-security cellblock. The district court entered summary judgment for the sheriff's department, and the detainee appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the detainee failed to establish that the security classification policy used by the sheriff's department to assign inmates to cellblocks within the jail was deliberately indifferent to inmate safety in violation of his due-process rights. The court noted that: (1) the detainee presented no evidence that the classification policy created a serious risk of physical harm to inmates, much less that the sheriff's department knew of it and did nothing; (2) the attack by the detainee's cellmate was not enough to establish that the policy itself systematically exposed inmates like the detainee to a serious risk of harm; and (3) it was unclear that a policy strictly segregating those accused of nonviolent crimes from those accused of violent crimes would do a better job of ensuring inmate safety than the multiple-factor classification system used by the sheriff's department. The detainee claimed that the Department's approach to classifying inmates for cellblock placement ignored serious risks to inmate safety because the security classification policy fails to separate "violent" from "nonviolent" inmates and thus fails to protect peaceful inmates from attacks by inmates with assaultive tendencies. The appeals court described the classification practices: "A classification officer interviews each new detainee and reviews a range of information, including the inmate's age, gender, gang affiliation, medical concerns, current charge, criminal history, behavioral and disciplinary history within the jail, and any holds due to parole violations. Pursuant to standards recommended by the American Correctional Association, the classification policy assigns point values within these categories, with higher point values corresponding to lower security risks." (Sangamon County Detention Facility, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
FLOOR-SLEEPING
MEDICAL CARE

Staples v. U.S., 948 F.Supp.2d 1 (D.D.C.2013). A federal prisoner brought a pro se action against the United States and several employees of the Bureau of Prisons, alleging violations of the Eighth Amendment. The district court held that the inmate stated Eighth Amendment violations with his allegations that: (1) two corrections officers at the federal prison ignored the inmate's medical restriction, which required him to sleep on a lower bunk bed; (2) the officers told the prisoner to sleep on a top bed or to sleep on the floor; (3) he was forced to sleep on the floor and suffered unnecessary physical pain in his back and left hip; and (4) his condition was ignored. The prisoner alleged that the conditions continued for over two weeks in spite of his complaints. (Federal Correctional Institution Schuylkill, Minersville, Pennsylvania)

U.S. District Court
CONDITIONS
EQUAL PROTECTION
SEGREGATION
TOTALITY OF CONDITIONS

Turkmen v. Ashcroft, 915 F.Supp.2d 314 (E.D.N.Y. 2013). Arab and Muslim alien detainees who were held on immigration violations in the wake of 9/11 terrorist attacks brought a putative class action against the government and various government officials, alleging that they were physically and verbally abused, subjected to arbitrary strip searches, and subjected to prolonged detention. The defendants moved to dismiss for failure to state claim. The district court granted the motions in part and denied in part. The court held that: (1) Department of Justice (DOJ) officials were not liable for the alleged substantive due process violations; (2) the detainees stated a substantive due process claim against federal detention center officials; (3) detention center officials were not entitled to qualified immunity from the substantive due process claim; (4) the detainees failed to state an equal protection claim against the DOJ officials; (5) the detainees stated an equal protection claim against detention center officials; (6) as an issue of first impression, the officials were entitled to qualified immunity from claims arising from a communications blackout; and (7) as an issue of first impression, a damages remedy under Bivens would be implied to remedy the alleged deprivation of detainees' free exercise rights.

According to the court, the DOJ officials' failure to make explicit the expectation that its harsh confinement policy, which was a directive to hold Arab and Muslim pretrial detainees in restrictive conditions under which they would feel maximum pressure to cooperate with the investigation of the 9/11 terrorist attacks, should be carried out lawfully, did not suggest punitive intent, as would subject the officials to liability under Bivens, where they were entitled to expect that their subordinates would implement their directions lawfully.

The detainees alleged that the warden ordered the creation of an administrative maximum special housing unit (ADMAX SHU) and ordered two of his subordinates to design extremely restrictive conditions of confinement for those assigned to it, that the warden was made aware of the abuse that occurred through inmate complaints, staff complaints, hunger strikes, and suicide attempts, and that other officials made rounds in ADMAX SHU and were aware of the abusive conditions there. The court found that these allegations stated substantive due process claims against the detention facility officials in a Bivens action. The court found that the detention facility officials were not entitled to qualified immunity from the Bivens substantive due process claims. (Metropolitan Detention Center, New York, and Passaic County Jail, New Jersey)

U.S. Appeals Court
CELLS
EMOTIONAL DISTRESS
EXERCISE
HYGIENE
MEDICAL CARE
OVERCROWDING

Turley v. Rednour, 729 F.3d 645 (7th Cir. 2013). An Illinois prisoner serving a life sentence brought a § 1983 action against prison officials, alleging that the prisoner and other inmates classified as low-aggression offenders in the prisoner's cellhouse were subject to lockdowns for more than 50 percent of the days in a 33-month period. The district court dismissed the complaint at the screening stage for prisoner civil actions and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part and reversed in part. The appeals court held that the prisoner had exhausted his administrative remedies. The court found that frequent unit-wide prison lockdowns for substantial periods of time deprived him of exercise and caused him various health issues, such as irritable bowel syndrome, severe stress, headaches, and tinnitus, stated a claim for an Eighth Amendment violation. According to the court, the prisoner sufficiently alleged prison officials' deliberate indifference to physical and psychological injuries, as required to state a claim for an Eighth Amendment violation, based on excessive prison lockdowns. The court noted that the prisoner alleged that he had filed multiple grievances about prison conditions, including a grievance specifically challenging small cells, and that the prison was the subject of numerous past lawsuits, including one specifically ordering a remedial plan for overcrowding, small cells, and lack of adequate medical care and hygiene. (Menard Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
BEDDING
CELL CAPACITY HEATING
NOISE
MATTRESS
SAFETY
SANITATION
VENTILATION

Walker v. Schult, 717 F.3d 119 (2nd Cir. 2013). An inmate, proceeding pro se and in forma pauperis, brought a § 1983 action against a warden and various other prison officials and employees, alleging violations of the Eighth Amendment. The district court granted the defendants' motion to dismiss. The inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, vacated in part, and remanded. The court held that the prisoner's allegations were sufficient to plead that he was deprived of the minimal civilized measure of life's necessities and was subjected to unreasonable health and safety risks, as required to state a § 1983 claims against prison officials for violations of the Eighth Amendment. The prisoner alleged that: (1) for approximately 28 months he was confined in a cell with five other men with inadequate space and ventilation; (2) the heat was stifling in the summer and it was freezing in the winter; (3) urine and feces splattered the floor; (4) there were insufficient cleaning supplies; (5) the mattress was too narrow for him to lie on flat; and (6) noisy and crowded conditions made sleep difficult and created a constant risk of violence. The court also found that the prisoner's allegations were sufficient to plead that prison officials knew of and disregarded excessive risks to his health and safety, as required to find that the officials were deliberately indifferent. The prisoner alleged that officials knew of overcrowding in his cell, that he spoke with some officials about the conditions, that officials were aware noise was loud and constant, that they were aware of temperature issues, that the prisoner informed officials that his bed was too narrow, that one official failed to issue cleaning supplies, and that conditions did not change despite his complaints. (Federal Correctional Institution, Ray Brook, New York)

U.S. District Court
EMOTIONAL DISTRESS
HYGIENE
MEDICAL CARE

Williams v. Erickson, 962 F.Supp.2d 1038 (N.D.Ill. 2013). A state inmate brought an action alleging that a prison nurse's refusal to open the seal on a new colostomy bag so that he could change the bag violated the Eighth Amendment and Illinois law. The defendants moved to dismiss, and the district court denied the motion in part. The court held that the inmate's allegations were sufficient to: (1) state a claim for deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs; (2) state a claim for deliberate indifference to conditions of confinement; and (3) state a claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED) under Illinois law. The court noted that the inmate was required to sit in fecal waste for four hours while medical personnel who had the means of remedying the problem deliberately ignored him. (Stateville Correctional Center, Illinois Department of Corrections)

2014

U.S. Appeals Court
ISOLATION
PRIVILEGES

Brown v. Oregon Dept. of Corrections, 751 F.3d 983 (9th Cir. 2014). A state prison inmate brought a pro se § 1983 action against the Oregon Department of Corrections alleging that prison officials violated his due process rights by housing him in an intensive management unit without periodic, meaningful review of his status. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the inmate's 27-month confinement in an intensive management unit deprived him of a due-process protected liberty interest, but the inmate's due-process protected liberty interest in periodic, meaningful review of his status was not clearly established, and thus prison officials were entitled to qualified immunity. The court noted that the inmate experienced an atypical and significant hardship in that he was subjected to solitary confinement for over 23 hours each day, with almost no interpersonal contact, and he was denied most privileges afforded to inmates in the general population. (Snake River Correctional Institution, Oregon)

U.S. District Court
CROWDING
TEMPERATURE
SANITATION
FOOD
TOILETS

Cano v. City of New York, 44 F.Supp.3d 324 (E.D.N.Y. 2014). Pretrial detainees brought an action against a city and police officers, alleging that inhumane conditions at a detention facility violated due process. The city and the officers moved to dismiss. The district court denied the motion, finding that the detainees alleged objectively serious conditions that deprived them of basic human needs, that the officers and the city were deliberately indifferent to conditions at the facility, and that there was punitive intent. The detainees alleged that, over a 24-hour period, they were subjected to overcrowded cells, insects, rodents, extreme temperatures, unsanitary conditions, sleep deprivation, lack of adequate food and water, lack of access to bathroom facilities, and lack of protection from the conduct of other inmates. (Brooklyn Central Booking, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEGREGATION
OUT OF CELL TIME SEARCHES
RESTRAINTS EXERCISE
ISOLATION

Ford v. Bender, 768 F.3d 15 (1st Cir. 2014). A pretrial detainee commenced an action alleging that prison officials violated his due process rights by holding him in disciplinary segregated confinement throughout the period of pretrial detention and into the subsequent criminal sentence as punishment for conduct that had occurred while he was imprisoned during a prior criminal sentence. The district court held that the detainee's punitive disciplinary confinement violated due process, and largely denied the officials' claims of qualified immunity. The court awarded the detainee partial money damages and equitable relief after a three-day bench trial, and awarded attorneys' fees and costs on the detainee's motion. The officials appealed. The appeals court reversed in part, vacated in part, and remanded. The court held that: (1) reasonable prison officials would not have known that the pretrial detainee's substantive due process rights and procedural due process rights would have been violated by holding him in disciplinary segregated confinement throughout the period of pretrial detention as punishment for conduct that had occurred while he was imprisoned during a prior criminal sentence; (2) the detainee's two prior convictions were not sufficient to establish reasonable expectation after he had been released from custody that he would re-offend; (3) the detainee was not the "prevailing party" for the purpose of attorneys' fees and costs with regard to a declaratory judgment entered on his behalf as it related to his rights as a detainee; (4) the detainee was the "prevailing party" for the purpose of attorneys' fees and costs with regard to an injunction to ensure his access to traditional programs that were available to the general population; and (5) the detainee was not the "prevailing party" for the purpose of attorneys' fees and costs with regard to an injunction to deem his administrative sanction satisfied. The court noted that conditions in the disciplinary unit are considerably more onerous than conditions of confinement for the general population--an inmate is kept for twenty-three hours a day in a cell measuring seven by twelve feet, each cell has a solid steel door with a small inset window, a narrow window to the outdoors, a cement bed, desk, and stool, and a toilet visible through the inset window. An inmate typically leaves his cell for only one hour a day to exercise (five days a week) and to shower (three days a week). He is subject to strip searches whenever he enters or leaves his cell. When an inmate is out of his cell for any reason, he is manacled and placed in leg chains. Inmates are socially isolated. Each inmate receives his meals through a slot in the steel door and is given only twenty minutes to eat. The prison library is off-limits, although an inmate may receive law books from a “book cart,” which requires a formal request and typically results in a wait of eight days. Communication with other inmates, guards, and the outside world is severely restricted. (Mass. Corr’l. Institution at Cedar Junction)

U.S. Appeals Court
LIGHTING

Greening v. Miller-Stout, 739 F.3d 1235 (9th Cir. 2014). A state prisoner brought an action against prison officials, claiming that exposing him to constant lighting for 13 days violated the Eighth Amendment’s bar against cruel and unusual punishment. The district court granted summary judgment for the officials and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The court found that summary judgment was precluded by factual issues as to: (1) the brightness of the continuous lighting in the prisoner’s special management unit cell; (2) the effect on the prisoner of the continuous lighting; and (3) whether prison officials were deliberately indifferent. The inmate was housed in the Special Management Unit (SMU), an administrative segregation unit with single-cells that are continuously illuminated for twenty-four hours a day. Each cell in the SMU has three, four-foot-long fluorescent lighting tubes in a mounted light fixture. A cell occupant can use a switch inside the cell to turn off two of the tubes, but the center tube is always on. The tube is covered by a blue light-diffusing sleeve. Institution policy requires welfare checks in the SMU to be conducted every thirty minutes, which is more frequent than checks for the general prison population. Officials asserted that continuous illumination allows officers to “assess the baseline behavior of offenders to ensure they are not at risk of harming themselves or making an attempt to harm staff, cause property damage or incite problem behavior from other offenders.” The officials stated that turning the cell lights on and off every thirty minutes would be disruptive to the cell occupants. The prisoner alleged that the light was so bright he could not sleep, even with “four layers of towel wrapped around his eyes.” He alleged that the lighting gave him “recurring migraine headaches” and that he could not distinguish between night and day in the cell. (Airway Heights Corrections Center, Washington)

U.S. District Court
STAFFING
OVERCROWDING

Hernandez v. County of Monterey, 70 F.Supp.3d 963 (N.D.Cal. 2014). Current and recently released inmates from a county jail brought an action against the county, the sheriff’s office, and the private company that administered all jail health care facilities and services, alleging, on behalf of a class of inmates, that substandard conditions at the jail violated the federal and state constitutions, the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), the Rehabilitation Act, and a California statute prohibiting discrimination in state-funded programs. The inmates sought declaratory and injunctive relief. The defendants filed motions to dismiss. The district court denied the motions. The court held that both current and recently released inmates had standing to pursue their claims against the county and others for allegedly substandard conditions at the jail, even though the recently released inmates were no longer subject to the conditions they challenged. The court noted that the short average length of stay of inmates in the proposed class, which was largely made up of pretrial detainees, was approximately 34 days, and that short period, coupled with the plodding speed of legal action and the fact that other persons similarly situated would continue to be subject to the challenged conduct, qualified the plaintiffs for the “inherently transitory” exception to the mootness doctrine.

The court found that the inmates sufficiently alleged that the private company that administered all jail health care facilities and services operated a place of public accommodation, as required to state a claim for violation of ADA Title III. The court noted that: “The complaint alleges a litany of substandard conditions at the jail, including: violence due to understaffing, overcrowding, inadequate training, policies, procedures, facilities, and prisoner classification; inadequate medical and mental health care screening, attention, distribution, and resources; and lack of policies and practices for identifying, tracking, responding, communicating, and providing accessibility for accommodations for prisoners with disabilities.” (Monterey County Jail, California)

U.S. District Court
TEMPERATURE

Hinojosa v. Livingston, 994 F.Supp.2d 840 (S.D.Tex. 2014). The mother of a former inmate who died of hyperthermia while incarcerated brought an action against the prison’s health care provider, asserting claims under the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) and the Rehabilitation Act, alleging the provider’s failure to make accommodations for the inmate’s disabilities resulted in the inmate’s death. The provider moved to dismiss. The district court denied the motion. The court held that the mother alleged sufficient facts to state that the inmate was discriminated against by the prison’s health care provider, in support of her claims under the ADA and the Rehabilitation Act, by alleging that the provider knew of the risks and dangers associated with certain medical conditions and medications, that the provider knew the inmate suffered from those conditions and used those medications, and that despite that knowledge, the provider failed to make reasonable accommodations, resulting in the inmate suffering more pain and punishment than non-disabled prisoners, namely, his death. The court noted that the mother alleged that the provider knew both that the inmate suffered from hypertension, diabetes, schizophrenia, and/or depression, and was prescribed medications to treat his disabilities, and that extreme temperatures could be deadly, but still failed to protect the inmate from the extreme temperatures that ultimately resulted in the inmate’s death. The court found that the mother alleged sufficient facts concerning the accommodations that should have been provided by the prison’s health care provider without a request, but were denied or refused, as well as which facilities, programs, or services should have been modified by the provider, to state claims under the ADA and the Rehabilitation Act. The mother complained that the provider’s intake process was flawed in that it could take up to 10 days for prisoners to receive an intake physical, and that the delay created a loophole that left inmates with heat sensitive conditions and disabilities especially vulnerable to death because they did not receive accommodations for their heat sensitive disabilities, and that the provider’s failure to employ 24-hour medical staff at the prison resulted in a fatal delay and denial of vital medical care to the inmate. (University of Texas Medical Branch, Texas Department of Criminal Justice Garza West Unit)

U.S. District Court
CLOTHING
MATTRESS
MEDICAL CARE
SHOWERS
FOOD

Houston v. Cotter, 7 F.Supp.3d 283 (E.D.N.Y. 2014). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against corrections officers and a county, alleging a due process violation in connection with his placement on a suicide watch while incarcerated at a county correctional facility. The parties filed cross-motions for summary judgment. The district court denied the motions, finding that summary judgment was precluded by fact issues as to whether a protected liberty interest was implicated. The inmate alleged that the county had a policy or custom permitting classification officers to keep an inmate on suicide watch as a form of punishment, after mental health personnel had deemed a continued suicide watch unnecessary. The inmate remained on suicide watch for eight days after a psychiatrist and a social worker recommended his removal from the suicide watch. The court also found a genuine dispute of material fact as to whether the inmate's conditions of confinement while he was placed on suicide watch imposed an atypical and significant hardship on him in relation to the ordinary incidents of prison life, such that it implicated a protected liberty interest. While on suicide watch, officials took away the inmate's clothing and required him to wear a suicide-safe garment-- a sleeveless smock made of a coarse, tear-resistant material and Velcro. He was not allowed to wear underwear, socks, or any other undergarment with the smock. He was housed in a stripped cell in the Behavioral Modification Housing Unit. The cell contained a bare mattress and a blanket made out of the same coarse material as the smock. Corrections officers situated immediately in front of the Plexiglass cell window constantly supervised the inmate. According to the county, suicide watch inmates have access to the yard, a plastic spoon, a rubberized pen, the law library, showers, razors, and medical and mental health services, but the inmate claimed that he had no showers, telephone calls, prescription medications, food, or access to the law library while in the BMHU. (Suffolk County Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
TOILET SHOWER WATER

Imhoff v. Temas, 67 F.Supp.3d 700 (W.D.Pa. 2014). A pretrial detainee brought an action against employees of a county correctional facility, alleging deliberate indifference to his serious medical need, violation of his rights under the Fourteenth Amendment with regard to conditions of his confinement, and excessive force in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The employees moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court found that the detainee's allegations against the employees in their individual capacities regarding the intentional denial of medical treatment, excessive use of force, and violation of his rights under Fourteenth Amendment with regard to conditions of his confinement were sufficient to set forth a plausible claim for punitive damages. The detainee alleged that he was denied basic human needs such as drinking water, access to a toilet and toilet paper, and toiletries such as soap and a toothbrush. (Washington County Correctional Facility, Pennsylvania)

U.S. District Court
SANITATION
PLUMBING
TOILETS
LAUNDRY
FOOD
EXERCISE

Little v. Municipal Corp., 51 F.Supp3d 473 (S.D.N.Y. 2014). State inmates brought a § 1983 action against a city and city department of correction officials, alleging Eighth Amendment and due process violations related to conditions of their confinement and incidents that occurred while they were confined. The defendants moved to dismiss for failure to state a claim. The district court granted the motion, finding that: (1) the inmates failed to state a municipal liability claim; (2) locking the inmates in cells that were flooding with sewage was not a sufficiently serious deprivation so as to violate the Eighth Amendment; (3) the inmates failed to state an Eighth Amendment claim based on the deprivation of laundry services; (4) the inmates failed to state that officials were deliberately indifferent to their conditions of confinement; (5) the inmates' administrative classification did not implicate their liberty interests protected by due process; and (6) cell searches did not rise to the level of an Eighth Amendment violation. The court noted that the cells flooded with sewage for up to eight-and-a-half hours, during which they periodically lacked outdoor recreation and food, was undeniably unpleasant, but it was not a significantly serious deprivation so as to violate the inmates' Eighth Amendment rights. According to the court, there was no constitutional right to outdoor recreation, and the inmates were not denied food entirely, but rather, were not allowed to eat during periods of lock-down. (N.Y. City Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
SHOWERS
PLUMBING
HOT WATER

Morris v. Corrections Corporation of America, 75 F.Supp.3d 457 (D.D.C. 2014) A former District of Columbia inmate brought a state-court negligence action against a private prison operator, seeking damages for a scrotal burn injury he allegedly sustained when the water temperature in a prison shower spiked unexpectedly. The operator moved the action to federal court, and moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The court held that there was no evidence that the operator had notice of allegedly dangerously high water temperatures in the prison showers, and the operator's alleged breach of its duty to properly maintain the shower facilities was not the proximate cause of the scrotal burn. (Correctional Treatment Facility, operated by Corrections Corporation of America, Washington, D.C.)

U.S. Appeals Court
ISOLATION
MEDICAL CARE

Parsons v. Ryan, 754 F.3d 657 (9th Cir. 2014). State prisoners, and the state's authorized protection and advocacy agency, filed a class action for declaratory and injunctive relief against senior officials from the Arizona Department of Corrections (ADC), asserting Eighth Amendment claims, based on allegedly serious systemic deficiencies in conditions of confinement in isolation cells, and in the provision of privatized medical, dental, and mental health care services. The district court granted class certification and prison officials appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court found that the prisoners were not merely aggregating many claims of individual mistreatment, and instead were alleging that ADC policies and practices of statewide and systemic application exposed all inmates in ADC custody to substantial risk of serious harm, to which the senior officials allegedly were deliberately indifferent, even if the risk might ultimately result in different future harm for different inmates. (Arizona Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
SAFETY

Pyles v. Fahim, 771 F.3d 403 (7th Cir. 2014). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against a warden, medical contractor, and the contractor's physicians, alleging deliberate indifference to the risk of injury and to his medical needs. After dismissing the warden at the screening of the complaint, the district court granted the remaining defendants summary judgment. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that a wet stairway, on which the prisoner allegedly slipped, was not a hazardous condition of confinement, in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The court found that the physician's failure to refer the prisoner to a specialist after the prisoner complained of back pain following a fall in a wet stairway was not deliberate indifference to the prisoner's serious medical needs, in violation of the Eighth Amendment, where the prisoner had a common ailment, the physician prescribed medications, and, after those medications did not appear to help, the physician tried new medications or dosages. (Menard Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
CLASSIFICATION
MEDICAL CARE
RACIAL DISCRIMINATION
SANITATION

Sherley v. Thompson, 69 F.Supp.3d 656 (W.D.Ky. 2014). A state prisoner filed a pro se § 1983 action against the Commissioner of the Kentucky Department of Corrections (DOC), a prison warden, and other prison officials, alleging that his conditions of confinement violated his Eighth Amendment rights, that he was deprived of medical treatment in violation of the Eighth Amendment, and was subjected to race discrimination in violation of the Equal Protection Clause. The district court dismissed the case, in part. The court held that the prisoner stated claims against the warden and prison administrators for violation of his equal protection rights and his conditions of confinement. According to the court, the prisoner stated an Eighth Amendment claim against one prison nurse by alleging that the nurse failed to provide him with appropriate medical treatment for ant bites he sustained, due to his inability to pay for treatment.

The prisoner alleged that the prison had a policy or custom of segregating blacks and non-blacks, and that prison officials refused to place him in a non-black cell to get away from pests in his cell. The court held that the administrators allowed ants to infest his cell for weeks and that as a result, he received ant bites that caused him to scratch until his skin was broken due to severe itching, in violation of his conditions of confinement rights under § 1983 and the Eighth Amendment. (Little Sandy Correctional Complex, Green River Correctional Complex, Kentucky)

U.S. District Court
CLASSIFICATION
CLOTHING
EMOTIONAL DISTRESS
SEPARATION

Thornton v. Jackson, 998 F.Supp.2d 1365 (N.D.Ga. 2014). An inmate and his wife brought a § 1983 action against various prison employees and officials, alleging violations of the Eighth Amendment, as well as negligence and intentional infliction of emotional distress (IIED). The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The court held that the inmate, who was housed at the prison as a visiting-inmate while testifying against another member of the inmate's gang, was not incarcerated under conditions posing a substantial risk of harm, as required to establish the objective requirement for his § 1983 claim against various prison officials and employees. The inmate alleged violation of the Eighth Amendment after he was assaulted by three other inmates. The inmate claimed that his different color jumpsuit identified him as snitch and as a target for violence. The court noted that the prison's inmates did not have a history of attacking visiting inmates, the prison had an order requiring the inmate be kept separate from one other inmate, but did not require protective custody or isolation, the inmate did not have problems with anybody for seven days, and the inmate saw some other inmates talking and reported that he suspected that they were talking about him, but he did not hear what they were saying. (Fulton County Jail, Atlanta)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEGREGATION
FOOD CLOTHING
HYGIENE
MEDICAL CARE

Townsend v. Cooper, 759 F.3d 678 (7th Cir. 2014). An inmate suffering from a significant mental illness brought a § 1983 action against prison officials, claiming that imposition of a behavior action plan in response to the inmate's disruptive behavior and threats of suicide violated his Fourteenth Amendment due process rights, deprived him of the minimal civilized measure of life's necessities and exhibited an indifference to his serious medical needs in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The district court granted summary judgment for the prison officials and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, vacated in part, and remanded. The court held that the behavior action plan resulted in an atypical and significant hardship compared to ordinary prison life, and thus, the inmate had a liberty interest in not being placed on the plan sufficient to support his Fourteenth Amendment due process challenge against the prison officials, where the plan involved removal of the inmate's personal property from his cell, provision of a bag lunch, provision of a paper gown, and limited access to toiletries. The court found that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether prison officials acted in disregard of a substantial risk of serious harm to the inmate, and a fact issue as to whether the behavior action plan was imposed for safety reasons or as a disciplinary measure. The court found that prison psychologists were not deliberately indifferent to the serious medical needs of the inmate when they placed the inmate on the behavior action plan, where the psychologists repeatedly visited the inmate, regularly adjusted the inmate's access to property that he could use to harm himself, and repeatedly placed the inmate on observation status to ensure his safety when he was suicidal. (Green Bay Correctional Institution, Wisconsin)

U.S. Appeals Court
FAILURE TO PROTECT

Walls v. Tadmán, 762 F.3d 778 (8th Cir. 2014). A prisoner sued prison officials, claiming that they violated his Eighth Amendment right against infliction of cruel and unusual punishment when they failed to protect him from attacks by other prisoners. Following a bench trial, the district court entered judgment for the officials. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the officials did not respond unreasonably to any substantial risk of harm to the prisoner. According to the court, assuming that the prisoner faced a substantial risk of harm from being labeled a "snitch" and that prison officials were aware of that risk, the officials offered the prisoner protective custody after the first alleged attack. He declined the offer, he asked to be returned to the general population when prison officials placed him in protective custody anyway, he declined to report an enemy situation with the alleged attacker, both the prisoner and the alleged attacker told officials that they expected no further problems, and at no point did the prisoner ask for protection. (Iowa State Penitentiary)

U.S. District Court
SLEEP
NOISE

Williams v. Klien, 20 F.Supp.3d 1171 (D.Colo. 2014). A federal inmate brought a Bivens action against various prison officials, alleging a due process violation and First Amendment retaliation, as related to his complaints about sleep deprivation and penalties that followed his complaints. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the inmate stated a Bivens claim against a prison official, alleging First Amendment retaliation and seeking declaratory and injunctive relief, and the prison official was not entitled to qualified immunity on the inmate's First Amendment retaliation claim seeking declaratory and injunctive relief. The inmate alleged that the prison official expressed his disdain for the inmate and his various grievances, and then arranged for continued adverse actions to be taken against the inmate, as required for the inmate to state a Bivens claim for declaratory or injunctive relief. The inmate alleged that during a one year period, he was awakened each night while he was sleeping, as officers were conducting count they would beat on his cell door, and that these actions were taken to deprive him of adequate sleep. According to the court, the inmate's allegations indicated that he sought to exercise his First Amendment rights by filing grievances, that the official was aware of the inmate's attempt to file grievances, that, based on that awareness, the official took action to impose adverse consequence on the inmate, and that the consequence would deter a person of ordinary firmness from engaging in a constitutionally-protected activity. (Fed. Correctional Institution, Florence, Colorado)

U.S. District Court
TEMPERATURE
MEDICAL CARE
PRETRIAL DETAINEES

Woodson v. City of Richmond, Va., 2 F.Supp.3d 804 (E.D.Va. 2014). A detainee in a city jail filed a § 1983 action against the city, the sheriff, and deputies, claiming constitutional and state law violations arising from the detainee's heat stroke allegedly caused by deliberate indifference to his need for medical care. The detainee was housed on the top floor of the jail during a time when outside temperatures exceeded 100 degrees, and when interior temperatures were even higher. The inmate suffered a heat stroke and was found unresponsive in his cell, and he had a body temperature of 106.1 degrees. The sheriff cross-claimed against the city for indemnification or contribution. The city moved to dismiss the cross-claim. The court dismissed the cross-claim, finding that the sheriff lacked the right to contribution and the right to indemnification for § 1983 claims or state law claims. (Richmond City Jail, Virginia)

2015

U.S. District Court
VENTILATION
SANITATION
LIGHTING

Barnes v. County of Monroe, 85 F.Supp.3d 696 (W.D.N.Y. 2015). A state inmate brought a § 1983 action against a county, county officials, and correctional officers, alleging that the officers used excessive force against him and that he was subjected to unconstitutional conditions of confinement during his pretrial detention. The defendants moved for judgment on the pleadings. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the former pretrial detainee's allegation that a county correctional officer used excessive force when he responded to a fight between the detainee and fellow inmates, and jumped on the detainee's back, striking him in face and knocking out a tooth, and that the officer was not merely using force to maintain or restore discipline but that the entire incident was "premeditated," stated a § 1983 excessive force claim against officer under the Due Process Clause. According to the court, the former detainee's allegations that county correctional officers used excessive force when they pushed him face-first into a glass window, pushed him to the floor, kicked, stomped on and punched him, and used handcuffs to inflict pain, that as a result of the altercation, the inmate urinated and defecated on himself and experienced dizziness and a concussion, and that the force used on him was in response to his reaching for legal papers and attempting to steady himself, stated a § 1983 excessive force claim against the officers under the Due Process Clause. The court found that the former detainee's allegations that, after he was released from a special housing unit (SHU), county correctional officers placed him in a poorly ventilated cell where he was exposed to human excrement and bodily fluids over the course of multiple days, and that he was subjected to extreme conditions in the SHU by way of 24-hour lighting by the officers, stated a § 1983 conditions-of-confinement claim against the officers under the Due Process Clause. (Upstate Correctional Facility and Monroe County Jail, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
MATTRESS
MEDICAL CARE

Burton v. Downey, 805 F.3d 776 (7th Cir. 2015). A pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against a county, county jail, county sheriff, non-medical correctional officials, physician's assistants, and nurses, asserting due process violations based on deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs, relating to hip and elbow pain, a rash, and rectal bleeding. The district court denied the defendants' motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity and the defendants appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The court held that an alleged two-day delay in providing non-narcotic pain medication to the detainee was not deliberate indifference, failure to honor the detainee's preference for narcotic pain medication was not deliberate indifference, the detainee did not offer objective evidence of a serious medical need for narcotic pain medication, and failure to provide outside physical therapy was not deliberate indifference. The court noted that an orthopedic surgeon who had treated the detainee before his detention recommended to staff that the detainee receive in-cell therapy using a towel. The court held that failure of county jail staff to provide the detainee, who suffered from hip pain, with a second mattress, did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment with respect to conditions of confinement, in the absence of evidence that a second mattress was essential medical care. (Jerome Combs Detention Center, Kankakee County, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
BEDDING
FLOOR-SLEEPING CROWDING
SANITATION
TEMPERATURE

Cano v. City of New York, 119 F.Supp.3d 65 (E.D.N.Y. 2015). Pretrial detainees temporarily housed in a booking facility brought an action against a city and city officials under § 1983 alleging deliberate indifference to detainee health in violation of the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The defendants moved for summary judgment and the district court granted the motion. The court held that: (1) temporarily subjecting detainees to overcrowded jail cells was not deliberate indifference; (2) failure to provide sleeping equipment, such as beds, cots, pillows, blankets, or bedding was not deliberate indifference; (3) availability of only one toilet for 24 hours in each overcrowded holding cell was not deliberate indifference; (4) alleged failure to provide food and water was not deliberate indifference; (5) police officers were not subjectively aware of a risk to the detainees; (6) police officers did not act with punitive intent; (7) placement of pretrial detainees in jail cells with alleged rodent and insect infestations was not deliberate indifference; (8) placement of pretrial detainees in jail cells with alleged violent offenders that had limited police supervision, allegedly leading to fights, thefts, and bullying, was not deliberate indifference to detainee health; and (9) alleged exposure of pretrial detainees to extreme hot or cold temperature conditions in unventilated jail cells was not deliberate indifference to detainee health that would violate the right to provision of adequate medical treatment under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The court noted that the detainees were not kept in the cells for more than 24 hours, and were not harmed by the alleged overcrowding. (Brooklyn Central Booking, City of New York Police Dept., New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
EXERCISE
CLOTHING
TEMPERATURE

Diaz v. Davidson, 799 F.3d 722 (7th Cir. 2015). A former state inmate filed an action alleging that prison officials' denial of adequate exercise violated the Eighth Amendment's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment. The district court entered judgment in the officials' favor and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the officials' failure to provide the inmate with a hat and gloves to wear when he exercised in his outdoor cell did not violate the Eighth Amendment. The court held that state prison officials' failure to provide the inmate a with hat and gloves to wear when he exercised in his outdoor cell in a prison yard in very cold winter weather did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment, in violation of the Eighth Amendment, even though the inmate was unable to do the chin-ups he needed to prevent the muscles in his back from atrophying because of arthritis, and the indoor cell was not large enough. The court noted that guards gave him what they were required to give him according to the prison's policy without realizing, or being irresponsible in failing to realize, that he needed gloves and a hat to do specific exercises. According to the court, the warden received only one pertinent grievance, which complained that on one occasion the inmate had been left outdoors without a hat and gloves for two hours. (Pontiac State Prison, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
PRETRIAL DETAINEES
SANITATION
HYGIENE
FLOOR-SLEEPING
CLOTHING
SHOWERS

Fant v. City of Ferguson, 107 F.Supp.3d 1016 (E.D. Mo. 2015). City residents brought a class action lawsuit against a city, asserting claims under § 1983 for violations of Fourth, Sixth, and Fourteenth Amendments based on allegations that they were repeatedly jailed by the city for being unable to pay fines owed from traffic tickets and other minor offenses. The residents alleged that pre-appearance detentions lasting days, weeks, and in one case, nearly two months, in allegedly poor conditions, based on alleged violations of a municipal code that did not warrant incarceration in the first instance, and which were alleged to have continued until an arbitrarily determined payment was made, violated their Due Process rights. The residents alleged that they were forced to sleep on the floor in dirty cells with blood, mucus, and feces, were denied basic hygiene and feminine hygiene products, were denied access to a shower, laundry, and clean undergarments for several days at a time, were denied medications, and were provided little or inadequate food and water. The plaintiffs sought a declaration that the city's policies and practices violated their constitutional rights, and sought a permanent injunction preventing the city from enforcing the policies and practices. The city moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that: (1) allegations that residents were jailed for failure to pay fines without inquiry into their ability to pay and without any consideration of alternative measures of punishment were sufficient to state a claim that the city violated the residents' Due Process and Equal Protection rights; (2) the residents plausibly stated a claim that the city's failure to appoint counsel violated their Due Process rights; (3) allegations of pre-appearance detentions plausibly stated a pattern and practice of Due Process violations; (4) allegations of conditions of confinement were sufficient to state a plausible claim for Due Process violations; and (5) the residents could not state an Equal Protection claim for being treated differently, with respect to fines, than civil judgment debtors. The court noted that the residents alleged they were not afforded counsel at initial hearings on traffic and other offenses, nor were they afforded counsel prior to their incarceration for failing to pay court-ordered fines for those offenses. (City of Ferguson, Missouri)

U.S. District Court
LIGHTING

Greening v. Stout, 144 F.Supp.3d 1241 (E.D. Wash. 2015). A state prisoner commenced a § 1983 action against prison officials, claiming that exposing him to constant lighting for 13 days in segregation management unit (SMU) violated the Eighth Amendment's bar against cruel and unusual punishment. The district court granted summary judgment to the officials and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The district denied summary judgment, in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to: (1) whether the state prisoner suffered harm resulting from his exposure to continuous light for 13 days; (2) whether state prison officials acted with deliberate indifference in exposing the prisoner to continuous light for 13 days; (3) whether the prisoner had suffered an immediate injury from being exposed to continuous light in the prison's segregation management unit; (4) whether legal damages would be inadequate to compensate the prisoner for his alleged suffering or to restore his health, as to the costs of changing the lighting; and (5) whether penological purposes would be undermined if the lighting was changed. The court noted that the prisoner had offered evidence of the harm he already had suffered due to the lighting conditions, including testimony of a board certified sleep medicine expert. (Airway Heights Corrections Center, Washington)

U.S. Appeals Court
RACIAL DISCRIMINATION
CLASSIFICATION

Harrington v. Scribner, 785 F.3d 1299 (9th Cir. 2015). An African-American inmate brought a § 1983 action against state prison officials, alleging that a race-based lockdown at the prison violated his equal protection rights, and that he suffered injuries related to shower restrictions in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The district court entered judgment on a jury verdict in favor of the officials. The inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The court noted that racial classifications in prisons are immediately suspect and subject to strict scrutiny, for equal protection purposes, which requires the government to prove that the measures are narrowly tailored to further a compelling government interest. The court found that the jury instructions erroneously diluted the narrow tailoring requirement for the strict scrutiny test that applied to the race-based Equal Protection claim. (California State Prison-Corcoran)

U.S. Appeals Court
TEMPERATURE
VENTILATION
MEDICAL CARE

Hinojosa v. Livingston, 807 F.3d 657 (5th Cir. 2015). The mother of an inmate who died of complications from heatstroke while incarcerated brought an action against prison officials and employees, the Texas Department of Criminal Justice (TDCJ), the University of Texas Medical Branch (UTMB), and an official of UTMB, alleging that they were responsible for her son's death. Prison officials moved to dismiss on the basis of qualified immunity. The district court deferred ruling and the officials appealed. The appeals court dismissed the action, finding that it did not have jurisdiction over the appeal. The court held that the inmate's factual allegations, if true, would be sufficient to establish prison officials' liability for an Eighth Amendment violation and to overcome a qualified immunity defense, and that further clarification of the facts was necessary for the district court to rule on the prison officials' qualified immunity defense. The mother of the inmate alleged that officials subjected the inmate to dangerous heat conditions in conscious disregard of the serious risk that the heat posed for prisoners who, like the inmate, suffered from certain medical conditions, took certain medications, and had recently been transferred from air-conditioned jails to non-climate-controlled facilities. The mother alleged that the officials had promulgated and had power to change policies that allegedly caused the inmate's death, and the Eighth Amendment right not to be subjected to extremely dangerous temperatures without adequate ameliorative measures had been clearly established at the time of inmate's death. (Garza West Unit, Texas Department of Criminal Justice)

U.S. District Court
CELLS
DORMITORIES
PROGRAMS
ISOLATION

Hughes v. Judd, 108 F.Supp.3d 1167 (M.D. Fla. 2015). Several juveniles, as representatives of other juveniles similarly situated, brought a § 1983 action asserting that the sheriff of a Florida county and the health care provider retained by the sheriff violated the juveniles' rights under the Fourteenth Amendment during the juveniles' detention at the county jail. The district court held that the plaintiffs failed to prove that either the sheriff or the health care provider was deliberately indifferent to any substantial risk of serious harm during the juveniles' detention, or that their policies or customs effected any other constitutional violation. According to the court, at most, the juveniles showed only that two persons, each of whom was qualified to testify as an expert, disfavored some of the sheriff's past or present managerial policies and practices and advocated the adoption of others they felt were superior for one reason or another.

The court found that the juvenile detainees' challenges to particular conditions of confinement at the jail were mooted by changes, which included elimination of a "holding cage," elimination of the holding area for even temporary suicide watches, installation of cameras in each sleeping cell with monitors posted above each dorm, updating of the physical facility, relocation of the classrooms, a 48-hour review for juveniles in isolation, and installation of a radio frequency identification (RFID) system.

The court found that the use of pepper spray against the juvenile detainees at the county jail did not violate the Eighth Amendment, where pepper spray was effective for quickly stopping a fight without inflicting injury, nearly every use of pepper spray at that jail was to stop a fight, and there was no evidence that the pepper spray had lasting, negative effect. (Polk County Central Jail, Florida, and Corizon Health, Inc.)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEGREGATION
OUT OF CELL TIME
CELLS
IDLENESS

Incumaa v. Stirling, 791 F.3d 517 (4th Cir. 2015). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against the acting director of a state department of corrections, alleging violations of the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA) and Fourteenth Amendment procedural due process in his placement in solitary confinement for 20 years following his participation in a riot. The inmate was a member of the Nation of Gods and Earths ("NOGE"), also known as the "Five Percenters." Prison policy required the inmate to renounce his affiliation with NOGE as a condition of being released from segregation. The inmate asserted that NOGE was a religion and that he was being asked to renounce his religion in order to be released from solitary confinement, in violation of RLUIPA. The district court granted the director's motion for summary judgment and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The appeals court held that the prison policy did not force the inmate to choose between continued adherence to his religion or release from solitary confinement. But the court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the prison's review process for inmates in solitary confinement was adequate. The court noted that the inmate was subject to near-daily cavity and strip searches, he was confined to a small cell for all sleeping and waking hours, aside from 10 hours of activity outside the cell per month, he was denied educational, vocational, and therapy programs, the inmate was socially isolated, and confinement was indefinite. (South Carolina Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
CELLS
EXERCISE
DEATH PENALTY
VISITATION

Prieto v. Clarke, 780 F.3d 245 (4th Cir. 2015). A state prisoner convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death brought a pro se § 1983 action, alleging that his confinement on death row, pursuant to a state policy which required him to be in a single cell with minimal visitation and recreation opportunities, violated his procedural due process and Eighth Amendment rights. The district court dismissed the Eighth Amendment claim, and subsequently granted summary judgment in favor of the prisoner on the due process claim. Prison officials appealed. The appeals court reversed, finding that the prisoner had no due process liberty interest in avoiding confinement on death row. (Sussex I State Prison, Virginia)

U.S. District Court
OUT OF CELL TIME
MEDICAL CARE
FOOD
HYGIENE
PRETRIAL DETAINEES
USE OF FORCE

Shorter v. Baca, 101 F.Supp.3d 876 (C.D. Cal. 2015). A pretrial detainee brought an action against a county, sheriff, and deputies, alleging under § 1983 that the defendants denied her medical care, subjected her to unsanitary living conditions, deprived her of food, clean clothes, and access to exercise, and conducted overly invasive searches. The detainee had been classified as mentally ill and housed in a mental health unit at the detention facility. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to what policies governed classification of pretrial detainees who were mentally ill. The court found that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether jail conditions imposed on the detainee, including permitting the detainee, who was incarcerated for 32 days, to shower only three times, only permitting the detainee outside of her cell for recreation on one occasion, failing to clean her cell, failing to provide the detainee with clean clothing, and depriving the detainee of food, amounted to punishment. The court found that there was no evidence that county jail employees' alleged failure to adequately treat the detainee's blood condition caused her measurable harm, where there was no indication that the alleged denial of treatment caused the detainee any physical pain, or that any mental anguish the detainee suffered was related to denial of her medication. The court denied summary judgment to the defendants on the detainee's claim that she was denied dental treatment. (Century Regional Detention Facility, Los Angeles County, California)

U.S. Appeals Court
SANITATION
MEDICAL CARE

Turner v. Mull, 784 F.3d 485 (8th Cir. 2015). A state inmate filed a § 1983 action alleging that correctional officials violated his rights under the Eighth Amendment, Fourteenth Amendment, Title II of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), and Rehabilitation Act by failing to transport him in wheelchair-accessible van, exposing him to unsanitary conditions in the van, and retaliating against him for filing a complaint. The district court entered summary judgment in the officials' favor and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the officials were not deliberately indifferent to the inmate's serious medical needs when they precluded him from using a wheelchair-accessible van, even if the inmate was required to crawl into the van and to his seat. The court noted that the inmate was able to ambulate, stand, and sit with the use of leg braces and crutches, the inmate did not ask to use a readily available wheelchair, no physician ordered or issued a wheelchair for the inmate, and improperly using or standing on a lift was considered dangerous due to the possibility of a fall.

According to the court, officials were not deliberately indifferent to the serious medical needs of the inmate in violation of Eighth Amendment when they required him to be transported and to crawl in an unsanitary van, where the inmate was exposed to unsanitary conditions on a single day for a combined maximum of approximately six hours. (Eastern Reception Diagnostic Correctional Center, Missouri)

U.S. District Court
JUVENILES
CELLS
ISOLATION
OUT OF CELL TIME

Turner v. Palmer, 84 F.Supp.3d 880 (S.D.Iowa 2015). A 16-year-old who had been adjudicated delinquent and who had prior psychiatric hospitalizations, brought an action against the operators of a state-run juvenile home under § 1983 for violations of her due process rights under the Fifth, Eighth, and Fourteenth Amendments, based on the alleged systematic and excessive use of cement-walled isolation cells. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court denied the motion, finding that the juvenile stated a claim for due process violations and alleged a continuing violation. The facility had several small cement isolation cells, labeled Quiet Rooms, Safety Rooms, Comfort Rooms, and the Special Unit. The prisoner alleged that she spent numerous consecutive weeks locked in isolation cells, spending 289 out of the 528 days she was at the facility in isolation. She claimed she was only given one thin mat to sleep on, was only permitted to exit the cell to use the restroom; and during many of these stays, she was not allowed any homework, classroom instruction, reading material, or outside communication. (Iowa Juvenile Home, Toledo, Iowa)

U.S. Appeals Court
FAILURE TO PROVIDE CARE

Whitley v. Warden, Ware State Prison, 802 F.3d 1205 (11th Cir. 2015). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action, alleging that he had been beaten by prison staff and denied medical care after the beating. The district court dismissed the action based on failure to exhaust administrative remedies. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court reversed. The court held that the district court failed to accept as true the prisoner's view of the facts regarding exhaustion of administrative remedies and failed to make specific findings to resolve disputed issue of fact regarding the exhaustion of administrative remedies. (Telfair State Prison, Ware State Prison, Georgia Diagnostic and Classification Prison, Georgia)

U.S. Appeals Court
ODORS
CELLS SANTITATION
FOOD

Willey v. Kirkpatrick, 801 F.3d 51 (2d Cir. 2015). A state prisoner brought an action under § 1983 against a prison superintendent, a corrections sergeant, and corrections officers, alleging unsanitary conditions, theft of legal documents, harassment, malicious prosecution, and false imprisonment. The district court granted summary judgment to the defendants. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court vacated the district court's decision and remanded the case for further proceedings. The court held that remand was required for the district court to address issue in first instance of whether the prisoner had a right under the First, Fifth, Eighth, or Fourteenth Amendments to refuse to provide false information to a corrections officer. The court held that the prisoner stated a claim of unsanitary conditions of confinement against the defendants by alleging that while being kept naked, he had been exposed, at a minimum, to seven days of human waste in a shielded cell that would have "exponentially amplified the grotesquerie of odor" of the accumulating waste, which resulted in mental-health problems and attempted suicide. The court held that the prisoner adequately pleaded an Eighth Amendment claim against prison officials by alleging that his restricted diet was unusually unhealthy, where his diet consisted of bread that was usually stale and cabbage that usually was rotten. According to the court, whether state prisoner's psychological pain and resulting suicide attempt constituted an "appreciable injury" that made the various forms of harassment he allegedly suffered actionable, on remand of the prisoner's Eighth Amendment claim of harassment and abuse without physical injury. (Wende Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
TEMPERATURE
MEDICAL CARE

Woodson v. City of Richmond, Virginia, 88 F.Supp.3d 551 (E.D.Va. 2015). A city jail inmate brought an action against city, sheriff, and deputies, alleging deliberate indifference to the inmate's medical needs during a severe heat wave. The sheriff moved for summary judgment. The district court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as: (1) whether the sheriff instituted a policy of confining inmates with medical issues to their cells during mealtime, denying the inmates access to air conditioning in the dining hall; (2) whether the sheriff's decisions to keep inmates confined would qualify as a policy; (3) whether the sheriff was subjectively aware that conditions at the jail posed a substantial risk of harm to inmates; (4) whether the sheriff was subjectively aware that his response to the risks posed to inmates by excessive heat was inadequate; (5) whether the sheriff's policy caused the inmate's injuries; (6) whether the sheriff's alleged failure to investigate two instances of heat-related deaths at the jail, was not persistent and widespread; and (7) whether the sheriff had at least a constructive knowledge of his deputies' alleged failure to perform required 30-minute security checks at a flagrant and widespread level. (Richmond City Jail, Virginia)

2016

U.S. District Court
ISOLATION
MEDICAL CARE
EXERCISE

Szubielski v. Pierce, 152 F.Supp.3d 227 (D. Del. 2016). A state prisoner, acting pro se and in forma pauperis (IFP), brought a § 1983 action against prison officials, relating to his continuing classification for solitary confinement. At the screening stage of the case, the district court held that the prisoner stated a First Amendment retaliation claim against a prison warden and an Eighth Amendment claim regarding conditions of confinement. The prisoner complained of 24-hour cell confinement, limited recreation, extreme social isolation, environmental deprivation, limited telephone calls, and limited visits. The prisoner suffered from schizophrenia, severe manic depression, and an anxiety disorder. The court found that the prisoner's allegations that the prison warden retaliated against him after a civil rights advocacy organization filed a lawsuit challenging solitary confinement of prisoners, by keeping the prisoner in solitary confinement despite a classification committee's reclassification of the prisoner for medium-security housing, stated a First Amendment retaliation claim. According to the court, the prisoner's allegations that his continued solitary confinement, which had already lasted nine years, involved extreme social isolation, inadequate medical care, limited recreation, and environmental deprivation, stated a claim the under the Eighth Amendment regarding conditions of confinement. (James T. Vaughn Correctional Center, Delaware)

SECTION 10: CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENT

Detention and Corrections Caselaw Catalog All Rights Reserved
CRS, Inc. 925 Johnson Drive, Gettysburg PA 17325 (717) 338-9100 www.correction.org/

The following pages present summaries of court decisions which address this topic area. These summaries provide readers with highlights of each case, but are not intended to be a substitute for the review of the full case. The cases do not represent all court decisions which address this topic area, but rather offer a sampling of relevant holdings.

The decisions summarized below were current as of the date indicated on the title page of this edition of the Catalog. Prior to publication, the citation for each case was verified, and the case was researched in Shepard's Citations to determine if it had been altered upon appeal (reversed or modified). The Catalog is updated annually. An annual supplement provides replacement pages for cases in the prior edition which have changed, and adds new cases. Readers are encouraged to consult the Topic Index to identify related topics of interest. The text in the section entitled "How to Use The Catalog" at the beginning of the Catalog provides an overview which may also be helpful to some readers.

The case summaries which follow are organized by year, with the earliest case presented first. Within each year, cases are organized alphabetically by the name of the plaintiff. The left margin offers a quick reference, highlighting the type of court involved and identifying appropriate subtopics addressed by each case.

1962

U.S. District Court
ISOLATION

Fulwood v. Clemmer, 206 F.Supp. 370 (D. D.C. 1962). Isolation in solitary confinement for two years constitutes cruel and unusual punishment because the only violation of prison rules was relatively minor. (District of Columbia Jail)

1970

U.S. District Court
ISOLATION

Davis v. Lindsay, 321 F.Supp. 1134 (S.D. N.Y. 1970). Incarceration in isolation and under certain circumstance violates the eighth amendment. (City Jail, New York)

U.S. District Court
TRUSTIES
ISOLATION
LABOR

Holt v. Sarver, 309 F.Supp. 362 (E.D. Ark. 1970). State prisoners challenged conditions and practices in the state prison system. The district court held that conditions and practices in the Arkansas penitentiary system, including a trusty system whereby trustees ran the prison, open barracks system, conditions in isolation cells, and absence of a meaningful rehabilitation program, were such that confinement of persons in the system amounted to cruel and unusual punishment prohibited by eighth and fourteenth amendments.

Forced uncompensated labor of state convicts did not violate the thirteenth amendment. The Arkansas system of working convicts was not "slavery" in the constitutional sense of term.

To the extent that unconstitutional racial discrimination was being practiced in state prison system, such discrimination was to be eliminated. The fourteenth amendment prohibits racial discrimination within prisons, and the prohibition extends to racial segregation of inmates.

Confinement in an otherwise unexceptional penal institution is not unconstitutional simply because institution does not operate school, or provide vocational training or other rehabilitative facilities and services, but the absence of an affirmative program of training and rehabilitation may have constitutional significance where in the absence of such program conditions and practices exist which actually militate against reform and rehabilitation.

Term "cruel and unusual punishment" cannot be defined with specificity. It is flexible and tends to broaden as society tends to pay more regard to human decency and dignity and becomes, or likes to think that it becomes, more humane. Generally speaking, punishment that amounts to torture, when it is grossly excessive in proportion to the offense for which it is imposed, or that is inherently unfair, or that is unnecessarily degrading, or that is shocking or disgusting to people of reasonable sensitivity is a "cruel and unusual punishment". Punishment that is not inherently cruel and unusual may become so by reason of the manner in which it is inflicted.

Elimination of a trusty system under which trustees had unsupervised power over other inmates was essential to the establishment of prison system meeting constitutional standards. (Arkansas Prison System)

1971

U.S. District Court
PRETRIAL
DETAINEES

Hamilton v. Love, 328 F.Supp. 1182 (E.D. Ark. 1971). Detainees may not be subjected to any punishment, "cruel and unusual" or not. The only legitimate purpose served by pretrial detention is assuring defendants' presence at trial. Minimally, a detainee ought to have the reasonable expectation that he would survive his period of detainment with his life; that he would not be assaulted, abused, or molested during his detainment; and that his physical and mental health would be reasonably protected during this period. Conditions of incarceration for detainees must, cumulatively, add up to the least restrictive means of assuring appearance at trial. One female staff member must be on duty twenty-four hours a day. There should be one staff member patrolling on each cell floor in the immediate area of every detainee on a twenty-four hour basis. (Pulaski County Jail, Arkansas)

U.S. District Court
EXERCISE

Sinclair v. Henderson, 441 F.Supp. 1123 (E.D. La. 1971). Confinement for long periods of time without the opportunity for regular outdoor exercise violates the eighth amendment. (Louisiana State Penitentiary)

1972

U.S. District Court SECURITY
JUVENILES

Baker v. Hamilton, 345 F.Supp. 345 (W.D. Ky. 1972). Broken locks contribute to a finding of cruel and unusual punishment as to juveniles. (Jefferson County Jail, Kentucky)

U.S. District Court
STATE STATUTES

Taylor v. Sterrett, 344 F.Supp. 411 (N.D. Tex. 1972), reh'g denied, 420 U.S. 983 (1974). Where conditions of confinement do not meet the minimum requirements of state statutes, the court need not reach the subjective criteria of cruel and unusual punishment. (Dallas County Jail, Texas)

1973

U.S. Appeals Court
ISOLATION

Johnson v. Glick, 481 F.2d 1028 (2nd Cir. 1973), cert. denied, 414 U.S. 1033. Eighth amendment is applicable to solitary confinement. (Manhattan House of Detention, New York)

U.S. District Court
FOOD

Johnson v. Lark, 365 F.Supp. 289 (E.D. Mo. 1973). Low quality and temperature of food service contributes to a finding of cruel and unusual punishment. (St. Louis County Jail, Missouri)

1975

U.S. District Court
DISCIPLINE
MEDICAL CARE

Craig v. Hocker, 405 F.Supp 656 (D. Nev., 1975). Prisoners brought action against the warden and others challenging various aspects of prison administration and the discipline of prisoners. The district court held: (1) that prisoners who were subject to disciplinary proceedings were entitled to certain due process rights; (2) that the classification process could not be equated with disciplinary proceedings for the purposes of due process; (3) that prisoners were entitled to access to courts and to the availability of certain legal material; (4) that prisoners were not being denied medical care and treatment; (5) that certain aspects of punitive segregation cells constituted cruel and unusual punishment; (6) that statutes providing for prison confinement of mentally ill persons for security reasons were unconstitutional; and (7) that the prisoners were not entitled to damages. (Nevada State Prison)

U.S. District Court
REMEDIES

Miller v. Carson, 401 F.Supp. 835 (M.D. Fla. 1975), aff'd, 563 F.2d 741 (5th Cir. 1977). Where it can be shown that prison conditions are so bad as to constitute cruel and unusual punishment, the relief to be afforded may properly include an order compelling the provision of basic rehabilitative services and facilities. (Duval County Jail, Florida)

1976

U.S. Supreme Court
MEDICAL CARE

Estelle v. Gamble, 429 U.S. 97 (1976), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 1066 (1976). Gamble, a Texas state inmate, brought this 42 U.S.C. Section 1983 action against Estelle, Texas Corrections Director, the state corrections department medical director, and two correctional officials, claiming inadequate treatment of a back injury sustained while engaged in prison work constituted cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the eighth amendment. The U.S. District Court dismissed the complaint for failure to state a cause of action upon which relief could be granted. The Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals ruled the complaint must be reinstated, and the state officials petitioned for a writ of certiorari from the U.S. Supreme Court. (Reversed and Remanded.) HELD: "[D]eliberate indifference to serious needs of prisoners constitutes the 'unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain' proscribed by the eighth amendment. This is true whether the indifference is manifested by prison doctors in their response to the prisoner's needs or by prison guards in intentionally denying or delaying access to medical care or intentionally interfering with the treatment once prescribed. Regardless of how evidenced, deliberate indifference to a prisoner's serious illness or injury states a cause of action under Section 1983." 429 U.S. at 104-105.

CAVEAT: "This conclusion does not mean, however, that every claim by a prisoner that he has not received adequate medical treatment states a violation of the eighth amendment. An accident, although it may produce added anguish, is not on that basis alone to be characterized as wanton infliction of unnecessary pain.... Similarly, in the medical context, an inadvertent failure to provide adequate medical care cannot be said to constitute 'an unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain' or to be 'repugnant to the conscience of mankind.' Thus a complaint stating that a physician has been negligent in dispersing or treating a medical condition does not state a valid claim of medical mistreatment under the eighth amendment. Medical malpractice does not become a constitutional violation merely because the victim is a prisoner." 429 U.S. at 105-106.

GENERAL RATIONALE: "An inmate must rely on prison authorities to treat his medical needs; if the authorities fail to do so, his needs will not be met. In the worst cases, such a failure may actually produce 'physical torture or a lingering death'... In less severe cases, denial of needed care may result in pain and suffering which no one suggests would serve any penological purpose.... The infliction of such unnecessary suffering is inconsistent with contemporary standards of decency as manifested in modern legislation [both statutory and model correctional standards] codifying the common-law view that 'it is but just that the public be required to care for the prisoner, who cannot by reason of the deprivation of his liberty, care for himself.'" 424 U.S. at 103-104. (Texas Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
PRETRIAL
DETAINEES

Hampton v. Holmesburg Prison Officials, 546 F.2d 1077 (3rd Cir. 1976). Protection of detainees is founded in due process and equal protection clauses, not the eighth amendment or the presumption of innocence. (Holmesburg Federal Penitentiary, Pennsylvania)

U.S. Appeals Court
MEDICAL CARE

Harris v. Chancellor, 537 F.2d 203 (5th Cir. 1976). A warden's deliberate indifference to an inmate's severe and obvious injuries is tantamount to an intentional infliction of cruel and unusual punishment. (Glynn County Jail, Georgia)

U.S. District Court
JUVENILES
VIOLENCE

Rodriguez v. Jiminez, 409 F.Supp. 582 (D. P.R. 1976). Confinement in jail where violence and terror reigns violates rights secured by fourteenth and eighth amendments. Confinement of juvenile offenders to an institution where unconstitutional conditions exist constitutes cruel and unusual punishment. Placing one copy of the prison regulations in the library does not meet due process requirement of informing inmates of institutional rules. (San Juan District Jail)

U.S. District Court
RESTRAINTS

Tate v. Kassulke, 409 F.Supp. 651 (W.D. Ky. 1976). Chaining a mentally disturbed inmate to a bed for any protracted length of time would be cruel and unusual punishment. (Jefferson County Jail, Kentucky)

1977

U.S. District Court
MEDICAL CARE

Todaro v. Ward, 431 F.Supp. 1129 (S.D. N.Y. 1977), aff'd, 652 F.2d 54 (1981). The federal district court found the medical system to violate the cruel and unusual punishment clause of the eighth amendment because it constitutes "deliberate indifference" to the inmates' needs. (Bedford Hills Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
MEDICAL CARE

Vinnedge v. Gibbs, 550 F.2d 926 (4th Cir. 1977). Willful denial of medical treatment may constitute cruel and unusual punishment. (Fairfax County Jail, Virginia)

1978

U.S. District Court
SANITATION
CROWDING

Burks v. Walsh, 461 F.Supp. 454 (W.D. Missouri, 1978). Actions were brought seeking injunctive and declaratory relief on behalf of inmates at the Missouri State Penitentiary. After a trial limited to the issues of overcrowding and unsanitary conditions, the district court held that: (1) triple celling inmates in 59.2-square-foot cells in the diagnostic center, in 65-square-foot cells in the administrative segregation unit, and in 66-square-foot cells in the adjustment unit, as well as double celling of inmates in 47.18-square-foot cells in the special treatment unit, constituted cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the eighth amendment, but (2) except in such instances, the conditions in the aggregate which presently existed at the State Penitentiary did not violate the cruel and unusual punishment clause of the eighth amendment.

In examining conditions of state penitentiary, the court's inquiry had to be limited to determining whether conditions at the penitentiary caused inmates to suffer deprivations of constitutional dimensions.

The eighth amendment's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment is not limited to specific acts directed at selected individuals, but is equally pertinent to general conditions of confinement. Confinement itself will result in a finding of cruel and unusual punishment, however, only where confinement is characterized by conditions and practices so bad as to be shocking to the conscience of reasonably civilized people.

In determining whether conditions at the state penitentiary constituted cruel and unusual punishment, the district court had to be cautious not to place undue emphasis upon "design capacities" and minimum square footage mandates of other courts, nor were minimum square footage standards of various professional associations dispositive. Furthermore, in applying the "totality of circumstances" approach to Missouri Penitentiary conditions, the relaxed amicable atmosphere generated by the prison administration had to tip scales in favor of the state in areas of doubtful constitutionality.

In the aggregate, and with certain exceptions regarding overcrowding in certain units, all conditions presently existing at Missouri State Penitentiary, including but not limited to conditions and qualities of individual cells, showers, toilets, dining halls, kitchen, windows, temperature, noise level, canteen, recreational areas, laundry service, ventilation systems, visiting room, pest control program, prison industries and other activities, are not intolerable in light of the modern conscience, or shocking to the conscience of the court, and thus do not violate cruel and unusual punishment clause of the eighth amendment.

The Missouri State Penitentiary is overcrowded but, because it has so much acreage within the walls, because of the many and varied activities available to inmates, and because of the relative freedom enjoyed by inmates to utilize recreational areas and the many activities available to them, the penitentiary, viewed as a whole, is not now so overcrowded as to be intolerable, inhumane, totally unreasonable in light of the modern conscience, or shocking to the conscience of the court.

Double ceiling of penitentiary inmates in 65-square-foot cells in administrative segregation unit was not intolerable, inhumane, totally unreasonable or shocking to the court's conscience where common areas of unit were very clean and sanitary, individual cells were reasonably clean and sanitary, and the unit was utilized to punish those inmates who committed serious offenses while confined in penitentiary.

Double ceiling of state penitentiary inmates in diagnostic unit cells measuring 59.2 square feet for period of one to five weeks did not violate the eighth amendment, in spite of the fact that inmates were confined to their cells for greater portion of day than were inmates in general population, where they could leave their cells three times daily for meals, once a week to go to canteen, once a week to go to movies, and once a week for two hours of gym and where, in addition, much of their time was occupied by meetings with caseworkers, taking a battery of tests and physical examinations. (Missouri State Penitentiary)

U.S. District Court
CROWDING
PROTECTIVE CUSTODY

M.C.I. Concord Advisory Bd. v. Hall, 447 F.Supp. 398 (D. Mass, 1978). In a civil rights action brought to challenge conditions of confinement at a state correctional institution, the district court held that: (1) plaintiff prisoners sustained the burden of proving that incarceration of inmates in protective custody cells, in awaiting action cells and in institutional holding cells violated eighth amendment standards, but (2) plaintiffs failed to sustain their burden of proving that double ceiling in one area and use of a hospital wardroom for a dormitory violated eighth amendment standards. Injunctive relief was granted in part.

An eighth amendment proscription against cruel and unusual punishment is flexible, drawing its meaning from evolving standards of decency that mark the progress of maturing society, and penal measures are to be evaluated against broad and idealistic concepts of dignity, civilized standards, humanity and decency.

An equal protection challenge to a policy under which inmates undergoing classification and placement at state institutions were single-celled in contrast to double ceiling during classification at one institution involved neither suspect classification nor fundamental interest, and a heavy burden rested with plaintiff prisoners to demonstrate that no rational justification existed for separate classification programs.

Nothing in the constitution requires prison officials to treat all inmate groups alike where differentiation may avoid institutional disruption or violence.

Actions of prison officials in separating newly admitted inmates and protective custody prisoners from the general prison population are subject to a basic due process requirement that such distinctions be rational rather than arbitrary or capricious, but, on record, the method of classifying inmates within this particular institution was not shown to be arbitrary or capricious.

Prisoners failed to sustain burden of proof that dormitory use of a hospital wardroom violated constitutional rights of inmates who slept therein and failed to show that use of the wardroom infringed on constitutional rights of inmates to adequate medical care. (M.C.I. Concord, Mass.)

1979

U.S. Appeals Court
MEDICAL CARE

Fielder v. Bosshard, 590 F.2d 105 (5th Cir. 1979). Jury awarded $99,000 damages against jailer and sheriff for death of county jail prisoner. The deceased prisoner was arrested and jailed for nonsupport. Although informed of the prisoner's need for medication jail officials did not respond to his repeated requests. The jury found the officials were callously indifferent to the prisoner's known medical needs. (Williamson County Jail, Texas)

U.S. District Court
MEDICAL CARE
COMMISSARY

Jefferson v. Douglas 493 F.Supp. 13 (W.D. Okla. 1979). According to the U.S. District Court for the Western District of Oklahoma, prison officials' cancellation of an inmate's canteen privileges in order to insure that he remain within the bounds of a prescribed diabetic diet does not amount to cruel and unusual punishment. Halton Jefferson, an inmate at the Lexington, Oklahoma Assignment and Reception Center (LARC) filed a pro-se action under Section 1983 alleging that the decision of prison officials to refuse him canteen privileges amounted to cruel and unusual punishment. Jefferson, a diabetic, cited medical journals which suggested that a diabetic should always carry sugar items to prevent the occurrence of a diabetic coma. Since he was restricted to nonsugar diet, Jefferson contended the canteen was the only source from which he could obtain sugar items to protect himself against a coma. A report, ordered by the trial judge in Jefferson's suit, revealed a different aspect of the matter. LARC, recognizing that Jefferson was a diabetic, had prepared a special diet for him, limiting his caloric intake to 1800 calories per day. Later, this figure was reduced to 1500 calories.

Nevertheless, Jefferson continued to gain weight. Canteen records and verbal reports showed that Jefferson made a habit of eating such items as ice cream, bread, peanut butter and jelly sandwiches, sweet rolls, Fritos, Cheetos, soda pop (sugared) and candy. The report termed Jefferson's conduct a "deliberate effort to violate the special diet ordered for him." Presented with these facts, the court noted that the decision of the LARC officials to eliminate Jefferson's canteen privileges was the type of administrative decision with which court should not interfere. Moreover, the court stated that the action falls far short of shocking the conscience, a showing which is essential to demonstrate cruel and unusual punishment. As a result of these findings, the court thus dismissed the inmate's complaint. (Assignment and Reception Center, Lexington, Oklahoma)

U.S. District Court
MEDICAL CARE

Maynard v. Kear, 474 F.Supp. 794 (N.D. Oh. 1979). Failure of police to take an inmate suffering from "slight bleeding" to a physician or hospital is not sufficient to claim a violation of the eighth amendment where no permanent injury results. (City of North Olmsted, Ohio)

1980

U.S. Supreme Court
MEDICAL CARE

Carlson v. Green, 100 S.Ct. 1468 (1980). In this case, Green as administratrix of the estate of her deceased son, brought suit in an Indiana U.S. District Court, alleging that while her son was an inmate in a Federal prison, officials failed to give him proper medical attention, causing personal injuries from which he died. Green claimed this violated her son's eighth amendment protection against cruel and unusual punishment. Asserting jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. Section 1331 (a.), Green sought compensatory and punitive damages. The U.S. District Court held that the complaint gave rise to a cause of action under Bivens for damages, but dismissed the complaint because Illinois survivorship and wrongful death laws limited recoverable damages to less than the $10,000 required to meet 1331 (a.) jurisdiction.

The Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals agreed with the district court, but held that Section 1331 (a.) was satisfied because whenever a state survivorship statute would preclude a Bivens action, the federal common law allows survival of the action.

HELD: In ruling that a Bivens remedy against individual federal agents was permissible in this case, as well as an action against the federal government under the Federal Tort Claims Act, the court stated: "Plainly FTCA is not a sufficient protector of the citizens' constitutional rights, and without a clear congressional mandate we cannot hold that Congress relegated [Green] exclusively to the FTCA remedy." 100 S.Ct. at 1474.

(Federal Correctional Center, Indiana)

U.S. District Court
SANITATION
FIRE SAFETY LIGHTS
NOISE
VENTILATION
EXERCISE

Hutchings v. Corum, 501 F.Supp. 1276 (W.D. Mo. 1980). Class action is brought challenging the constitutionality of numerous conditions and practices at the county jail. The district court held that: (1) prison authorities' failure to immediately evacuate inmates from any sewage contaminated cell, pending thorough cleaning of cell, violated constitutional rights of inmates subject to that condition; (2) deficiencies in jail, including lack of fire escape, absence of windows, lack of necessary fire doors, and limited number of fire extinguishers amounted to constitutionally intolerable conditions. Prison conditions for an unconvicted person are to be judged against due process standards of the fifth and fourteenth amendments and conditions within the penal institution which are unconstitutional for the convicted person under eighth amendment review are likewise an abridgment of due process guarantees afforded unconvicted persons.

The claim that financial restrictions have prevented improvements in jail conditions is not a defense to constitutional violations.

Although lights were left on all night in the county jail, and there was a high noise level at night, such were not per se unconstitutional conditions, since inmates could sleep during the day, and there was no indication that inmates had developed psychological or physiological problems.

An entirely inadequate ventilation system at the county jail constituted a constitutionally intolerable living condition.

Deficiencies in the county jail, including lack of fire escapes, absence of windows, lack of necessary fire doors, and limited number of fire extinguishers amounted to constitutionally intolerable conditions.

Failure of county jail authorities to provide each inmate one hour per day of exercise outside cells was a constitutionally intolerable condition. (Clay County Jail, Missouri)

U.S. District Court USE OF FORCE

Santiago v. Yarde, 487 F.Supp. 52 (S.D. N.Y. 1980). The allegation of the use of force to remove the plaintiff from the cell does not shock the conscience since the force used was apparently not excessive. Therefore, the use of force does not constitute a cruel and unusual punishment. (Bronx House of Detention, New York)

1981

U.S. Appeals Court
MEDICAL CARE CELLS
BEDDING

Chavis v. Rowe, 643 F.2d 1281 (7th Cir. 1981). Reversing a dismissal granted by a federal district court, the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit held that the failure of a disciplinary review board to provide an inmate with exculpatory evidence relating to the charges against him amounted to an actionable violation of his right to due process. The court also ruled that the inmate's allegations of the conditions to which he was exposed during six months in segregation raised a valid claim of cruel and unusual punishment.

The court stated that the inmate's eighth amendment claims of cruel and unusual punishment arising from his confinement in segregation should not have been dismissed, even though he did not specifically allege bad faith in his complaint. The inmate made the following allegations, which if proven would amount to cruel and unusual punishment: confinement in a 5x7 foot cell with four other residents; inadequate bedding, light, toilet facilities, and showers; insufficient access to legal materials, medical and dental care and food.

The court thus reversed the district court's order of dismissal and reinstated the case. (Statesville Correctional Center, Joliet, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
CROWDING

Hendrix v. Faulkner, 525 F.Supp. 435 (N.D. Ind. 1981), cert. denied, 104 S.Ct. 3587 (1983), aff'd, 715 F.2d 269. The conditions of overcrowding at the Indiana State Prison constitute a violation of the eighth amendment in light of the physical plant and limits on staffing. Therefore, prison officials were required to take immediate action to ameliorate the conditions. Contributing to the limited time out of the cell is a sheer number of inmates. There was testimony that some inmates had not had outside recreation in five months. However, other conditions at the prison did not rise to the level of constitutional violations. (Indiana State Prison)

U.S. Appeals Court
TOTALITY OF CONDITIONS

Jones v. Diamond, 636 F.2d 1364 (5th Cir. 1981). Prisoners being held in the county jail brought an action challenging conditions of their confinement and seeking damages for violation of their civil rights. The United States District Court for the Southern District of Mississippi entered judgment generally favorable to county officials, and the prisoners appealed. On rehearing, the court of appeals held that in determining whether conditions of confinement are unconstitutional under the eighth amendment or fourteenth amendment, the court does not assay separately each of the institutional practices but looks to the totality of conditions. Further, the court is limited to enforcing constitutional standards rather than assuming superintendence of jail administration. (Jackson County Jail, Pascagoula, Mississippi)

U.S. Appeals Court
PRETRIAL
DETAINEES
CROWDING
DOUBLE CELLING

Lareau v. Manson, 651 F.2d 96 (2nd Cir. 1981). Adopting most of the findings of the district court, the United States of Appeals for the Second Circuit has ordered major reforms in the Hartford Community Correctional Center (HCCC), dealing generally with overcrowding. The constitutional standard for the legality of conditions of confinement is different for pretrial detainees and for convicted inmates. For pretrial detainees, the test is whether the conditions amount to punishment without due process in violation of the fourteenth amendment. With respect to convicted inmates, the criterion is whether the punishment is cruel and unusual as defined under the eighth amendment.

Reviewing the numerous findings of the district court, the appellate court looked to the supreme court case of Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520. Viewing overcrowding at the HCCC as related to pretrial detainees, the court cited the following standard of whether such conditions amount to punishment: "It must be shown that the overcrowding subjects a detainee over an extended period to genuine privation and hardship not reasonably related to a legitimate governmental objective."

Based upon this standard the court found that double-bunking in cells originally designed for one person, compounded by overcrowded dayrooms, imposed unconstitutional punishment on pretrial detainees in all cases except where such hardship was related to a legitimate governmental purpose. The court here found that these hardships promoted neither security nor the effective management of the institution.

Other conditions were even less acceptable. The use of a glass enclosed dayroom (dubbed the "fish tank") as a dormitory room housing numerous inmates on a full time basis was held to amount to punishment and was thus unconstitutional with regard to pretrial detainees. In addition, the placing of mattresses on the floors of cells to accommodate more inmates and the assignment of healthy inmates to medical cells (sometimes with mentally or physically ill cellmates) to alleviate overcrowding were held to constitute impermissible punishment.

The court further stated that the length of incarceration of pretrial detainees becomes relevant in such determination: "Conditions unacceptable for weeks or months might be tolerable for a few days." As such, the court indicated that while double-bunking and overloaded dayrooms might be tolerable, and thus constitutionally permissible for a few days, after 15 or so days, they would become unacceptable punishment. The use of the "fish tank" and floor mattresses, however, were held to constitute punishment regardless of the number of days imposed.

Viewing the conditions as they related to convicted persons, the court pointed out that it was to be guided by a wholly different standard. Here, in order to constitute a constitutional violation, the conditions had to be such as to amount to cruel and unusual punishment. Nevertheless, the court found the overcrowded conditions intolerable. Noting that the thirty to thirty-five square feet of living space per inmate fell far short of the standards promulgated by groups such as the Connecticut Department of Corrections, the American Correctional Association, the United Nations and the National Sheriffs' Association, and further noting that the dayroom at the HCCC offered the "relief of a noisy subway platform" the court held that double-bunking, with respect to convicted inmates, was unconstitutional except where inmates are confined no more than about thirty days.

As with the pretrial detainees, the court found that the constitutional rights of the convicted inmates were immediately violated by confinement in the "fish tank" and by policies requiring them to sleep on mattresses on the floors and to be assigned to medical holding cells for no reason other than to alleviate overcrowding.

Finally, the court ordered that all newly admitted inmates, with minor exceptions, be given a medical examination within forty-eight hours of admission. (Hartford Community Correctional Center, Connecticut)

U.S. District Court
ISOLATION
BEDDING
TOILETS

O'Conner v. Keller, 510 F.Supp. 1359 (D. Md. 1981). Confinement in a strip cell (isolation) does not constitute a per se violation of the eighth amendment. Where the purpose of placing the individual in strip cell was to permit him to calm down after an incident in the institution, the placement was reasonable. However, the continuance of the placement for two days without providing a mattress, toilet paper, or operational plumbing was unreasonable and violated due process, particularly where the staff providing regular checks of the condition of the inmate had indicated that he was calm and normal. The Court finds that the stay was at least twenty-four hours too long. Guards who failed to act on the reports of proper behavior in isolation are liable. $200 in damages was awarded. (Maryland Correctional Institution)

U.S. Appeals Court
FOOD

Ramos v. Lamm, 639 F.2d 559 (10th Cir. 1980), cert. denied, 450 U.S. 1041. While the state health code does not establish a constitutional minimum for the conditions of a kitchen, it is substantial evidence of what constitutes the humane conditions required by the eighth amendment. The record indicates that the conditions of the kitchen constitute a substantial hazard to the health of the inmates and that they, therefore, violate the eighth amendment. (State Penitentiary, Canon City, Colorado)

U.S. Supreme Court
DOUBLE CELLING
SANITATION
SAFETY
STAFFING

Rhodes v. Chapman, 101 S.Ct. 2392 (1981). In a remarkable 8 to 1 decision, the Supreme Court upheld double ceiling at the Southern Ohio Correctional Facility at Lucasville. The maximum security facility was built in the early 1970's with gymnasiums, workshops, school rooms, day room, two chapels, a hospital ward, a commissary, a barber shop and a library. Outdoors, there is a recreation field, visitation area and library. The physical plant itself is a topflight first-class facility. Each cell is sixty-three square feet in area and contains a bed or bunk bed measuring thirty-six by eighty inches, a cabinet nightstand, a wall-mounted sink with hot and cold water, a flushable toilet and a built-in radio. One wall of each cell is barred. Day rooms are open from 6:30 a.m. until 9:30 p.m., and inmates may pass between these rooms and their cells for a ten minute period each hour. At the time of the trial, the facility housed 2,300 inmates, two-thirds of whom were serving life or long-term sentences. Some 1,400 men were double celled.

Despite the favorable nature of the plant's design, the district court found that double ceiling constituted cruel and unusual punishment. The Supreme Court reversed, noting: "No static test can exist by which courts determine whether conditions of confinement are cruel and unusual, for the Eighth Amendment must draw its meaning from the evolving standards of decency that mark the progress of a maturing society." Applying those principles to this institution, the court found that the evidence did not support a conclusion that the eighth amendment was violated. The majority said:

The double celling made necessary by the unanticipated increase in prison population did not lead to deprivations of essential food, medical care or sanitation. Nor did it increase violence among inmates or create other conditions intolerable for prison confinement. Although job and educational opportunities diminished marginally as a result of double celling, limited work hours and delay before receiving education do not inflict pain, much less unnecessary and wanton pain; deprivations of this kind simply are not punishment.

The Court continued, "We would have to wrench the eighth amendment from its language and history to hold that delay of these desirable aids to rehabilitation violates the Constitution." Three justices, Brennan, Blackmun and Stevens, authored a concurring opinion. It attempted to list some of the things which would determine whether a facility has such poor conditions as to violate the eighth amendment. Those conditions are:

-Physical plant conditions: lighting, heat, plumbing, ventilation, living space, noise levels, and recreation space.

-Sanitation: control of vermin and insects, food preparation, medical facilities, lavatories and showers, clean places for eating, sleeping and working

-Safety: protection from violent, deranged or diseased inmates; fire protection and emergency evacuation.

-Staffing: trained and adequate guards and other staff, and avoidance of placing inmates in positions of authority over other inmates.

This majority of justices cautioned that sixty-three square feet of cell space is not enough for two men. Such conditions, they noted, are a clear signal to legislative officials that additional facilities must be constructed or inmate populations reduced by other means. The justices did state, however, that cramped facilities are not unconstitutional per se.

NOTE: This decision dealt with long-term convicted inmates, not short-term prisoners in county and city jails. In some circumstances, pretrial detainees who are still presumed innocent until convicted have greater rights, such as access to lawyers and courts. On the other hand, because of the short periods of confinement, a jail facility does not need as elaborate areas for recreation, libraries, exercise and other services, as required for the longer term population of prisons. (Southern Ohio Correctional Facility, Lucasville)

1982

U.S. Appeals Court FOOD

Cunningham v. Jones, 667 F.2d 565 (6th Cir. 1982). A prisoner's eighth amendment rights are not violated when he is served only one meal a day for fifteen consecutive days. The one meal furnished a day was sufficient to maintain normal health for the fifteen days involved. The jail cook testified and estimated the caloric contents of the noon meals at between 2,000 and 2,500 calories. (McCracken County Jail, Kentucky)

U.S. Appeals Court DOUBLE CELLING

Glynn v. Auger, 678 F.2d 760 (8th Cir. 1982). Double-celling is not cruel and unusual punishment. The eighth Circuit Court of Appeals held that the double-celling of an Iowa Men's Reformatory (IMR) prisoner did not violate the ex post facto clause. The court also found that the policy did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment.

After reaching the highest level of a prison incentive program, the prisoner was housed in a single cell in a remodeled housing unit of the prison. Due to an increase in the number of inmates, officials began double-celling a portion of the building. When the plaintiff objected to this procedure, he was given the choices of being double-celled, being single-celled in a smaller cell with no loss of privileges or being placed in a lower level cell with reduced privileges.

The inmate brought suit contending that the double-celling was an ex post facto increase in his punishment; the district court disagreed, also finding that the action was not a punishment. The inmate then appealed.

The Circuit Court agreed with the lower court, stating: "The constitutional prohibition against ex post facto law was designed to secure substantial personal rights against arbitrary and oppressive legislative action, and not to obstruct mere alteration in conditions deemed necessary for the orderly infliction of humane punishment." Malloy v. South Carolina, 237 U.S. 180, 35 S.Ct. 507 (1915).

The appeals court also found that the double-celling did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment. (Iowa Men's Reformatory)

U.S. District Court VIOLENCE

Grubbs v. Bradley, 552 F.Supp. 1052 (M.D. Tenn. 1982). A classification system may be required. While there is no constitutional right to a classification system, where the absence of such a system substantially contributes to violence in the institution, such a system may be required. Here, the court notes that the classification system is virtually meaningless since cell and work and even institutional assignments are not really made on the basis of other than available space. The court finds that inmates do not have a right to participate in the classification decision since that is a matter of administrative discretion.

Prisoners brought a class action suit against the conditions of confinement in certain Tennessee adult prison facilities, alleging unconstitutional conditions. The district court held certain conditions and practices amounted to cruel and unusual punishment. Inmates have no constitutional claim to any particular security classification, but if proof shows a sufficient connection between an improper classification system and the violation of a constitutionally protected right, such as the right to be free from excessive violence, there may be just cause for court intervention.
(Tennessee Correctional System)

U.S. Appeals Court
TOTALITY OF CONDITIONS
LIGHTING
PLUMBING
FIRE SAFETY
SANITATION
VENTILATION

Hoptowit v. Ray, 682 F.2d 1237 (9th Cir. 1982). Eighth amendment violations cannot be based on "totality of conditions." In an opinion discussing the Washington State Penitentiary, the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals held that certain conditions in the facility are unconstitutional. The court held that an eighth amendment violation may not be based solely on a combination of conditions, if none of the conditions would be unconstitutional if viewed alone.

The lower court had found that lighting was substandard, plumbing was unsatisfactory, fire prevention was substandard, food service did not meet public health standards, that there was evidence of vermin infestation, and that ventilation was inadequate. The court of appeals accepted these findings, but noted that none of these conditions standing alone would be unconstitutional, thus reversing the lower court's order to improve those conditions. The court of appeals did find that the level of violence was unconstitutional, and that the medical care did not meet constitutional standards, but rejected the district court's remedies. (Washington State Penitentiary)

U.S. District Court
TOILETS

Lyons v. Papantoniou, 558 F.Supp. 4 (E.D. Tenn. 1982), aff'd, 705 F.2d 455 (6th Cir. 1982). Transfer from one county jail to another does not violate constitutional rights. Since the federal constitution did not secure the right of an inmate to be confined in any particular jail, the federal district court did not have reason to review the transfer. The inmate's temporary twenty-four hour confinement in the latter jail in a cell lacking adequate bathroom facilities and cigarettes did not amount to cruel and unusual punishment. (Carter County Jail, Tennessee)

U.S. Appeals Court
PRIVACY

Smith v. Fairman, 678 F.2d 52 (C.D. Ill. 1982), cert. denied, 103 S.Ct. 1879 (1982). The 7th Circuit Court of Appeals has held that a pat down search by a female prison guard of a male inmate is permissible so long as the search does not extend to the genital area. The plaintiff was an inmate in an Illinois correctional facility and was subjected to a frisk search which encompassed the head, neck, back, chest, stomach, waist, and the outside of his legs and thighs. Arguing that such a search by a member of the opposite sex was cruel and unusual punishment, he brought this action seeking $40,000 damages and an order to prohibit such searches.

In affirming the district court's ruling for the defendants, the court of appeals noted that any search may be humiliating and degrading, but recognized the clear necessity of searches in prisons and jails. The plaintiff did not argue that the type of search was itself illegal, but only that it was cruel and unusual punishment under the eighth amendment for a member of the opposite sex to conduct the search.

In an affidavit, the warden of the facility stated that the Department of Corrections was obligated to avoid sex discrimination in hiring under Title VII and could not only employ male guards, and that allowing inmate searches only by members of the same sex would prevent the department from fulfilling its obligation of hiring and utilizing people without regard to sex. The court recognized that some limitations do exist, (for example, surveillance by male guards of female inmates who were showering or sleeping) but held that because the inmate was fully clothed during the search, and the search did not extend to the genital or anal area, it was reasonable and did not violate his right of privacy or the eighth amendment's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment. (Pontiac Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
ISOLATION
PLUMBING
TOILETS
EXERCISE
BEDDING
FOOD
DEFENSES

Strachan v. Ashe, 548 F.Supp. 1193 (D. Mass. 1982). Isolation unit conditions are held unconstitutional. Alleging that conditions of an isolation unit in a county correctional facility in Massachusetts were unconstitutional, the plaintiff brought this Section 1983 action.

Although the plaintiff contended that the procedural aspects of the disciplinary proceedings which placed him in isolation, as well as the conditions of isolation were unconstitutional, the court focused on the conditions of the isolation cell. The cell was ten feet by ten feet with no toilet or running water. The plaintiff was permitted to leave his cell only fifteen minutes daily to exercise and to wash with cold water. His only bedding was a mattress on the floor. He was allowed only one blanket, a sheet and pillow. Food served to him was cold.

In discussing the lack of plumbing facilities, the court found that conditions of the isolation cell violated minimum state standards, which did not establish a constitutional violation per se, but lack of adequate plumbing facilities has previously been held to a violation of the eighth amendment.

The court held that because the defendant supervisors had actual notice of the prison conditions, the administrative negligence of not acting on those conditions rose to the level of deliberate indifference in this case. The defendants argued that they were entitled to "good faith immunity," that they could not have been expected to know that they were violating the constitutional rights of the plaintiff. The court rejected this argument, finding that the inmate clearly had a constitutional right to adequate and hygienic means of disposing of his bodily waste. (Hampden County House of Corrections, Massachusetts)

U.S. District Court
VIOLENCE

Williams v. Bennett, 689 F.2d 1370 (11th Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 104 S.Ct. 335 (1982). Supreme Court will not review a decision denying prison officials a "good faith" defense. The United States Supreme Court has declined to hear a case which established that a prisoner who was injured in an attack could sue prison officials in their personal capacity. State prison officials were told that they might personally be liable for damages, under the eighth amendment, by the 11th Circuit Court of Appeals. When an inmate of Holman Prison in Alabama was stabbed by another prisoner and was rendered a permanent quadriplegic, he brought suit alleging violation of his constitutional rights under the eighth amendment. (Holman Prison, Alabama)

1983

U.S. Appeals Court
ISOLATION

Jackson v. Meachum, 699 F.2d 578 (1st Cir. 1983). Segregated inmates are not entitled to communicate with other inmates. The First Circuit Court of Appeals has agreed with many jurisdictions that providing an inmate in segregation confinement with satisfactory conditions, but with virtually no communication or association with fellow inmates does not constitute cruel and unusual treatment.

The suit was brought by an inmate who was placed in the most secure housing unit of a state hospital for being suicidal, disruptive, and violent. The plaintiff alleged that denial of any contact with other prisoners was cruel and unusual punishment and violated the Eighth Amendment.

The factor of psychiatric deterioration brought on by the condition of confinement had been addressed by the Fifth Circuit, in Newman v. Alabama, 559 F.2d 283 (5th Cir. 1977):

The mental, physical, and emotional status of individuals, whether in or out of custody, do (sic) deteriorate and there is no power on earth to prevent it...We decline to enter this uncharted bog. If the state furnishes its prisoners with reasonably adequate food, clothing, shelter, sanitation, medical care, and personal safety, so as to avoid the imposition of cruel and unusual punishment, that ends its obligations under amendment eight.

On this basis the appellate court reversed the district court's decision to provide the inmate with several hours a day of interaction with other inmates and stated:

We do not suggest that the district court's prescription of several hours of inmate contact a day is a mere 'amenity,' to use the language of Newman. It might very well be helpful therapy. But to accept plaintiff's proposition that there is a constitutional right to preventive therapy where psychological deterioration threatens, notwithstanding that the physical conditions of confinement clearly meet or exceed minimal standards, would make the eighth amendment a guarantor of a prison inmate's prior mental health. Such a view, however civilized, would go measurably beyond what today would generally be deemed 'cruel and unusual.'

The court stated that a prison could not be responsible for the inmates' feelings of depression or hopelessness that may be inevitable by-products of incarceration. (Bridgewater State Hospital, Massachusetts)

U.S. Appeals Court
EXERCISE

Wilkerson v. Maggio, 703 F.2d 909 (5th Cir. 1983). Inmate's conduct justifies keeping him in maximum security. It was not unreasonable or arbitrary to consider an inmate a security risk since his past prison conduct had warranted the Reclassification Board's decision to keep him in maximum security, the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals has ruled. The inmate's record showed that the inmate had participated in riots, that he attacked and assaulted correctional officers, and that he was convicted for the murder of another inmate.

Although the inmate was not permitted any outdoor exercise for five years, he was allowed daily, one hour exercise outside his cell in any manner he desired. As such, no violation of the eighth amendment's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment had occurred. (State Penitentiary, Angola, Louisiana)

U.S. District Court
DOUBLE CELLING
CROWDING
CELLS

Dohner v. McCarthy, 635 F.Supp. 408 (C.D.Cal. 1985). Inmates brought a class action suit against the director of California Department of Corrections and the prison superintendent to challenge the constitutionality of conditions of confinement, and some inmates moved for certification of subclasses. The district court held that: (1) conditions for certification of subclasses were not satisfied; (2) double-celling, overcrowding, medical care, sanitation, food, clothing, and safety did not violate the eighth amendment; and (3) no alleged liberty interest in medical and mental health treatment, entitlement to work credits, or visitation rights was violated.

Cells housing two inmates, despite the design for one inmate which contained about eleven and one-half square feet per person when the extra bed was lowered, which required the inmates to crawl over beds to travel from one end of the cell to the other, but which were adequately cleaned and ventilated, which had windows, which had a desk and storage area, and which had noise within tolerable levels were not unfit for human habitation, and, thus, the cell itself satisfied the requirements of prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment.

The factors relevant in assessing pain inflicted by a minimally sized cell for the purposes of cruel and unusual punishment clause includes the following: characteristics of prison population; prison staff's morale; amount of time the inmate has to spend in the cell each day; opportunities available for activities outside the cell; and the ability of the prison staff to be flexible and responsive to individual needs and problems created by double-celling.

The amount of time that the inmates are able to spend away from the cells is a critical factor in determining whether conditions of confinement involve wanton and unnecessary infliction of pain in violation of the cruel and unusual punishment clause. The permanence of double-celling of inmates in cells designed for a single inmate is a factor to be considered together with the size of the cells and the opportunities for inmates to leave the cells during the normal routine of the prison life in determining whether double-celling constitutes cruel and unusual punishment. (California Men's Colony, California)

U.S. Appeals Court
LIGHT
SANITATION SAFETY REMEDY
FOOD

Hoptowit v. Spellman, 753 F.2d 779 (9th Cir. 1985). Inmates brought an action challenging conditions of confinement in a state prison system. On remand, 682 F.2d 1237, the United States District Court entered judgment finding conditions in violation of the eighth amendment and ordered relief. The state appealed. The court of appeals held that: (1) the change of administration, resulting in defendants named in the action either leaving office or changing positions, did not warrant reopening the record on remand; (2) inadequate lighting, vermin infestation, substandard fire prevention, and safety hazards in the prison violated minimum requirements of the eighth amendment; and (3) the order for relief was overbroad in requiring provision of adequate food and clothing where there were no findings of inadequate food and clothing.

Adequate lighting is one of the fundamental attributes of adequate shelter required by the eighth amendment. The evidence that the lighting at the state prison was so poor that it was inadequate for reading, caused eyestrain and fatigue and hindered attempts to insure that basic sanitation was maintained supported the district court's conclusion that the lighting violated the eighth amendment.

The plumbing at the state prison which was in such disrepair as to deprive inmates of basic elements of hygiene and which seriously threatened inmates' physical and mental well-being amounted to cruel and unusual punishment under the eighth amendment.

Vermin infestation at the state prison, considered in light of unsanitary conditions such as standing water, flooded toilets and sinks, and dank air, was unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain proscribed by the eighth amendment.

The prisoners have a right not to be subjected to an unreasonable threat of injury or death by fire and need not wait until actual casualties occur in order to obtain relief from such conditions. Substandard fire prevention at the state prison which endangered inmates' lives violated the eighth amendment.

Lack of adequate ventilation and air flow which undermined the health of prison inmates and the sanitation of the prison violated the minimum requirement of the eighth amendment.

Persons involuntarily confined by the state have a constitutional right to safe conditions of confinement. Safety hazards found throughout the state prison's occupational areas, which were exacerbated by prison's inadequate lighting and which seriously threatened the safety and security of the inmates, created unconstitutional infliction of pain. The failure to provide adequate cell cleaning supplies in light of overall squalor at the state prison violated the eighth amendment. (State Penitentiary, Washington)

U.S. Appeals Court
MEDICAL CARE

Toombs v. Hicks, 773 F.2d 995 (1985). The Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals remanded a case ruling that an inmate stated a claim for cruel and unusual punishment in being assigned a work duty beyond his physical capacity. After his medical reevaluation, he claimed he remained on squad assignment for a two-handed hoe, despite that he was classified as fit for only one-armed duty. The court said that while the inmate may ultimately prove no viable claim, he was to be given the chance to develop his case. (Arkansas Department of Correction)

U.S. District Court
REMEDIES
CROWDING

Inmates of Occoquan v. Barry, 650 F.Supp. 619 (D.D.C. 1986). A class of inmates confined at state medium security facilities brought a federal civil rights action seeking declaratory and injunctive relief for deprivation under color of state law of fifth and eighth amendment rights. The district court held that overcrowding and systemically deficient conditions constituted cruel and unusual punishment justifying equitable relief.

Overcrowding and systemically deficient conditions at state medium security institutions constituted cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the eighth amendment justifying equitable relief of imposition of cap on a number of inmates at each facility and requirement of periodic reports indicating what steps were being taken to address deficiencies. The court ruled:

Accordingly, the Court will order that by June 1, 1987, the population of Occoquan I, II, and III shall not exceed a total of 1,281 inmates, with specific caps set for each dormitory. This total is based on a formula providing each inmate a total of 95 square feet of floor space for sleeping and day room purposes. If defendants provide all inmates with opportunities for work, vocational education or other meaningful programs to eliminate enforced idleness among the inmates, the Court will entertain a motion to modify the square footage formula to 85 square feet per prisoner. In connection with the establishment of a population cap at Occoquan, the Court will also order the defendants to provide the Court with a written report by January 15, 1987, indicating precisely how they propose to comply with the population cap."

The plaintiffs contend that an excessive inmate population, deficiencies in environmental health and safety, food services, and mental health care, alone or in combination, violate their rights guaranteed by the Constitution.

The classification of inmates is essential for the prison security. One critical function of classification is the efficient identification of violent, aggressive inmates and those in need of psychiatric care, so that they can be separated from the rest of the population. See, e.g., Palmigiano v. Garrahy, 443 F.Supp. 956 (D.R.I.1977). The classification system at Occoquan appears to be dangerously overtaxed by the crush of inmates in need of classification.

Idleness among inmates results in a variety of problems, including heightened tension, frustration, and violence. The lack of adequate programs can also have an adverse impact on inmates' chances for parole. There was no disagreement among the expert penologists that inmates should be engaged in some productive enterprise, properly supervised. Nonetheless, enforced idleness presents a major problem at Occoquan.

The correctional officers do not supervise properly the sleeping areas of the dormitories. Correctional officers do not make patrols on a frequent and regular basis, nor are officers stationed in the rear of each dormitory so as to facilitate supervision of the living area when inmates are present.

Medical services experts agreed that deficiencies in the medical care delivery system at Occoquan exist which are likely to cause harm to the inmates. These deficiencies are systemic in nature, concerning staffing, facilities, and procedures. (Lorton Correctional Complex, District of Columbia)

U.S. District Court
SANITATION LIGHT
VENTILATION
REMEDIES

Jackson v. Gardner, 639 F.Supp. 1005 (E.D.Tenn. 1986). Inmates of a county jail brought a Section 1983 action challenging the constitutionality of conditions of confinement. After resolution of some of the conditions complained of, and stipulation as to others, the district court held that: (1) Prison conditions under which an average inmate was confined twenty-four hours a day in a physically dilapidated, insect infested, dimly lit, poorly ventilated area averaging under twenty square feet per inmate, without any available recreation or diversion other than some reading or letter writing, sharing a shower which might not have hot water with twelve to fourteen others, sharing a sink and toilet with three or four others, and possibly sleeping on an unsanitary floor, or within inches of a toilet, in clothing which may not have been recently washed, constituted cruel and unusual punishment; (2) In order for the county jail to provide constitutionally acceptable confinement, population at the main jail facility had to be reduced, regular out-of-cell recreation had to be provided, visitation increased, and fire escape plans had to be communicated to inmates and prominently displayed in corridors at all times. (Sullivan County Jail, Tennessee)

U.S. Appeals Court
EXERCISE

Leonard v. Norris, 797 F.2d 683 (8th Cir. 1986). It did not violate the cruel and unusual punishment clause of the eighth amendment to give inmates in punitive isolation no out-of-cell exercise for the first fifteen days of punitive confinement. The exercise policy, although severe, and perhaps even harsh, was not cruel or barbaric. It had the purpose of discouraging disruptive behavior that made an inmate unfit to circulate among the prison's general population. (Cummins Unit, Department of Corrections, Arkansas)

U.S. District Court
MEDICAL CARE

Quarrels v. Breton, 645 F.Supp. 211 (E.D. Mich. 1986). A prison nurse's alleged failure to transmit a letter to prison officials from a consulting physician recommending that an inmate be prescribed an anti-inflammatory drug did not constitute a violation of the inmate's eighth amendment right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment. At most, the nurse committed negligence, and her action did not amount to deliberate indifference to the inmate's serious medical needs. (State Prison for Southern Michigan)

U.S. Appeals Court
PRETRIAL
DETAINEES
CROWDING

Reece v. Gragg, 650 F.Supp. 1297 (10th Cir. 1986). A pretrial detainee representing a class of all present and future pretrial detainees and sentenced inmates held in the county jail brought action seeking injunctive relief to require that operation of the jail under present conditions cease. The district court held that: (1) the current operation and condition of the county jail violated the due process clause of the fifth and fourteenth amendments and the eight amendment's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment, and (2) due to unconstitutional conditions at the jail, an injunction was warranted, but would be stayed under conditions outlined by court.

To the extent that the county jail is unable to segregate pretrial detainees and sentenced inmates, the higher standard applicable under the due process clause, rather than the eighth amendment, must be met by the entire facility.

Jail overcrowding for the purpose of allowing the county to house more inmates without creating more jail space is an impermissible justification for resulting violations of due process and prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment. Severe overcrowding combined with lack of area for exercise, lack of separate dining area, inadequate ventilation, inadequate temperature control, and antiquated and unsanitary plumbing at the county jail violated due process clauses of the fifth and fourteenth amendments and ran afoul of the eighth amendment's proscription against cruel and unusual punishment. (Sedgwick County Jail, Kansas)

1987

U.S. Appeals Court
CROWDING

Akao v. Shimoda, 832 F.2d 119 (9th Cir. 1987), cert. denied, 108 S.Ct. 1301. A Federal lawsuit alleging overcrowding was brought by three prisoners in Hawaii. Finding no eighth amendment violation, the lawsuit was dismissed by the district court. The decision was reversed by the U.S. Court of Appeals, which concurred that an allegation of overcrowding without additional cruel and unusual treatment does not state a claim. However, it found these prisoners had alleged more. The prisoners claimed that because of the increased population, there was "an increase in stress, tension, communicable diseases, and a high increase in confrontations between inmates." (Oahu Community Correctional Center, Hawaii)

U.S. Appeals Court
EXERCISE

Bailey v. Shillinger, 828 F.2d 651 (10th Cir. 1987). After his voluntary transfer to a prison in another state, a Wyoming state prisoner who was serving a sentence for first degree murder murdered another prisoner and was returned to the Wyoming State Prison. The warden assigned him to a maximum security unit without a formal hearing. The prisoner filed a civil rights lawsuit against the warden, alleging his due process rights had been violated. He also charged that he was subjected to cruel and unusual punishment by being deprived of exercise and fresh air. The appeals court concluded that, because of the danger the inmate presented to other inmates and staff, the court concluded the warden was correct in assigning the inmate to maximum security. As to the cruel and unusual treatment charge, the court concluded that the one hour per day of exercise and fresh air was "restrictive" but did not violate the Eighth Amendment. (Wyoming State Prison)

U.S. District Court
CROWDING

Benjamin v. Malcolm, 659 F.Supp. 1006 (S.D.N.Y. 1987). Temporary relief was granted to New York City correctional facilities to allow them to cope with the recent increase in population. However, "no further requests for modification will be granted regardless of foreseeable or unforeseeable problems which may arise." (Brooklyn House of Detention for Men and Queens House of Detention for Men)

U.S. Appeals Court
USE OF FORCE

Brown v. Smith, 813 F.2d 1187 (11th Cir. 1987). Whether a prison guard's application of force to an inmate is actionable turns on whether that force was applied in a good faith effort to maintain or restore discipline. According to an appeals court, neither judge nor jury is free to substitute its own judgment for that of prison officials. A mere conclusory allegation by a prison inmate that a guard acted with malice when he placed his riot stick across the inmate's throat after the inmate refused to go back into his cell was not sufficient to establish the liability of the guard where the actual facts would not support a reliable inference of wantonness. (West Jefferson Correctional Facility, Alabama)

U.S. District Court
USE OF FORCE

Collins v. Ward, 652 F. Supp. 500 (S.D.N.Y. 1987). Prison officers subdued a violent inmate who was armed with bottles and scissors with tear gas. Two inmates who were nearby filed a claim for using the tear gas without regard for their health and safety. The district court ruled that prison officials were reasonable in their use of tear gas because an effort had been made to open windows and ventilate the area where the chemical was to be thrown. The court found that using tear gas to regain control and free inmates was proper under emergency circumstances. According to the court, the fact that alternative methods, other than tear gas, were available to subdue riotous prisoners did not mean that use of tear gas constituted cruel and unusual punishment when prison officials otherwise acted in good faith and employed special precautions to minimize harmful effects of tear gas upon innocent bystanders. (Green Haven Correctional Facil., New York)

U.S. District Court
EXERCISE
MEDICAL CARE

Davenport v. DeRobertis, 653 F.Supp. 649 (N.D. Ill. 1987), cert. denied, 488 U.S. 908. Inmates brought a class action on behalf of all present and future inmates at the maximum security prison confined to segregation for ninety or more consecutive days, alleging deprivation of their constitutional rights, against present and former wardens of the prison and the director of the Illinois Department of Corrections and seeking injunctive relief. The district court held that: (1) evidence supported the jury's finding of cruel and unusual punishment; (2) the award of nominal damages was proper; (3) the defendants were entitled to qualified immunity from compensatory or punitive damages as sued in their individual capacities; and (4) the inmates confined in segregation in maximum security prison for a period of ninety or more consecutive days were entitled to injunctive relief ordering that they be allowed, except during temporary emergencies and lockdowns, three showers per week and five hours of out-of-cell exercise per week. Testimony was given that the general practice in maximum security prisons in civilized countries is to permit all inmates five to seven hours of exercise per week, so that permitting segregation inmates only one hour of out-of-cell exercise and one shower per week is "medically unacceptable." Inmates testified that prolonged idleness and isolation can cause mental illness and physical deterioration, and that inmates confined to segregation had experienced skin disorders, head and back pains, and musculo skeletal problems they had not had before segregation, which problems improved when they were released from segregation, supported the finding that permitting inmates confined to segregation in a maximum security prison only one shower per week and only one punishment. (Stateville Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
MEDICAL CARE

Dinger v. City of New Albany, 662 F.Supp. 929 (S.D. Ind. 1987). A civil rights action was filed against the city and a police officer by three inmates. They claimed that they were exposed to AIDS while confined, violating their Eighth Amendment right against cruel and unusual punishment. They requested that all inmates be given AIDS screening tests and all homosexual inmates be segregated. The court said that exposing inmates to a communicable disease may violate their constitutional rights, but that the problem of protecting inmates against AIDS is "best left to the legislature and prison administrators." City of New Albany, Indiana)

U.S. Appeals Court
MEDICAL CARE

Gill v. Mooney, 824 F.2d 192 (2nd Cir. 1987). According to a federal court of appeals, employees may be liable if they overrule a doctor's orders that an inmate participate in a prescribed exercise program. As treatment for injuries sustained from falling off a ladder during a work assignment, a doctor ordered Anthony Gill to be permitted additional time in the facility gym for rehabilitative therapy. On two separate occasions, Gill was refused access to the prescribed exercise program by both the gym supervisor and a correctional officer. Gill was again denied access to the gym after the doctor had heard about the incidents and allegedly signed a new order directing additional exercise. The deliberate defiance of expressed instructions of a prisoner's doctor by prison officials is deliberate indifference to the prisoner's medical needs, ruled the federal appeals court. Further, if Gill's allegations are true, the employees could be liable for causing him unnecessary pain, even though he suffered no permanent injuries. (Great Meadow Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
CROWDING
SANITATION

Gillespie v. Crawford, 833 F.2d 47 (5th Cir. 1987). Two Texas inmates filed a federal civil rights lawsuit when they contracted tuberculosis after allegedly being housed in crowded and unhealthy conditions, which included inadequate ventilation and lighting, and dirt and insect infestation. The inmates stated that they had repeatedly complained about these conditions, but that no corrective action was taken. The district court dismissed the lawsuit as "frivolous;" on appeal, the dismissal was overturned. According to the appeals court, that intent is not an element of a cause of action for eighth amendment claims alleging unconstitutional conditions of confinement. "Prison conditions," the court said, "may violate the eighth amendment even if they are not imposed maliciously or with the conscious desire to inflict gratuitous pain." The court also refused to bar the inmate's claim on the basis that a special master appointed in an earlier case, Ruiz v. Estelle, 688 F.2d 266 (5th Cir. 1982), cert. denied, 460 U.S. 1042 (1983), was monitoring the correction of prison conditions found in that suit to violate the eighth amendment. (Texas Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
USE OF FORCE

Holloway v. Lockhart, 813 F.2d 874 (8th Cir. 1987). A federal appeals court disagreed with a lower court and ruled that an inmate could bring a federal suit for being forced to inhale tear gas sprayed by guards to subdue fellow inmates. The inmate claimed that he, along with about 20 other inmates, was injured while they were sleeping when guards sprayed a barrage of the chemical at disruptive inmates; this caused the fellow inmates to be forced to inhale the substance causing them to choke, pass out, suffer temporary blindness and breathing problems. (Maximum Security Unit, Tucker, Arkansas)

U.S. Appeals Court
PRIVACY

Kent v. Johnson, 821 F.2d 1220 (6th Cir. 1987). Assuming that there was some right to privacy retained by state inmates and that right protected them from being forced unnecessarily to expose their bodies to guards of the opposite sex, an inmate complaining of that practice state a constitutional claim upon which relief could be granted under the Fourth Amendment, according to a federal appeals court. By alleging that female prison guards allowed themselves unrestricted views of an inmate's naked body in the shower, at close range and for extended periods of time, to retaliate against, punish and harass him for asserting his right to privacy, the inmate stated a cause of action under the Eighth Amendment for cruel and unusual punishment. The court ruled that the prison policy must be reviewed to determine if it is reasonably related to a legitimate penological interest. The district court had initially dismissed the complaint since an opinion issued in Griffin v. Michigan Department of Corrections, 654 F.Supp 690 (E.D.Mich. 1982), a Title VII case, required the Michigan Department of Corrections to allow female guards to patrol housing units of male prisons. The appeals court reversed the dismissal and ordered the consideration of other information--including the inmate's religious beliefs and practices and whether he may have some right to privacy with respect to his genitals must be examined. The court noted that the recent Supreme Court decision in Turner v. Safely, 107 S.Ct. 2254 (1987) requires consideration of a regulation to determine if it is reasonably related to a legitimate penological interest when it infringes on an inmate's constitutional rights. The court ruled that if the facts of Kent's case demonstrate that he has a valid religious belief in not being viewed naked by female officers and that such viewing is an unreasonable search, an invasion of his privacy or constitutes cruel and unusual punishment, the balancing test under Turner must be applied. (State Prison for Southern Michigan)

U.S. District Court
CLOTHING

Knop v. Johnson, 667 F.Supp. 467 (W.D. Mich. 1987). A federal district court ruled that the state failed to provide inmates with adequate winter clothing, in violation of the inmates' right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment, where the state failed to provide adequate winter coat, hat and gloves. Boots were not required if inmates were given adequate winter socks and if walkways and outdoor exercise areas were kept free from snow. (State Prison of Southern Michigan, Michigan Reformatory, Riverside Correctional Facility, Marquette Branch Prison)

U.S. Appeals Court
CELLS
MEDICAL CARE
TOILETS

Lafaut v. Smith, 834 F.2d 389 (4th Cir. 1987). A paraplegic inmate was placed in a private room that had no handicap facilities shortly after he was admitted to a federal correctional facility. Because of his physical condition and the absence of a railing for support, the inmate would slip down into the toilet bowl water and also risk falling off the toilet. The appellant was finally transferred to a room that contained adequate toilet facilities more than three months after his arrival and after he had contracted a kidney infection. Because of inaccessible toilets at his work assignments, he suffered another infection which, in addition to being placed in a disciplinary segregation without the use of a catheter for several days nor adequate access to the toilet facilities resulted in hardships for the inmate which included falling off a toilet in the segregation unit and, as a result, breaking his right leg. Despite repeated requests for adequate rehabilitation therapy, and the reports of an orthopedic specialist that he was in need of such therapy, none was provided. A federal appeals court found that the Eighth Amendment was violated because these conditions constituted "deliberate indifference." (Federal Correctional Institution, Butner, North Carolina)

U.S. District Court
VIOLENCE

LaMarca v. Turner, 662 F.Supp. 647 (S.D. Fla. 1987). As a result of a former prison superintendent's indifference to prisoners' rights, prisoners who were gang raped or assaulted were entitled to relief under Section 1983 according to a federal district court. With respect to all of the inmates except two, the superintendent was in a position to take steps that could have averted the attacks but, through his callous indifference, failed to do so. The prisoners were entitled to injunctive relief, including establishment of committees to advise the court in the formulation of specific injunctive relief. The court ruled that a prisoner has a right to be protected from the constant threat of violence and from sexual assault. Prison officials' failure to control or segregate prisoners who endanger the safety of other prisoners and who cause a high level of violence, constitutes "cruel and unusual punishment. A law was clearly established that required a prison superintendent with knowledge of the pervasive risk of harm to inmates to take reasonable steps to prevent that harm. Thus, the former prison superintendent did not act in good faith and was not entitled to qualified immunity for liability for violating the prisoners' Eighth Amendment right to reasonable protection from rapes and assaults. (Glades Correctional Institution)

U.S. District Court
EXERCISE
WORK

Manley v. Bronson, 657 F.Supp. 832 (D.Conn. 1987). According to a federal district court, a prisoner's due process rights were not violated when he was placed in deadlock after prison officials received information that the prisoner was involved in a stabbing incident in the prisoner's housing unit. The prisoner was only afforded verbal notice, rather than written notice. When the prisoner was subsequently transferred to administrative segregation he was given written notice of a classification committee hearing to determine whether he should be removed to administrative segregation for his personal safety and safety and security of the prison. Further, he was present at hearing with staff advocate, he received notification of the committee's decision to classify him for administrative segregation, was informed of the process and procedures for review of his classification, and while in administrative segregation, had his status reviewed on a regular basis. The court also ruled that being confined to a cell for 23 hours a day, receiving only one hour of recreation a day, restrictions placed on his religious services and his being removed from his job as the institution's barber did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth Amendment. (Connecticut Correctional Institution at Somer)

U.S. Appeals Court
MEDICAL CARE
FAILURE TO PROVIDE CARE

Meriwether v. Faulkner, 821 F.2d 408 (7th Cir. 1987), cert. denied, 108 S.Ct. 311. According to a federal appeals court, there is no reason to treat transsexualism differently from any other psychiatric disorder in determining whether treatment of the condition presents a "serious medical need." Therefore, the plaintiff stated a valid claim under the Eighth Amendment which, if proven, would entitle her to some kind of medical treatment. In addition to stating a serious medical need, the complaint contained allegations indicating that the defendants were deliberately indifferent to that need. Not only did the defendants fail to provide the plaintiff with any kind of medical treatment, not merely hormone therapy, for her gender dysphoria, but one doctor allegedly ridiculed the plaintiff about her condition. (Indiana State Reformatory in Pendleton, Indiana State Prison)

U.S. District Court
CELLS
REMEDIES

Morales Feliciano v. Hernandez Colon, 672 F.Supp. 627 (D. Puerto Rico 1987). Puerto Rican prison authorities moved to modify stipulation and an order that they provide each prisoner with at least 35 square feet of living space. The district court held that: (1) prison authorities were not entitled to relief under subsection of federal rule allowing modification on the ground that changed circumstances would make further compliance with order unjust; (2) prison authorities failed to show that compliance would result in pernicious consequences, and failed to show changed circumstances warranting relief; and (3) building project undertaken to increase dramatically available beds for housing did not entitle prison authorities to relief. The possible release of prisoners by Puerto Rican prison authorities as a result of compliance with a court order that they provide each prisoner with at least 35 square feet of living space was not a "pernicious consequence" of compliance and did not entitle them to relief from order under Rule 60(b)(6). There was little factual support for assertion that all persons presently incarcerated in Puerto Rico would present danger to the community if released. The argument had an undertone of disingenuity, and compliance would not interfere with efforts of Commonwealth as to enforcement of criminal law or any other policy decision of that entity. The court ruled that prison authorities should have known that the population projection figure on which they relied was, in all probability, inaccurate, and, even if they did not properly assess information available at that time, they certainly knew by the end of 1986 that they had drastically underestimated the actual rate of growth, but did not make the motion for relief from the stipulation, informally apprise the court of predictable problems in compliance, solicit assistance of monitor or seek discussions with plaintiffs' counsel. (Puerto Rico System)

U.S. District Court
SANITATION TOILETS
NOISE

Nilsson v. Coughlin, 670 F.Supp. 1186 (S.D.N.Y. 1987). Inmates stated a claim under the Eighth Amendment for cruel and unusual punishment. The inmates alleged there was raw sewage in the cells, unsanitary dining facilities, a constant level of noise that was physically harmful, a lack of meaningful vocational, educational or recreational programs, and a host of other conditions. The federal court ruled that a fair inference could be drawn from the pro se complaint that the prison officials were grossly negligent in supervising or, alternatively, in promulgating policies, that caused unconstitutional conditions. (Sullivan Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
DISCIPLINE
WORK
FOOD

Ort v. White, 813 F.2d 318 (11th Cir. 1987). A prison officer's denial of water to an inmate was not cruel and unusual punishment where the inmate refused to carry a water keg to the farm work site, the farm squad remained away from the prison for the entire day under supervision of a single officer, the officer's actions were necessary coercive measures undertaken to obtain compliance with a reasonable prison rule that inmates perform their assigned farm squad duties, the officer denied the inmate water only when he refused to carry the keg or refused to work, the officer's actions were necessary to prevent a possible disturbance by other inmates on the farm squad, and the inmate was allowed to drink water when he performed work required of all inmates on his farm squad. Although the officer did not follow usual procedures for filing a disciplinary report and conducting a disciplinary hearing before taking action, because the officer was alone in the field supervising an inmate work squad when he was confronted with spontaneous disruption by one of the inmates in his group, the work squad was to be away from the prison for the entire day, and the officer had to take action to maintain discipline and control until the squad returned to the prison, his actions did not violate inmates' due process rights. (Stanton Correctional Facility)

U.S. Appeals Court
ISOLATION

Sheley v. Dugger, 824 F.2d 1551 (11th Cir. 1987). A federal court has found that confinement in "close management" for a period of more than 11 years without meaningful reviews is cruel and unusual punishment. A prisoner, was placed in close management (CM) administrative confinement in 1975 as an escape risk, remaining there for over ten years. According to the court, even though his status had been reviewed periodically over the years, continuous placement in CM violated due process procedures and resulted in cruel and unusual punishment because the periodic reviews were inadequate (many were conducted without the prisoner being present and with no notice or opportunity to present arguments, even though the classification team had consistently recommended that he be placed in the general population because of his good behavior). The court found that the State's procedures offered no guidance as to how the prisoner could ever reenter general population and had the effect of keeping him in CM until his prison term expired. (Florida State Prison)

1988

U.S. District Court
PRETRIAL
DETAINEES
CROWDING
REMEDIES

Albro v. Onondaga County, N.Y., 677 F.Supp. 697 (N.D.N.Y. 1988). The alleged offender is afforded protection by a due process clause instead of the Eighth Amendment, which prevents holding a detainee under conditions that would be equal to punishment. A violation of due process was found to exist when crowded conditions were found at a pretrial detention facility, causing many detainees to sleep on cots in the walkways and creating a hazard to both detainees and staff. There was no operational compensation for overcrowding conditions such as adequate exercise time, vocational training, or free time in the dayroom or other open space. Detainees frequently spent only a free hour on a walkway or in "passive" recreation and were confined to their cells at least 23 hours a day. The court found correctional staff insufficient to safely respond to duties. Further, the court also concluded that inmates "have ready access to weapons through the dismantling of their cots." The capacity of the facility was capped by the court. Daily fines were levied on the county as an appropriate remedy for continuing overcrowding at the detention facility whenever the inmate population exceeded its capacity for four days or more. The county was ordered to pay $1,000 per day if the population reached 213-217, up to $10,000 daily if the population goes over 247. Even though the plaintiffs had withdrawn the motion for contempt, the court kept the power to punish violations that may have occurred, or might occur in the future. (Public Safety Building)

U.S. Appeals Court
RESTRAINTS
USE OF FORCE
SECURITY

Bruscino v. Carlson, 854 F.2d 162 (7th Cir. 1988), cert. denied, 109 S.Ct. 3193. In a class action suit brought against the Marion Penitentiary in Illinois by inmates held in the Control Unit, the inmates claimed use of excessive force and other charges because they were subjected to rectal searches every time they left or re-entered the unit. The appeals court ruled that because inmates in the Control Unit require greater supervision than other prisoners, rectal searches can be legally performed on such inmates. Use of physical restraints during attorney visitation and limited out-of-cell time was also upheld by the federal district court. The court found that extraordinary security measures employed in a maximum security federal prison, such as limitation of time spent outside cells, denial of opportunities for socialization, handcuffing, shackling, spread-eagling and rectal searches were reasonable measures in view of the history of violence at the prison and the incorrigible character of the inmates and thus it did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment. Further, the court found that the transfer of prisoners to a maximum security federal prison did not result in incremental deprivation so great as to constitute actionable deprivation of natural liberty and thus require a hearing. (The United States Penitentiary in Marion, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
USE OF FORCE

Clark v. Evans, 840 F.2d 876 (11th Cir. 1988) A civil rights action was brought, based on the fatal shooting of a prisoner who was attempting to escape from the state prison, against the Commissioner of the State Department of Corrections, the prison warden, the guard who fatally shot the prisoner, and guards who were on yard or in building complex nearby when prisoner attempted to escape. The district court dismissed all claims against all defendants in their official capacities, granted summary judgment for the commissioner and guards located near the prisoner, but rejected qualified immunity defense asserted by the warden and guard who shot the prisoner in their individual capacities. The warden and the guard who shot the prisoner appealed, and the plaintiffs appealed the dismissal of the other defendants. The appeals court held that: (1) a reasonable officer could have believed that the guard's actions in shooting the prisoner were lawful, and accordingly, the guard was entitled to qualified immunity for use of deadly force; (2) the commissioner was not liable on theory he had instituted and perpetuated a policy that committal orders of state court judges would be ignored and that the prisoner's death occurred as a direct result of the prisoner not having been transferred to a mental hospital pursuant to involuntary commitment order, and (3) nearby guards were not liable on the theory that they were deliberately indifferent to a prisoner's safety or serious medical needs. The court noted that, in determining whether a state prison guard who fatally shot a prisoner who was attempting to escape was entitled to qualified immunity in a civil rights action based on the shooting, the proper inquiry was not whether escape could reasonably have been prevented in a less violent manner, but rather, whether a reasonable officer with information available to the guard who shot the prisoner could have believed that less violent means were not reasonably available (see Anderson v. Creighton, 107 S.Ct. 3034 (1987)). The plaintiffs also argued that the use of deadly force in this instance was unlawful, since the law forbids the execution of insane persons. The court disagreed, noting that the inmate was not executed (killed as a punishment), but instead was shot in an effort to prevent escape. (Georgia State Prison)

U.S. Appeals Court
REMEDIES

Cowans v. Wyrick, 862 F.2d 697 (8th Cir. 1988). A prison inmate brought an action against a guard alleging that the guard had inflicted cruel and unusual punishment upon the inmate in violation of the inmate's eighth amendment rights. The federal district court entered judgment on the jury verdict finding in favor of the inmate. Additionally, because the jury did not access any damages, the court, sua sponte, awarded nominal damages of $1 to the inmate. The guard appealed, and the Appeals Court found that the jury instruction which allowed the jury to find for the inmate without finding that the inmate had suffered any pain, misery, anguish, or similar harm, whether capable of estimation or not, was a reversible error. As a result, the case was reversed and remanded for a new trial. According to the court, the jury is required to award nominal damages to a prisoner bringing a civil rights suit once the jury finds cruel and unusual punishment has occurred if the jury has not been able to convert into dollars the injury and pain that the prisoner has suffered. However, if the jury finds that the prisoner has suffered no pain of any kind, then the question of damages, nominal or otherwise, does not arise. A claim of cruel and unusual punishment has not been established without a showing of some measure of pain. The court noted that reasonable measures undertaken to resolve a disturbance at a prison when the disturbance indisputably poses significant risks to the safety of inmates and prison staff do not rise to the level of cruel and unusual punishment. (State Penitentiary)

U.S. Appeals Court
EXERCISE
PLUMBING

Davenport v. DeRoberts, 844 F.2d 1310 (7th Cir. 1988), cert. denied, 109 S.Ct. 260. Inmates brought a class action suit against the prison alleging cruel and unusual punishment because they were allowed only one hour per week for exercise and one shower per week. The federal district court granted injunctive relief and allowed three showers per week and five hours out-of-cell exercise per week, except when there was an emergency or a lock down. The court awarded only nominal damages. The Department of Corrections' own medical director testified that four to seven hours outside the cell, and three showers, were the weekly minimum necessary to prevent serious adverse effects on the physical and mental health of inmates confined in what is a form of solitary confinement. The department also argued that each cell contained a wash basin in which the inmate could wash himself as often as he liked and that the cells were large enough for the inmate to engage in various sorts of exercise, including push-ups, sit-ups and running in place. The lower court noted that "we do not suggest that this is always and everywhere the constitutional minima; much less may suffice when the period of incarceration is brief." However, on the issue of showers, the court noted that limiting the number of showers to one a week did not have a serious effect on the mental or physical well-being of the inmates and that "the deprivation merely of cultural amenities is not cruel and unusual punishment." The appeals court agreed, refusing to uphold an order for three showers per week. (Stateville Correctional Center)

U.S. Appeals Court SPOUSES

Davis v. Carlson, 837 F.2d 1318 (5th Cir. 1988). A prisoner and his wife filed a pro se complaint seeking declaratory judgment regarding the manner in which the prison was administered. The federal district court dismissed the case. The prisoner and his wife appealed. The appeals court held that: (1) the prisoner's complaint was properly dismissed for failure to exhaust administrative remedies; (2) the Bureau of Prisons had no duty to transfer the prisoner to a prison near the wife's residence; (3) the wife had no right to conjugal visits; and (4) the prisoner's incarceration did not violate the wife's rights against cruel and unusual punishment. The prisoner was not incarcerated to punish the wife, and hardships caused to a prisoner's spouse did not preclude the prisoner's incarceration. (U.S. Bureau of Prisons)

U.S. Appeals Court
FOOD

George v. King, 837 F.2d 705 (5th Cir. 1988). An inmate who awoke one morning with stomach cramps, diarrhea and nausea was helped to the infirmary after he had collapsed. The inmate was given medication by a doctor who told him to take the day off and stay in bed. Claiming that three to four hundred other inmates suffered the same symptoms on the same day, the inmate stated that he endured "great mental and physical pain for several days" because of "the food poisoning." The lawsuit, claiming only a single incident of food poisoning, which caused no permanent injury or serious medical complications was dismissed by the district court as "frivolous;" this decision was upheld by the appeals court. The court ruled that, if prisoners "regularly and frequently" suffer from food poisoning with "truly serious medical complications as a result of particular, known unsanitary practices" and the authorities "without arguable justification refuse to attempt remedial measures," a constitutional violation might be shown, but no matter how many prisoners are affected, a single incident of food poisoning is no constitutional violation. (Dixon Correctional Institute)

U.S. District Court
EXERCISE
SANITATION
CELLS

Harris v. Fleming, 839 F.2d 1232 (7th Cir. 1988), affirmed, 993 F.2d 1549. An inmate filed a federal civil rights lawsuit against three prison officials, claiming he had been subjected to cruel and unusual punishment seeking $320,000 in compensatory and punitive damages. The inmate stated that the prison failed to supply him with toilet paper for five days, or with soap, toothpaste or a toothbrush for ten days and he was kept in a "filthy" roach-infested cell. He also complained that during 28 days in a segregation unit he was refused permission to exercise. Since the inmate suffered no physical harm, but merely some unpleasantness, the federal appeals court found that the defendants' temporary neglect of the prisoner was not intentional and that it did not reach unconstitutional proportions. While the court found that the circumstances of the case demonstrated some neglect and indifference on the prison's part, it concluded that the conditions were temporary and affected only one inmate. Although the inmate was deprived of "yard or recreation time," he could have "improvised temporarily with jogging in place, aerobics, or pushups." (Menard Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
MEDICAL CARE

Jackson v. Lane, 688 F.Supp. 1291 (N.D. Ill. 1988). An inmate sought $100,000 in compensatory damages and $500,000 in punitive damages (the latter figure being sought from each named defendant) from correctional officials, correctional employees and a prison dentist. His request to have his teeth cleaned by a dental hygienist was responded to, by the prison dentist, by stating that there was no longer a hygienist on the staff. The court denied the inmate's request to file, without payment of the filing fee, a self-prepared nine-page typed complaint because the complaint was legally frivolous. The court found that the prisoner's complaint does not state an Eighth Amendment claim because denial of a dental hygienist does not rise to the level of deliberate indifference to serious medical needs of prisoners. (Illinois State Prison)

U.S. District Court
WORK

Jackson v. O'Leary, 689 F.Supp. 846 (N.D. Ill. 1988). A federal district court ruled that a prison inmate has no constitutional right to prison employment. Further, in order to demonstrate a violation of his constitutional rights because he was reassigned to a less desirable job, the inmate must invoke state law or regulations that created a protected liberty or property interest in a particular prison job. Also, there would only be an equal protection violation if prison officials made the decision in a manner that involved intentional or purposeful discrimination. There was no violation of the Eighth Amendment's protection against cruel and unusual punishment when the plaintiff was reassigned from an administrative job paying $45 per month to a manual labor job paying $15 per month. The fact that the prisoner had a preference for clerical rather than manual labor did not support a claim of "cruel and unusual punishment." Prison officials had not, in this instance, knowingly compelled the prisoner to do work that caused him undue pain or endangered the prisoner's life or health, or exceeded his physical capacity. (Stateville Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
USE OF FORCE

Parker v. Asher, 701 F.Supp. 192 (D. Nev. 1988). An inmate brought a civil rights action against a correctional officer. The inmate's allegations, that the correctional officer threatened to shoot him with a "taser gun" for no legitimate penological reason and in fact pointed the loaded gun at him, and that the inmate suffered great anguish and distress due to his fear that the officer would in fact subject him to immediate bodily harm, stated a cognizable claim for violation of the inmate's eighth amendment right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment. The court stated that prison guards cannot aim "taser guns" at inmates for the malicious purpose of inflicting gratuitous fear. (Nevada State Prison)

U.S. Appeals Court
SAFETY

Vosburg v. Solem, 845 F.2d 763 (8th Cir. 1988), cert. denied, 109 S.Ct. 313. A former inmate brought a Section 1983 action against prison wardens to recover for violation of his right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment arising out of sexual assaults by fellow inmates. A federal appeals court ruled: (1) evidence created a jury question whether wardens violated the inmate's right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment; (2) an erroneous damage instruction that permitted a jury to award damages for an abstract violation of Eighth Amendment was harmless; and (3) the inmate was entitled to postjudgment interest from the date of the verdict. Prison officials may be liable for deliberate indifference to prisoner's constitutional right to be free from sexual attacks by other inmates, if they actually intend to deprive him of that right or if they act with reckless disregard of right. Reckless disregard of prisoner's right to be free from sexual attacks by other inmates may be shown by existence of pervasive risk of harm to inmates from other prisoner and failure of prison officials reasonably to respond to risk. Pervasive risk of harm to inmates by other prisoners may not ordinarily be shown by pointing to a single incident or to isolated incidents, but it may be established by much less than proof of reign of violence and terror in a particular institution; it is enough that violence and sexual assaults occur with sufficient frequency to put prisoners in reasonable fear for their safety and reasonably to apprise prison officials of existence of problem and need for protective measures. To establish pervasive risk of harm to inmates by other prisoners, it is not necessary to show that all prisoners suffer pervasive risk of harm, but it is enough that identifiable group of prisoners do, if the complainant is member of that group. (South Dakota State Penitentiary)

1989

U.S. Appeals Court
CLOTHING
USE OF FORCE

Campbell v. Grammer, 889 F.2d 797 (8th Cir. 1989). Inmates brought an action against prison officials alleging that their constitutional and statutory rights were violated during a prison lockdown. The U.S. District Court entered a judgment in favor of the inmates and awarded attorneys' fees; the defendants appealed. The court of appeals found that the supervising lieutenant's failure to issue jumpsuits pursuant to his superiors' order after a shakedown did not rise to the level of cruel and unusual punishment. The lieutenant had been assigned to supervise the adjustment center for the first time on the day of the lockdown and thus, the failure to carry out his superiors' orders was due to misunderstanding, inexperience, oversight, inadvertence or recklessness.

Courts should ordinarily accord actions of prison officials much deference; courts should be especially reluctant to interpose their hindsight when challenged conduct occurred during a prison disturbance. When faced with the necessity of using force to quell a disturbance, prison officials are compelled to balance competing concerns of insuring safety of inmates and staff and of using the least confining or least dangerous measure to control those who threaten the safety of others. Given the fact that such decisions are necessarily made in haste and under pressure, measures taken will not be held to be an eighth amendment violation if imposed in a good faith effort to maintain or restore discipline and not maliciously and sadistically for the very purpose of causing harm. The court found however, that the inmates had been intentionally, rather than accidentally, sprayed with the high-powered firehoses, which resulted in an eighth amendment violation. As a result, they upheld awards to the inmates of $750, $100 and $50. (Nebraska State Penitentiary)

U.S. District Court
DOUBLE CELLING
TOTALITY OF CONDITIONS

C.H. v. Sullivan, 718 F.Supp. 726 (D. Minn. 1989). Prisoners who were serving sentences under a federal witness security program brought action against the Attorney General and his agents, challenging double celling. The district court found that double celling was not cruel and unusual punishment despite the concern that double celling might result in the discovery of their identities by other inmates and threaten their security. The court also found that the use of a seniority system to determine which prisoners were double celled did not violate due process. Depriving prisoners serving sentences under a federal witness security program of seniority, and with it a single cell, for the violation of prison regulations did not so infringe upon the prisoners' safety as to constitute a violation of the fifth amendment. The seniority method was reasonably related to valid prison objectives of discipline and relief of overcrowding. The prisoners being disciplined were advised of charges and the facts supporting the charges and they were given a reasonable opportunity to call witnesses and present documentary evidence in their defense and an investigation was conducted to ensure that incompatible prisoners were not housed together. The court is permitted to look at the challenged conditions of confinement alone or in combination to determine whether an eighth amendment violation has occurred; a particular prison policy may not directly be a violation, but may lead to conditions which do constitute punishment without a penological purpose. (Federal Correctional Institution, Sandstone, Minnesota)

U.S. District Court
PROTECTIVE CUSTODY

Crozier v. Shillinger, 710 F.Supp. 760 (D. Wyo. 1989). Protective custody inmates brought an action to challenge the suspension of certain opportunities and benefits that were afforded to the general prison population. The defendants moved for a summary judgment. The district court found that giving certain benefits and opportunities to the general prison population without giving those opportunities and benefits to protective custody inmates was not cruel and unusual punishment. According to the court, a prisoner has no absolute constitutional right to visitation. Cancelling some visits for protective custody inmates due to conflicting visits to prisoners in the general population was constitutional. Giving the protective custody inmates fewer benefits and opportunities than the general prison population was not cruel and unusual punishment and did not violate the fourteenth amendment. The suspension of certain benefits and opportunities represented accommodation with institutional interest in providing adequate protection to protective custody inmates. (Wyoming State Penitentiary)

U.S. District Court
CELLS
INJURY

Denz v. Clearfield County, 712 F.Supp. 65 (W.D. Pa. 1989). A prisoner brought a civil rights action against Clearfield County and the County moved to dismiss. The district court found that the occurrence of a slip and fall injury as a result of dank, hot and humid cell conditions did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment and did not transform the conduct of the county into a wanton infliction of unnecessary pain. The prison inmate did not have a due process claim where the inmate had an opportunity to pursue a postdeprivation remedy in state court, and the complaint was dismissed.

There is no constitutional liberty interest infringed upon by the merely negligent conduct of prisoner officials. (Clearfield County Prison, Pennsylvania)

U.S. District Court
SMOKING

Doughty v. Bd. of County Com'rs for County of Weld, 731 F.Supp. 423 (D. Colo. 1989). County jail inmates brought an action challenging the application to the jail of the county's no-smoking ban. The U.S. District Court found that the smoking ban did not violate the eighth or fourteenth amendment rights of the inmates, ruling that an application to the jail of a county-wide policy in prohibiting smoking in any public building was reasonably related to the county's goals. Evidence demonstrated that the use of designated smoking areas, rather than a complete ban on smoking in the county jail, was not a viable alternative to the no-smoking rule and the policy banning smoking in the jail did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment. (Weld County Jail, Colorado)

U.S. District Court
MEDICAL CARE
SAFETY

Feigley v. Fulcomer, 720 F.Supp. 475 (M.D. Pa. 1989). An inmate brought action against prison officials, alleging officials were violating his eighth amendment rights by not protecting him adequately from contracting Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome (AIDS). On the prison officials' motion for summary judgment, the district court found that the officials' practice of not testing inmates routinely for AIDS-causing virus at the time they were received or subsequently, and not testing other inmates for the virus upon request, did not violate the plaintiff inmate's eighth amendment rights. The court also found that the material issue of fact precluded a summary judgment as to whether the officials' refusal to test the inmate for the virus upon request involved unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain which is a violation of the eighth amendment. It allowed the inmate to continue with this claim that it constitutes such a punishment to fail to relieve the anxiety which might accompany an inmate's uncertainty as to whether he or she has a fatal disease. It was further found by the court that the absence of evidence that prison officials had knowledge and acquiesced in behavior by any of their subordinates who allegedly failed to prevent, or tacitly condoned and allowed, such conduct, precluded recovery by the inmate on the claim that officials failed adequately to prevent the spread of the virus in violation of his eighth amendment right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment. (State Correctional Institution, Huntingdon, Pennsylvania)

U.S. Appeals Court VIOLENCE
CROWDING

Fisher v. Koehler, 718 F.Supp. 1111 (S.D.N.Y. 1989), aff'd., 902 F.2d 2 (2nd Cir. 1990). Prison inmates brought a class action against prison officials and others, challenging conditions of confinement as violative of their rights under the federal constitution. Following a finding, 692 F.Supp. 1519 (S.D.N.Y. 1988), that violence at the prison reached a level which violated the eighth amendment, the defendants were given the opportunity to submit a reasonable plan for the court's consideration. The district court found that the proposed plan to reduce violence by staff and inmates against inmates to comply with the eighth amendment would be adopted, with some modifications. The prison officials would be allowed to house protective custody inmates in dormitories in light of plan for exclusion from protective custody of inmates with a significant history of violence and for cell housing of inmates whose vulnerability or history of violence required their separation. Before the court would limit the prison population by prohibiting the housing of more than 50 inmates in a dormitory, which would have required the displacement of approximately 500 inmates, the Department of Corrections would be given an opportunity to reduce the level of violence at the prison to a constitutionally acceptable level by addressing major sources of violence other than crowding. The prison officials were entitled to an opportunity to establish that periodic, rather than permanent, presence of an officer would prove sufficient to prevent violence in dormitories consisting of inmates with little or no history of assaultive behavior.

The appeals court found that conditions at the prison violated the eighth amendment, and the district court's remedy was properly formulated. (Correctional Institute for Men, New York City, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
WORK

Franklin v. Lockhart, 890 F.2d 96 (8th Cir. 1989). A prison inmate brought a civil rights complaint for prison authorities' alleged violation of free exercise and eighth amendment rights. The U.S. District Court entered an order dismissing the complaint, and the inmate appealed. The appeals court, affirming in part, reversing in part, and remanding, found that the allegations in the inmate's complaint that work which he had to perform while assigned to the prison hoe squad taxed him beyond his physical capacity, were sufficient to state an eighth amendment claim. The allegations in the complaint, that the work involved the handling of manure and dead animals contrary to the inmate's Muslim faith, were also sufficient to state a free exercise claim. (Arkansas State Prison)

U.S. Appeals Court
ISOLATION
MEDICAL CARE SECURITY
DISCIPLINE

Harris v. Davis, 874 F.2d 461 (7th Cir. 1989), cert. denied, 110 S.Ct. 735. An inmate filed an action under Section 1983 against correctional officers, alleging that they subjected him to cruel and unusual punishment by forcing him to take an emetic and by denying him necessary medical assistance, while he was in deadlock. In addition, the inmate charged that officers violated his procedural due process rights by improperly consigning him to deadlock without a hearing. The U.S. District Court entered judgment on a jury verdict in favor of the defendants, and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed and found that the erroneous admission of "other acts" evidence was harmless. References to the suggestive nature of photographs seized from the inmate were not admissible as evidence of other crimes, wrongs or acts in the inmate's civil rights action in which the inmate asserted a due process claim that the correctional officer consigned the inmate to deadlock without a hearing for conduct that allegedly posed a threat to the security of the institution. The officer's decision was based solely on the officer's determination that the inmate had swallowed contraband, and the presence of suggestive photographs was completely irrelevant. The references to a disciplinary ticket which the inmate received for possession of homemade moonshine in his cell were not admissible as evidence of other crimes, wrongs or acts. Although evidence that the inmate had swallowed homemade moonshine a week after taking an emetic to determine the presence of contraband might have provided an alternative explanation for his claimed injuries and thus might have been admissible on the issue of damages, the defendants never established that the inmate ingested any of the alcohol. (Menard Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
CELLS
SANITATION

Howard v. Adkison, 887 F.2d 134 (8th Cir. 1989). An inmate brought an action against the supervisory officers at the facility at which he was confined, alleging the violation of his eighth amendment rights. The U.S. District Court entered a judgment in favor of the inmate, and the defendants appealed. The appeals court affirmed and found that the evidence concerning filthy conditions in the inmate's cell was sufficient to support a finding that the inmate's eighth amendment rights were violated. According to the court, inmates are entitled to reasonably adequate sanitation, personal hygiene, and laundry privileges, particularly over a lengthy period. Evidence that the inmate was confined for two years in a cell covered with filth and human waste and was denied access to proper cleaning supplies or laundry service was sufficient to establish that his confinement was cruel and unusual punishment within the meaning of the eighth amendment. Evidence that the inmate complained about filthy conditions in his cell continuously over a two-year period but that supervisory officers failed to provide him with any relief was sufficient to hold officers liable for eighth amendment violations. The appeals court upheld an award of $500 actual damages, $1 nominal damages and $750 punitive damages against the special unit manager, and $1,000 punitive damages against the lieutenant. (Missouri Department of Corrections and Human Resources)

1990

U.S. Appeals Court
FAILURE TO PROTECT SAFETY

Bailey v. Wood, 909 F.2d 1197 (8th Cir. 1990). An inmate who had been assaulted by another inmate brought a civil rights action against the warden for allegedly subjecting him to cruel and unusual punishment contrary to the eighth amendment. The U.S. District Court entered judgment in favor of the prisoner and the warden appealed. The court of appeals held that the warden took reasonable steps to prevent the assault and was not "deliberately indifferent" to the prisoner's rights, reversing the lower court decision. To establish that the warden acted in "reckless disregard" of eighth amendment rights, the prisoner had to show that he was faced with pervasive risk of harm and that the warden failed to reasonably respond to that risk. According to the court, the warden took reasonable steps to respond to threats which the prisoner faced from another inmate by transferring the inmate to a complex at the other end of the prison, and was not "deliberately indifferent" to the prisoner's rights, within the meaning of the eighth amendment, merely because he failed to anticipate that the guard would leave his post and permit the inmate to gain access to the prisoner's cell. The court noted that "... this case is one of an increasing number involving an assault by one prisoner on another in a state prison." (Minnesota Correctional Facility, Oak Park Heights, Minnesota)

U.S. District Court
USE OF FORCE

Bony v. Brandenburg, 735 F.Supp. 913 (S.D. Ind. 1990). A prisoner sued prison officials, alleging cruel and unusual punishment in connection with the use of force to remove him from his cell after he refused to obey an order to come forward to be handcuffed. Evidence established that the officials acted properly and pursuant to governing regulations and standards, and there was no evidence of unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain. As a result, the defendants were entitled to qualified immunity. (United States Penitentiary, Terre Haute, Indiana)

U.S. District Court
SMOKE

Caldwell v. Quinlan, 729 F.Supp. 4 (D. D.C. 1990). An inmate brought a civil rights action against the Director of a Federal Bureau of Prisons, alleging that his frequent exposure to passive tobacco smoke violated his constitutional rights. The district court granted a motion filed by the Director to dismiss. The court stated that the director's failure to constantly segregate smokers from nonsmokers did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment and that individuals do not have a constitutional right to be free from passive tobacco smoke, so the exposure to passive smoke did not trigger protections of the due process clause or violate equal protection rights. In addition, the Bureau of Prisons' smoking policy, which provided only that the warden may implement a smoking policy at his discretion, did not create a liberty interest to a smoke-free prison term. The inmate's occasional exposure to smoke drifting over from designated "smoking" areas did not violate the eighth amendment. According to the court, the Federal Bureau of Prisons has not been indifferent to nonsmoking inmates. Federal regulations provide that "The Warden, as set forth in this rule, may establish smoking/no smoking areas with the institution. (a) Smoking is prohibited in those areas where to allow smoking would pose a hazard to health or safety. (b) Smoking/no smoking areas may be established in other areas of the institution, at the discretion of the Warden."

The court found that contemporary society "has yet to view the exposure to second-hand smoke as transgressing its broad and idealistic concepts of dignity, civilized standards, humanity and decency." The plaintiff's occasional exposure to such smoke, therefore, was not cruel and unusual punishment. (United States Penitentiary, Marion, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
DOUBLE CELLING

C.H. v. Sullivan, 920 F.2d 483 (8th Cir. 1990). Prisoners serving sentences under the federal witness security program brought action against the Attorney General and his agents, challenging double-celling. On cross motion for summary judgment, the U.S. District Court granted the defendants' motion, and the prisoners appealed. The court of appeals, affirming the decision, found that the court did not have jurisdiction over the prisoners' breach of contract claim. It also found that the double-celling of prisoners is not unconstitutional for a general prison population absent deprivation of food, medical care, sanitation, increased violence, or other conditions intolerable for incarceration, and the government's practice of selecting double-celled prisoners by seniority was not arbitrary and capricious and did not violate the due process rights of prisoners serving sentences under the Federal Witness Protection Program. Some procedure for choosing which prisoners would be double-celled was necessary, and the seniority system prevented discriminatory treatment and encouraged witnesses to obey prison regulations. (Federal Correctional Institute, Sandstone, Minnesota)

U.S. Appeals Court
SMOKE

Clemmons v. Bohannon, 918 F.2d 858 (10th Cir. 1990). A state prisoner brought a civil rights action alleging violations of his constitutional rights arising out of involuntary subjection to environmental tobacco smoke. Summary judgment for the defendants was granted by the U.S. District Court, and the prisoner appealed. The court of appeals found that exposing the prisoner to an unreasonable risk of a debilitating or terminal disease offends "evolving standards of decency" protected by the Eighth Amendment. According to the court, a relevant inquiry is whether long-term exposure to environmental tobacco smoke poses an unreasonable risk of harm to an inmate's health and is a relevant question in determining whether a prison policy of permitting indefinite double-celling of smokers with non-smokers against the nonsmokers' expressed will is cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth Amendment. (Kansas State Penitentiary)

U.S. Appeals Court
MEDICAL CARE
NOISE

Givens v. Jones, 900 F.2d 1229 (8th Cir. 1990). A former inmate filed a civil rights action against various employees and officials of a prison asserting violations of his constitutional rights. The U.S. District Court granted the defendants' motions for summary judgment on all but three of the claims, and the defendants named in the remaining three claims appealed. The court of appeals, reversing the lower court decision, found that at the time a psychiatrist prescribed a medication to which the inmate claimed to be allergic, it was not clearly established that such conduct constituted a deliberate indifference to the inmate's serious medical needs. It was also found that prison officials could reasonably have believed that the noise and fumes caused by the remodeling of the prison, which the inmate claimed gave him migraine headaches, were not so excessive as to constitute an eighth amendment violation. According to the court, a constitutional guarantee of freedom from cruel and unusual punishment does not protect against mere acts of negligence on the part of prison officials and employees. To be cruel and unusual punishment, conduct that does not purport to be punishment at all must involve more than ordinary lack of due care for the prisoner's interests or safety and it is obduracy and wantonness, not inadvertence or error in good faith, that characterize the prohibited conduct. (Missouri Training Center for Men)

U.S. District Court
MEDICAL CARE

Gomm v. DeLand, 729 F.Supp. 767 (D. Utah 1990). A prisoner filed an action against prison officials alleging that the defendants subjected him to cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the eighth and fourteenth amendments. The district court found that there was no evidence that prison personnel acted with deliberate indifference toward the prisoner's medical problems. The prison warden did not act with deliberate indifference toward the prisoner so as to violate the eighth amendment, in connection with the warden's refusal to allow the prisoner's private physician to perform shoulder surgery. The warden did not have the authority to order surgery for the prisoner. After the prisoner's private physician recommended surgery, the prison's act of obtaining a second opinion, pursuant to prison policy, which resulted in a delay, did not violate the eighth amendment. (Utah State Prison)

U.S. District Court
NOISE

Griffin v. Coughlin, 743 F.Supp. 1006 (N.D.N.Y. 1990). Inmates in a protective custody unit brought a suit seeking injunctive relief to remedy allegedly unconstitutional conditions in the unit. The district court found that the conditions at the protective custody unit did not violate equal protection or Eighth Amendment guarantees. According to the court, the appropriate analysis for an equal protection claim is whether the unequal treatment bears a reasonable relationship to legitimate penological interests. The protective custody unit functions to protect inmates who cannot remain in the general prison population. Complaints of boredom, frustration and hostility arising out of the idleness of protective custody inmates did not amount to an Eighth Amendment violation; furthermore, neither the extent to which protective custody inmates were segregated from one another nor the noise level in the protective custody unit violated the Eighth Amendment, and protective custody inmates have no Eighth Amendment right to prison work and educational activities. (Clinton Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
DOUBLE CELLING
TOTALITY OF CONDITIONS

Kitt v. Ferguson, 750 F.Supp. 1014 (D.Neb. 1990), affirmed, 950 F.2d 725. Inmates at a medium security unit sued the Director of the Department of Correctional Services and the prison warden, claiming that conditions in the unit constituted cruel and unusual punishment. The U.S. District Court found that inmates sufficiently established an allegation which properly raised a legitimate question that their constitutional rights may have been violated by conditions at the unit, and that prison officials knew or should have known that their conduct may have violated such rights. Thus, officials were not entitled to a defense of qualified immunity. Conditions of confinement did not violate the inmate's constitutional rights under a totality of circumstances; however, problems with heating, plumbing, and ventilation systems needed to be addressed, and the presence of HIV positive inmates in the general prison population was also a cause for concern. (Nebraska State Penitentiary)

U.S. District Court
BEDDING
CLOTHING
EXERCISE
FOOD
ISOLATION
RESTRAINTS

LeMaire v. Maass, 745 F.Supp. 623 (D. Or. 1990). An inmate brought a civil rights action, alleging unconstitutional conditions of his imprisonment in a disciplinary segregation unit. The U.S. District Court found: The use of full mechanical in-cell restraints, without control procedures to ensure that such practice was used only for safety purposes and limited to time necessary to serve that purpose, constituted cruel and unusual punishment; requiring inmates to shower in full mechanical restraints had no legitimate penological justification, and thus constituted cruel and unusual punishment; the practice of placing inmates on a controlled feeding status, during which they are fed "Nutraloaf," for reasons other than misuse of food or utensils for up to seven days at a time constituted cruel and unusual punishment; there was no legitimate penological justification for extending controlled feeding after misconduct has ceased or for conduct that could continue even with such feeding; the placement of inmates with serious medical problems in "quiet cells" from which they could not summon guards to assist them constituted cruel and unusual punishment; the policy of taking inmate's clothing, bedding and personal property as punishment for behavior not connected to misuse of clothing or property and requiring inmates to "earn back" items taken by demonstrating good behavior lacked legitimate penological justification and constituted cruel and unusual punishment; and the exercise conditions in the prison disciplinary unit constituted cruel and unusual punishment because the inmate was denied outdoor exercise for nearly five years and it was not possible for him to get sufficient exercise in his cell to prevent physical and mental deterioration. (Oregon State Penitentiary)

U.S. Appeals Court
CLOTHING
WORK

Madewell v. Roberts, 909 F.2d 1203 (8th Cir. 1990). A civil rights action was brought by inmates in a state correctional facility for damages and declaratory injunctive relief based on the prison officials' alleged violation of due process and equal protection rights, retaliatory actions, and violation of the right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment. The U.S. District Court granted the defendants' motions for a summary judgment, and the prisoners appealed. The appeals court, affirming in part and remanding in part, found that the material question of fact, as to whether the prison officials violated the arthritic inmate's eighth amendment rights by requiring him to sit without a coat on the cold concrete floor for four or more hours in an unheated workplace, precluded an entry of a summary judgment on the prisoner's "cruel and unusual punishment" claim, but the inmate did not have a protected "liberty interest" in being classified for a particular job, notwithstanding that the job classification affected the ability to earn good time credits. (Maximum Security Unit, Arkansas Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
MEDICAL CARE

Miltier v. Beorn, 896 F.2d 848 (4th Cir. 1990). The administratrix of the estate of a prison inmate brought action against doctors, nurses, wardens and prison administrators asserting an eighth amendment violation in deliberate indifference to serious medical needs. The U.S. District Court dismissed the civil rights claim. On appeal, the court of appeals, affirming in part, reversing in part, and remanding, found that there were issues of fact precluding summary judgment on claims of deliberate indifference on the part of the prison physicians and nurses with respect to the medical needs of the inmate who had complained of chest pains and other symptoms and who later died of a heart attack. The wardens, who had insured that the inmate received medical treatment, were not liable. Deliberate indifference by prison personnel to an inmate's serious illness or injury is actionable under the civil rights statute as constituting cruel and unusual punishment contravening the eighth amendment. Deliberate indifference may be demonstrated by either actual intent or reckless disregard, but the treatment must be so grossly incompetent, inadequate or excessive as to shock the conscience or be intolerable to fundamental fairness. (Virginia Correctional Center for Women)

U.S. District Court
VIOLENCE

Osos v. Fair, 739 F.Supp. 707 (D. Mass. 1990). A state inmate brought a Section 1983 action against a Department of Corrections employee alleging a violation of the eighth amendment. The district court found that the assaultive conduct of the employee against the inmate during which the employee, inter alia, cocked a gun with one bullet in the chamber while the barrel was in the inmate's mouth, violated the inmate's right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment. However, the inmate was only entitled to $1,000 in damages inasmuch as he provoked the employee's behavior by instigating a rumor that he was having a sexual affair with the employee's wife. (Old Colony Prison, Massachusetts)

U.S. Appeals Court
USE OF FORCE
RESTRAINTS

Stenzel v. Ellis, 916 F.2d 423 (8th Cir. 1990). An inmate who was forcibly removed to an isolation cell brought a Section 1983 action against the jailers. The U.S. District Court granted summary judgment for the defendants, and appeal was taken. The court of appeals found that the guards use of force to remove the inmate from a regular cell to an isolation cell was justified, and thus did not constitute an Eighth Amendment violation. The inmate had been asked three times to uncover his head while sleeping and had finally unequivocally refused, and his size, slippery skin as a result of lotion on his body, and "passive resistance" made him awkward to move. It was also found that the chaining of the inmate to his bunk in the isolation cell, after he refused to remove an obstruction from the observation camera, did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment, in violation of the Eighth Amendment; restraint was accomplished without the use of force, and was the only way to prevent the inmate from breaking a rule once he made it clear that he had no intention of obeying it. (Minnehaha County Jail, Sioux Falls, South Dakota)

U.S. District Court
FAILURE TO PROTECT INJURY
SAFETY

Warren v. State of Mo., 754 F.Supp. 150 (W.D. Mo. 1990), affirmed, 995 F.2d 130. An inmate brought an action against prison officials for violation of the Eighth Amendment. On the officials' motions to dismiss, the U.S. District Court found that the allegation that the prisoner was required to work with a table saw that was known to be dangerous was sufficient to state a cause of action for violation of the prisoner's Eighth Amendment rights. The prison officials were not entitled to qualified immunity from liability to the inmate who claimed he was injured by the table saw which officials knew posed a serious risk of injury. The officials should have known that the alleged conduct violated a clearly established prohibition against reckless indifference to the prisoner's safety. The court also found that the prisoner, who was alleging a valid Eighth Amendment claim, could not also bring a separate, independent claim under Section 1983 for the same behavior based on substantive due process. (Missouri State Penitentiary)

U.S. District Court
FAILURE TO PROTECT REMEDIES
SEPARATION
SMOKE

West v. Wright, 747 F.Supp. 329 (E.D. Va. 1990). An inmate brought a pro se civil rights complaint alleging that his exposure to other prisoners' cigarette smoke constituted cruel and unusual punishment, and prison officials moved for summary judgment. The U.S. District Court found that the prisoner, who did not suffer from any preexisting medical condition that was aggravated by tobacco smoke, was not subjected to cruel and unusual punishment as a result of being exposed to other prisoners' cigarette smoke in light of existing safeguards implemented by prison officials to protect nonsmokers from environmental tobacco smoke. Each cell had a window which the inmate may open or close as he chooses. Each cell and day room also had output and input vents that provided continuous circulation of natural air for adequate ventilation. The inmates assigned to the general population may also have personal fans in their cells and pedestal fans are located in each of the housing units and are operated by the inmates. It is also noted that smoking is prohibited in the library, dining hall, gymnasium and medical department, and inmates in the general population are afforded recreational opportunities and are confined in their housing units only during count and after lockdown in the evening. (Brunswick Correctional Center, Virginia)

State Appeals Court
BEDDING

Williams v. Kelone, 560 So.2d 915 (La.App. 1 Cir. 1990). A prisoner brought a tort action against employees of a prison for damages the prisoner allegedly sustained as a result of having to sleep with a soiled blanket. The district court dismissed the action, and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the prisoner was not deprived of basic personal hygiene, and thus the prisoner was not deprived of a constitutional right to be free of cruel and unusual punishment. A prison's providing a prisoner, who was placed in administrative lockdown, with a blanket which was assigned to the cell, whether the blanket had been used by a previous prisoner or not, was not a deprivation of basic personal hygiene. The prisoners were given clean sheets upon entering administrative lockdown, and the sheets were cleaned weekly thereafter. The blankets were cleaned two to three times a year and were replaced if they became extremely soiled. In point of fact, there was no evidence showing that the prisoners were subject to cold temperatures which would constitutionally require that they be given any blanket at all. Under these conditions, the furnishing of a soiled blanket was not a deprivation of "basic personal hygiene" constituting cruel and unusual punishment. (State Penitentiary, Angola, Louisiana)

U.S. Appeals Court
DOUBLE-CELLING
SEPARATION
TOTALITY OF CONDITIONS
TEMPERATURE

Wilson v. Seiter, 893 F.2d 861 (6th Cir. 1990). Inmates brought an action against prison officials alleging cruel and unusual punishment. The U.S. District Court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment, and the inmates appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the occasional exposure of inmates to temperatures as high as 95 degrees and the practice of housing mentally ill inmates with other inmates did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment. The double-bunking of inmates, and allowing each inmate only approximately 50 square feet of living space, did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment, where the inmates also had access during the day to the television lounge, gymnasium, yard, weight room, billiards table, and library. The inmates' position that present prison conditions remained unacceptable, despite measures taken by prison officials to reduce the noise level, service heaters, provide inmates with extra blankets during the winter months, install exhaust fans for improved ventilation, clean lavatories and the kitchen on a daily basis, and contract with an exterminator to treat the prison for pests on a twice-monthly basis, simply alleged negligence on the part of the prison officials, and thus failed to raise a reasonable inference of obduracy and wantonness on the part of prison officials to support a claim for cruel and unusual punishments. (Hocking Correctional Facility, Nelsonville, Ohio)

1991

U.S. District Court
MEDICAL CARE

Andrews v. Glenn, 768 F.Supp. 668 (C.D. Ill. 1991). An inmate brought an action under Section 1983, alleging that Department of Corrections employees had violated his Eighth Amendment rights. The district court found that the delay in treating the inmate's infected toes was not cruel and unusual punishment. The prisoner was denied treatment for the two infected toes on the first day he appeared at a prison's health care unit because he arrived late for sick call. The next day, after waiting to be seen, he created a disturbance and left on his own volition without being seen by a nurse. On the third day he was seen by a nurse. He also claimed that he did not receive proper care because the nurse refused to wash his feet for him. The inmate was seen by a doctor seven days after he first appeared at sick call and received treatment. To state a claim for the deprivation of medical care, a prisoner must allege "deliberate indifference to serious medical needs." In applying the test, the court is to consider such factors as the severity of the medical problem, whether the potential for harm if medical care is denied or delayed is substantial, and whether such harm actually resulted from the lack of medical attention. The inmate's infected toes presented no substantial potential for harm if not promptly treated, and no serious harm was suffered. (Logan Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
MEDICAL CARE
FAILURE TO PROVIDE CARE

Brown v. Coughlin, 758 F.Supp. 876 (S.D.N.Y. 1991). An inmate brought a Section 1983 action against various state and local officials, alleging deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs. On defendants' motion to dismiss, the district court found that issue of material fact as to whether state and local officials were deliberately indifferent to the inmate's serious medical needs, in violation of his constitutional right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment, precluded summary judgment for the officials. It was alleged that amputation of the inmate's leg, after a broken bone had become infected, was necessitated by repeated instances of denied treatment, excessively delayed care, incorrect medications, and noncompliance with medical orders. Even one isolated failure to provide medical treatment to a prisoner, without more, while ordinarily not actionable, may in fact rise to the level of constitutional violation if the surrounding circumstances suggest a degree of deliberateness, rather than inadvertence, in the failure to render meaningful treatment. (Downstate Correctional Facility, New York)

1991

U.S. District Court
DISCIPLINE

Duenas v. Nagle, 765 F.Supp. 1393 (W.D. Wis. 1991). A prisoner brought a civil rights action alleging violations of his procedural due process and Eighth Amendment rights in connection with prison disciplinary hearings. Prison officials filed a motion to dismiss. The district court found that the prison officials' alleged noncompliance with established state procedures for disciplinary proceedings constituted random and unauthorized acts for which there was adequate postdeprivation remedy, and therefore such noncompliance did not give rise to a procedural due claim under the federal civil rights statute. It was also found that the prisoner failed to adequately allege that prison officials' alleged noncompliance with established state procedures for prison disciplinary proceedings violated the prisoner's Eighth Amendment right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment, where the prisoner, beyond asserting that he had suffered, did not allege any specific facts that would support a finding that his confinement was of a type forbidden by the Eighth Amendment. (Columbia Correctional Institution, Portage, Wisconsin)

U.S. District Court
MEDICAL CARE
USE OF FORCE

Fenner v. Moran, 772 F.Supp. 59 (D. R.I. 1991). A prisoner brought a civil rights action seeking declaratory judgment that prison officials and medical staff members violated his Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment rights and monetary damages in both their official and individual capacities. The defendants moved to dismiss for failure to state a claim upon which relief could be granted. The district court found that the incorrect diagnosis that the prisoner had leukemia, was not cruel and unusual punishment and the prisoner's due process rights were not violated by the misdiagnosis. The allegations that three correctional officers hit the prisoner in his rib and groin area before transporting him to high security for further detention, if proven true, could demonstrate "reckless or callous" indifference to the prisoner's constitutional right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment; thus, the allegations stated a Section 1983 civil rights action. (Adult Correction Institute, Cranston, Rhode Island)

U.S. District Court
CLOTHING

Friends v. Moore, 776 F.Supp. 1382 (E.D. Mo. 1991). An inmate brought a Section 1983 action against various prison officials. The district court found that the conditions of the inmate's confinement in an outdoor rec area, wet and naked for a period of less than two hours, did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment. The prison officials placed the inmate in the rec area not for punishment but to restore order in the prison unit. The inmate was moved from his cell to the rec area to facilitate cleanup of the unit which he necessitated by setting off a sprinkler, and the duration of the confinement was relatively brief. (Potosi Correctional Center, Missouri)

U.S. District Court
FOOD

Gardner v. Beale, 780 F.Supp. 1073 (E.D.Va. 1991), affirmed, 998 F.2d 1008. A prisoner brought a Section 1983 action against a warden and an intensive treatment center where the prisoner's unit was working, alleging violations of the department of corrections meal service manual. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court found that providing the prisoner with only two meals per day (brunch and dinner on Friday, Saturday, and Sunday) which were days the crew did not work, in violation of the corrections department meal service manual, did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment. Although there was an 18 hour interval between dinner and brunch, the prisoner suffered only mental anguish and the warden who instituted the meal policy did not act with a culpable state of mind. According to the court, the corrections department meal service manual provision that prisoners would receive three meals each day with a maximum of 14 hours between dinner and breakfast did not create a due process interest. (Southampton Intensive Treatment Center, Virginia)

U.S. Appeals Court
REMEDIES

Kingsley v. Bureau of Prisons, 937 F.2d 26 (2nd Cir. 1991). A federal prisoner petitioned for a writ of habeas corpus and sought damages. The U.S. District Court dismissed the suit, and appeal was taken. The court of appeals, affirming in part and reversing in part, found that the disciplinary hearing officer's determination that the inmate had waived his request for witnesses due to his inability to identify the other prisoners by name was arbitrary; the need for witnesses was especially compelling in the disciplinary proceeding for failure to provide a urine specimen, the prisoners' identities were readily available to prison officials, and the inmate's inability to identify them by name was understandable in view of his arrival at the prison only five days before the incident at issue. The court also found that the officer's order that the inmate apply ice to his testicles, in an alleged attempt to assist the inmate in providing the required urine sample, did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment such as would support action for damages; no harm was inflicted, and the inmate's allegation, at most, indicated minor and fleeting pain. (Federal Correctional Institution, Otisville, New York)

U.S. District Court
USE OF FORCE

Neal v. Miller, 778 F.Supp. 378 (W.D. Mich. 1991). A state prisoner filed an action against a corrections officer for common law battery under Michigan law and violations of his civil rights. The U.S. District Court found that the inmate was entitled to recover for damages for common law battery under Michigan tort law based on the actions of the correctional officer in intentionally striking the inmate in the groin area; the contact was without provocation, without the inmate's consent, and was not privileged. However, the action did not involve the "deliberate indifference" required to establish cruel and unusual punishment under the Eighth Amendment; the officer had no intent to inflict harm, and his conduct did not show wantonness. The inmate was entitled to a damages award of $500 for pain and suffering and other physical consequences and an exemplary damages award of $250. (Ionia Maximum Correctional Facility, Michigan)

U.S. Appeals Court
SMOKING
SMOKE-FREE
ENVIRONMENT

Steading v. Thompson, 941 F.2d 498 (7th Cir. 1991), cert. den., 112 S.Ct. 1206. An asthmatic inmate who could not escape tobacco smoke from guards and his fellow inmates cigarette smoking filed a Section 1983 action, in which he alleged that prison authorities failure to establish a smoke-free environment for inmates not wishing to be exposed to tobacco smoke violated a constitutional prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment. The U.S. District Court granted the defendants' motion to dismiss, and the inmate appealed. The court of appeals found that the private tobacco company that sold its products to officers and inmates in state prison did not thereby become a "state actor," that could be held liable under Section 1983 when tobacco smoke adversely affected the asthmatic prisoner. In addition, the prison authorities did not violate the constitutional prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment by failing to provide a smoke-free environment for inmates who did not wish to be exposed to tobacco smoke. The court did note that prisoners allergic to components of tobacco smoke, or who can attribute their serious medical conditions to tobacco smoke from guards' or fellow inmates' cigarettes, are entitled to appropriate medical treatment, which may include removal from places where smoke hovers. (Sheridan Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. Supreme Court
DEFENSES

Wilson v. Seiter, 111 S.Ct. 2321 (1991). Prisoners brought an action against prison officials alleging cruel and unusual punishment. The U.S. District Court granted the officials' motion for summary judgment and the prisoners appealed. The court of appeals affirmed, and certiorari was granted. The U.S. Supreme Court, vacating and remanding, found that the prisoners claiming that conditions of confinement constituted cruel unusual punishment, were required to show deliberate indifference on the part of the prison officials, noting that "nothing so amorphous as 'overall prison conditions' can rise to the level of cruel and unusual punishment when no specific deprivation of a single human need exists." (Hocking Correctional Facility, Ohio)

1992

U.S. Appeals Court
SANITATION
WORK

Burton v. Armontrout, 975 F.2d 543 (8th Cir. 1992), cert. denied, 113 S.Ct. 2960. Inmates brought an action against correctional officers to recover for cruel and unusual punishment for failing to warn inmates that hospital sewage was contaminated with the AIDS (Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome) virus and other infectious diseases. The U.S. District Court directed a verdict in favor of some officers, entered judgment on a jury verdict in favor of the remaining officers, and granted an injunction. Appeals were taken, and the appeals court found that the injunction requiring the county correctional center to provide adequate protective clothing and warnings to inmates of potential danger of working in contaminated waste was permissible despite a general verdict in favor of correctional officers on constitutional claims. The court found that evidence showed that despite the passage of three years and a greater awareness of dangers of AIDS, prison officials failed to provide adequate protective clothing. The court also found that the county inmates who were involved in the cleanup of the sewage were not subjected to "cruel and unusual punishment" when correctional officers failed to warn that sewage could be contaminated with the AIDS virus and other infectious diseases. (Jefferson County Correctional Center, Missouri)

U.S. Appeals Court
SMOKING

Clemmons v. Bohannon, 956 F.2d 1523 (10th Cir. 1992). A prison inmate brought a civil rights action alleging violations of the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments arising out of involuntary subjection to environmental tobacco smoke. The U.S. District Court granted prison officials summary judgment, and the inmate appealed. The court of appeals found that the inmate sometimes being forced to share a cell with a smoker, and being exposed to smoke from other inmates and guards, did not constitute an Eighth Amendment violation; respiratory and eye irritation were not sufficiently serious, and the inmate did not offer any evidence of effects pertaining to his personal health. (Kansas State Penitentiary, Lansing, Kansas)

U.S. Appeals Court
INJURY
SAFETY
FAILURE TO PROTECT

Duane v. Lane, 959 F.2d 673 (7th Cir. 1992). A prison inmate who was scalded with hot liquid by an unseen assailant brought an action against prison officials alleging that their deliberate indifference to his safety amounted to cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The U.S. District Court rendered summary judgment in favor of the defendants and the inmate appealed. The court of appeals found that the inmate failed to establish that officials possessed a mental state, which is intent or some functional equivalent such as deliberate indifference, that is required to maintain an Eighth Amendment claim. It was prison policy to prohibit stingers, which are heating services, in the segregated maximum security unit where the inmate was located and to also search general population inmates who entered the unit. Failure to enforce such measures at most, established negligence, not deliberate indifference. (Menard Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
CLOTHING
TEMPERATURE

Gordon v. Faber, 973 F.2d 686 (8th Cir. 1992). Inmates at a state prison brought a Section 1983 action against a security officer. The U.S. District Court assessed damages of $75 per inmate and ordered the officer to pay costs. The officer appealed and the court of appeals affirmed the decision, finding that the Eighth Amendment rights of the prisoners were violated by their being left outside without proper protection in freezing temperatures for periods varying from one hour to one hour and forty-five minutes, while their living facilities were searched for a weapon alleged to be hidden there. (Iowa Men's Reformatory, Anamosa, Iowa)

U.S. District Court
SMOKE

Guilmet v. Knight, 792 F.Supp. 93 (E.D. Wash. 1992). A prison inmate brought a suit alleging that his Eighth Amendment rights were violated where he was housed with a cellmate who smoked. Upon the defendant's motion for summary judgment, the district court found that the prisoner was not subjected to cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth Amendment when he was housed for fifteen days with a cellmate who smoked. The intermittent exposure to environmental tobacco smoke during the course of those fifteen days did not pose an unreasonable risk to the prisoner's health and did not deny him the minimal civilized measure of life's necessities. In addition, the conduct of the correctional unit supervisor, who moved the inmate within ten days of his complaint, did not reflect a culpable state of mind. The court noted that the comparatively short delay that occurred was justified by the need to find an inmate with whom the plaintiff would be compatible. Since consideration of the inmate's compatibility is necessary to preserve prison security, the delay in moving the plaintiff was not unreasonable. (Washington State Penitentiary)

U.S. Supreme Court
USE OF FORCE

Hudson v. McMillian, 112 S.Ct. 995 (1992). A prisoner brought a federal rights suit, alleging his Eighth Amendment rights were violated by a beating he received from state correctional officers. The U.S. District Court entered judgment in favor of the prisoner, and the correctional officers appealed. The court of appeals reversed, holding that the prisoner had no claim because his injuries were minor and required no medical attention. The prisoner petitioned for certiorari. The U.S. Supreme Court, reversing the court of appeals decision, found that the use of excessive physical force against a prisoner may constitute cruel and unusual punishment even though the prisoner does not suffer serious injury. Whenever prison officials stand accused of using excessive physical force in violation of the cruel and unusual punishment clause, the core of judicial inquiry is whether force was applied in a good-faith effort to maintain or restore discipline, or maliciously and sadistically to cause harm. (Angola State Penitentiary, Louisiana)

U.S. Appeals Court
SMOKE

Hunt v. Reynolds, 974 F.2d 734 (6th Cir. 1992), cert. denied, 114 S.Ct. 709. State prison inmates brought a Section 1983 action against prison officials, claiming deprivation of their Eighth Amendment rights by virtue of their being compelled to share cells with smokers. The U.S. District Court entered judgment for the defendants, and the inmates appealed. The court of appeals, reversing and remanding, found that a genuine issue existed as to whether prisoners had serious medical needs for a smoke-free environment. The court noted that prisoners allergic to the components of tobacco smoke, or who can attribute their serious medical conditions to smoke, are entitled to appropriate medical treatment, which may include removal from places where smoke hovers. (Tennessee Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
CRUEL AND UNUSUAL
PUNISHMENT

Jackson v. Duckworth, 955 F.2d 21 (7th Cir. 1992). An inmate brought a Section 1983 action against prison officials alleging that subhuman conditions at prison violated the Eighth Amendment's prohibition against infliction of cruel and unusual punishments. The U.S. District Court granted summary judgment for the prison officials, and the inmate appealed. The court of appeals found that genuine issues of material fact as to the ghastliness of the inmate's prison conditions and state of mind of the prison officials precluded summary judgment against the inmate in the action. The inmate's affidavit stated that he was forced to live with filth, rodents, inadequate heating, no toilet paper, and drinking water containing small black worms which turned into small black flies, and that officials visited his unit routinely, and observed the conditions described, but failed to take adequate corrective measures. (Indiana Prison System)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEARCHES

Jordan v. Gardner, 953 F.2d 1137 (9th Cir. 1992), affirmed, 986 F.2d 1521. Female inmates brought a suit challenging the constitutionality of a prison regulation which permitted cross gender pat searches. The U.S. District Court enjoined prison officials from implementing the policy and the prison officials appealed. The appeals court, reversing the decision, found that the regulation did not violate inmates' freedom of religion. The fact that female inmates had no alternative means of observing religious objections to searches did not require invalidation of the regulation permitting cross gender pat searches under the First Amendment given that inmates were able to follow other tenets of their religion and that the inmates failed to show alternatives to the prison policy. The court found that the prison regulation which permitted cross gender searches was reasonable and did not violate the Fourth Amendment, given that searches were conducted for security purposes, were brief in duration and conducted on fully clothed inmates, were conducted in a professional manner, and given that requiring same sex searches would displace officers throughout the prison. The regulation was adopted to meet the prison's internal security needs after careful consideration, prison guards were carefully trained to conduct searches in the least threatening manner, and brief pat searches did not violate evolving standards of decency. (Washington Corrections Center for Women, Washington)

U.S. Appeals Court
SMOKE

McKinney v. Anderson, 959 F.2d 853 (9th Cir. 1992), affirmed, 113 S.Ct. 2475. An inmate brought a civil rights action against prison officials alleging a violation of the Eighth Amendment due to his exposure to environmental tobacco smoke. The U.S. District Court directed verdict for prison officials, and the inmate appealed. The court of appeals affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded, and certiorari was granted. The U.S. Supreme Court vacated and remanded. Thereafter, the court of appeals found that housing a prisoner in an environment that exposed him to levels of environmental tobacco smoke that posed an unreasonable risk of harming his health satisfied the objective component of the Eighth Amendment claim of cruel and unusual punishment; however, the inmate would have to establish a subjective component of the claim on remand by showing that prison officials showed deliberate indifference to the inmate's long-term exposure to environmental tobacco smoke. (Nevada State Prison, Carson City)

U.S. Appeals Court
SMOKING

Murphy v. Dowd, 975 F.2d 435 (8th Cir. 1992), cert. denied, 113 S.Ct. 1310. A prison inmate brought a Section 1983 action against a state prison official. The U.S. District Court entered judgment for the official and the inmate appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the official was entitled to qualified immunity. There was a split of authority among circuits about whether tobacco smoke exposure was cruel and unusual punishment, and under those circumstances the official could not be deemed to know he was violating the prisoner's rights by exposing him to smoke. (Farmington Correctional Center, Missouri)

U.S. District Court
WORK

Pendergrass v. Hannigan, 788 F.Supp. 488 (D. Kan. 1992). A prisoner filed a civil rights complaint alleging that he was subjected to cruel and unusual punishment when he was forced to work outside during dangerously cold conditions, and that if he had complained of the work conditions he would have been transferred without due process to a less desirable correctional facility. The warden filed a motion for summary judgment. The U.S. District Court found that the prisoner's allegation was not, standing alone, enough to state a claim for cruel and unusual punishment; the prisoner did not dispute information provided in an investigatory report that appropriate clothing was issued and available to prisoners during winter work. The prisoner's claim that he would have been summarily transferred without due process guarantees if he had complained about the weather conditions was speculative and was not properly before the court. (Hutchinson Correctional Facility, Hutchinson, Kansas)

U.S. District Court
CELLS PRIVACY
SANITATION

White v. Nix, 805 F.Supp. 721 (S.D. Iowa 1992), affirmed, 7 F.3d 120. An inmate brought a civil rights suit against prison officials arising out of his confinement in a "screened" prison cell. The district court found that the placement of the state inmate in the cell did not violate his Eighth Amendment right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment. The cell was in a cellhouse that housed inmates pending investigations for disciplinary infractions. The cell had a toilet, sink, a single bed and a table. A screened wire mesh covers the bars of the cell. The court ruled that any uncleanness in the interior of the cell could have been corrected by the inmate's request for cleaning supplies. In addition, the inmate was only confined to the screened cell on a temporary basis for eleven days. The court also found that the inmate failed to show that his placement in the screened prison cell was for other than reasons of institutional security and safety following his assaultive behavior. The inmate failed to prove that his placement was retaliatory, because of his earlier lawsuits. The inmate also failed to show a violation of his due process rights arising from the officials' 48-hour delay in transferring him from the screened cell after he exhausted his administrative appeals in a disciplinary matter where the defendant did not have a liberty interest in the immediate transfer by reason of an informal prison rule that inmates in summary segregation were not to be transferred until they exhausted their administrative appeals. (Iowa State Penitentiary)

- U.S. District Court
FAILURE TO PROVIDE CARE
MEDICAL CARE
- Blumhagen v. Sabes, 834 F.Supp. 1347 (D.Wyo. 1993). Prisoners sued prison officials under Section 1983 for alleged failure to take adequate precautions against a tuberculosis outbreak. On the defendants' motion for summary judgment, the district court found that the prisoners failed to show that officials acted with such deliberate indifference as would establish a violation of the Eighth Amendment right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment. The entire prison population was tested when officials learned that one inmate had contracted the disease. A claim that the medical staff should have taken more comprehensive measures in screening and monitoring the inmates' health, amounted, at most, to an allegation of mere negligence. (Wyoming State Penitentiary)
- U.S. District Court
FAILURE TO PROVIDE CARE
- Casey v. Lewis, 834 F.Supp. 1477 (D.Ariz. 1993). A class of inmates sued Arizona prison officials based on allegations of deliberate indifference to serious medical, dental, and mental health care needs and alleged that female prisoners' equal protection rights were violated with regard to mental health care services. The district court found that the treatment available to seriously mentally ill inmates in the prison system violated the Eighth Amendment. In addition, the unequal treatment of male and female inmates violated the female inmates' equal protection rights in addition to violating their Eighth Amendment rights. The court found that an injunction was appropriate in light of showing that, as a result of economic conditions, the prison system would continue to lock down inmates as an alternative to providing appropriate mental health care. (Arizona Department of Corrections)
- U.S. Supreme Court
SMOKING
SMOKE-FREE
ENVIRONMENT
- Helling v. McKinney, 113 S.Ct. 2475 (1993). A prisoner brought a civil rights action against prison officials alleging violation of his Eighth Amendment rights due to his exposure to environmental tobacco smoke (ETS). The district court entered a directed verdict for the prison officials and the inmate appealed. Appeals courts modified the lower court decision, and the case was presented to the U.S. Supreme Court. The Supreme Court ruled that the inmate's Eighth Amendment claim could be based upon possible future harm to his health, as well as present harm, arising out of exposure to ETS. The Court found that the prisoner had stated a cause of action for violation of his Eighth Amendment rights, alleging that prison officials had, with deliberate indifference, exposed him to levels of environmental tobacco smoke that posed an unreasonable risk of serious damage. The court ordered the lower court, on remand, to consider the circumstances of the inmate's new prison location (where he was not longer exposed to a cellmate who smoked five packs of cigarettes a day), including non-smoking policies of this new location. The Court also ordered the lower court to consider the subjective element, deliberate indifference, in light of the officials' current attitudes and conduct, which may have changed materially because of the transfer of the inmate to a facility that has a smoking policy. (Nevada Department of Prisons)
- U.S. Appeals Court
USE OF FORCE
- Hickey v. Reeder, 12 F.3d 754 (8th Cir. 1993). An inmate brought a civil rights action against jail officials who shot him with a stun gun when he refused to clean his cell. The U.S. District Court entered judgment for the jail officials, and the inmate appealed. The court of appeals, reversing and remanding, found that the use of a stun gun to enforce an order to sweep violated the inmate's constitutional right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment. (Pulaski County Jail, Little Rock, Arkansas)
- U.S. District Court
AIDS
- Johnson v. U.S., 816 F.Supp. 1519 (N.D. Ala. 1993). An inmate brought an action against the Federal Bureau of Prisons and prison officials, alleging violation of his Eighth Amendment right against cruel and unusual punishment. On the defendants' motion for summary judgment, the district court, adopting a report and recommendation of a U.S. Magistrate Judge, found that the inmate failed to show an Eighth Amendment violation concerning his being housed in the same cell with an inmate who was dying from acquired immune deficiency syndrome (AIDS). All examples listed as means by which the inmate feared he may have contracted AIDS were based on unsubstantiated fears and ignorance. In addition, the inmate presented no facts or allegations supporting an inference of deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs or a culpable state of mind on the part of the prison officials. (Federal Correctional Institute, Talladega, Alabama)
- U.S. Appeals Court
SEARCHES
- Jordan v. Gardner, 986 F.2d 1521 (9th Cir. 1993). Female inmates brought an action challenging the constitutionality of prison regulations permitting cross-gender clothed body searches. After granting rehearing en banc, the court of appeals found that the prison policy requiring male guards to conduct random, nonemergency, suspicionless clothed body searches of female prisoners was cruel and unusual punishment that violated the Eighth Amendment. It was noted that the policy inflicted "pain" for Eighth Amendment purposes, where many female inmates had been sexually abused prior to their incarceration, so that unwanted intimate touching by men was likely to cause psychological trauma. In addition, the cross-gender clothed body searches were "unnecessary" for Eighth Amendment purposes, where prison security was not dependent upon such searches, and the searches did not ensure equal employment opportunities for male guards. The determination that the searches violated the inmates' Eighth Amendment rights warranted a permanent injunction that prohibited nonemergency, suspicionless clothed body searches by male guards. (Washington Corrections Center for Women)

U.S. Appeals Court
USE OF FORCE

Norman v. Taylor, 9 F.3d 1078 (4th Cir. 1993). An inmate sued a deputy alleging excessive force in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The U.S. District Court granted summary judgment for the deputy finding that the inmate did not adequately refute the deputy's statement that the inmate was causing a disturbance so that force was necessary, and that the amount of force was not excessive. The inmate appealed. The appeals court, reversing and remanding, found that a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the inmate was causing a disturbance justifying the use of force precluded summary judgment in favor of the deputy. According to the court, the actions of the deputy in swinging keys at the inmate's face to stop him from smoking could clearly support a finding that he acted maliciously and sadistically to cause harm and satisfied the subjective component of an Eighth Amendment excessive force claim. Furthermore, the harm alleged by the inmate which included initial and lingering pain to his hand, physical injury sustained including swelling and decreased mobility of his hand, and psychological injury caused from threats by the deputy, were beyond the de minimis level. (Norfolk County Jail, Virginia)

U.S. Appeals Court
DOUBLE CELLING

Strickler v. Waters, 989 F.2d 1375 (4th Cir. 1993), cert. denied, 114 S.Ct. 393. An inmate in a city jail brought a suit against the Commonwealth of Virginia, the city, the city sheriff, and the Department of Corrections for their alleged violation of his constitutional rights concerning his conditions of confinement. The U.S. District Court granted the defendants' motions for summary judgment, and the inmate appealed. The court of appeals found that double celling did not rise to a level of cognizable Eighth Amendment deprivation. The inmate failed to present any evidence that he had sustained serious or significant physical or emotional injury because of such conditions. (Portsmouth City Jail, Virginia)

U.S. District Court
CELLS
PLUMBING

Thomas v. Brown, 824 F.Supp. 160 (N.D. Ind. 1993). A state prisoner brought a civil rights action, claiming that he had been deprived of running water in a sink in his cell. The district court found that material issues of fact, precluding summary judgment on behalf of prison officials, existed as to whether the prisoner had been subjected to cruel and unusual punishment. There was dispute about whether the prisoner had notified authorities, and as to whether the officers had shown necessary deliberate indifference to his plight. However, the complaint did not state an equal protection claim. (Indiana State Prison)

1994

U.S. District Court
INJURY

Arnold v. South Carolina Dept. of Corrections, 843 F.Supp. 110 (D.S.C. 1994). A state prison inmate who was injured while using faulty kitchen equipment brought a Section 1983 claim against prison officials based on Eighth Amendment violations. Upon the prison officials' motion for summary judgment, the district court found that the inmate failed to establish that the officials violated the Eighth Amendment's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment. The inmate offered no evidence that the officials acted with a requisite culpable state of mind in failing to repair the equipment. Also, the deprivation of rights was not sufficiently serious to satisfy the objective component of violation. The proper remedy for the inmate was to file for workers compensation benefits. The court found that even if the inmate had established that prison officials violated the Eighth Amendment's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment by failing to repair the faulty steam pot, prison officials were entitled to qualified immunity from the suit because it had not been clearly established that the right to properly functioning prison equipment was of constitutional magnitude. (McCormick Correctional Institution, South Carolina)

U.S. District Court
MEDICAL CARE

Brown v. Thompson, 868 F.Supp. 326 (S.D. Ga. 1994). An inmate brought a Section 1983 action against a warden and prison medical staff for deliberate indifference to his medical needs. On the defendants' motions for summary judgment, the district court found that the inmate's medical treatment for months before being denied treatment on a single day did not show the deliberate indifference required to support the inmate's claim under the Eighth Amendment. (Coastal Correctional Institute, Georgia)

U.S. District Court
MEDICAL CARE

Brownlow v. Chavez, 871 F.Supp. 1061 (S.D.Ind. 1994). A prisoner brought a Section 1983 action against a prison physician alleging the physician failed to provide appropriate medical care over the past several years. On the physician's motion for summary judgment the district court found that the prison doctor was not deliberately indifferent to the prisoner's medical needs in violation of the Eighth Amendment, in view of evidence that the doctor played a principal role in providing a steady flow of medical services to the prisoner who had a knee injury. The prisoner was also seen by an orthopedic specialist on many occasions. The court noted that medical malpractice, inadvertent failure to provide adequate medical care, or simple negligence does not amount to a violation of the Eighth Amendment. (Indiana Reformatory)

U.S. Appeals Court
RESTRAINTS
USE OF FORCE

Davidson v. Flynn, 32 F.3d 27 (2nd Cir. 1994). An inmate brought an action against corrections officials to recover for an injury caused by handcuffs. The U.S. District Court adopted a recommendation by a U.S. Magistrate Judge for dismissal and the inmate appealed. The appeals court, reversing and remanding, found that although the inmate was an escape risk and some restraint was necessary beyond that normally used, the inmate stated a claim for cruel and unusual punishment by alleging that the handcuffs were placed too tightly, leading to serious and permanent physical injury, and that excessive force was applied wantonly and maliciously in retaliation for being litigious. (Specialized Housing Unit, Elmira, New York)

U.S. District Court
USE OF FORCE

Davis v. Moss, 841 F.Supp. 1193 (M.D.Ga. 1994). A former inmate brought a Section 1983 action against correctional officers alleging cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth Amendment in connection with defendants' treatment during a riot. The district court found that the inmate failed to establish that a correctional officer had punched him in the face or struck his legs with a night stick. However, the inmate proved by a preponderance of evidence that a correctional officer used excessive force in violation of the inmate's Eighth Amendment rights when the officer shoved the inmate down fire escape stairs during the course of the riot. The inmate was handcuffed and neither resisted nor threatened the officer. (Rivers Correctional Institution, Hardwick, Georgia)

U.S. District Court
CAPITAL
PUNISHMENT

Fierro v. Gomez, 865 F.Supp. 1387 (N.D. Cal. 1994). California inmates who had been sentenced to death brought an action on behalf of themselves and all others similarly situated, challenging the constitutionality of California's method of execution by lethal gas. The district court found that the California inmates who had been sentenced to death had standing to challenge the constitutionality of California's method of execution by lethal gas, even though they could have elected to be executed by lethal injection instead. Where inmates had refused to elect the method of execution, their executions, if carried out, would be by administration of lethal gas, and their challenge to the method of execution was therefore justifiable. The court also found that California's method of execution by lethal gas is unconstitutional cruel and unusual punishment under the Eighth Amendment. Evidence strongly suggests that a condemned inmate is likely to suffer intense physical pain during the period of consciousness, which is likely to continue anywhere from 15 seconds to one minute from the time the gas strikes the inmate's face, and that there is a substantial risk that consciousness will persist for up to several minutes. Evidence of pain, when coupled with the overwhelming evidence of societal rejection of lethal gas as a method of execution, renders its administration unconstitutional. (San Quentin State Prison, California)

U.S. District Court
FAILURE TO PROTECT TEMPERATURE

Hadley v. Peters, 841 F.Supp. 850 (C.D.Ill. 1994). A state prisoner brought a pro se civil rights action against correctional officials. On motion to dismiss, construed as a motion for summary judgment, the district court found that no Eighth Amendment violation was shown in failing to protect the plaintiff inmate or in conditions of the segregation unit. While inmates are entitled to reasonable protection from harm, prison officials cannot be expected to eliminate the possibility of all attacks. In addition, the alleged lack of heat in the prison segregation unit did not amount to hardship where, during the time in question, the outdoor temperatures ranged from 57 to 84 degrees Fahrenheit. (Graham Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
FAILURE TO PROTECT SECURITY
VIOLENCE

Holloway v. Wittry, 842 F.Supp. 1193 (S.D.Iowa 1994). An inmate brought an action against prison officials and a staff member arising from the assault of the inmate by four other prisoners. The district court found that the inmate had failed to establish deliberate indifference on the part of the prison officials, but that a staff member violated the inmate's Eighth Amendment rights. A staff member was required to remain on the floor of the prison industries at all times, a security officer roved through the industry building all day, security checks were made of tools, and staff members carried emergency beepers. But the court found that a staff member's failure to seek assistance by failing to use an emergency beeper and intervene during the assault violated the inmate's Eighth Amendment rights. As a result, the inmate was awarded $500 in compensatory damages and $1,000 in punitive damages. (Iowa State Penitentiary, Fort Madison, Iowa)

U.S. Appeals Court
EXERCISE

Housley v. Dodson, 41 F.3d 597 (10th Cir. 1994). An inmate in a county jail brought a civil rights suit against various public officials. The U.S. District Court dismissed the action and the inmate appealed. The appeals court found that the inmate's allegation that he received only 30 minutes of out-of-cell exercise during a three-month period in which he was confined in the county jail was sufficient to state a civil rights claim against jail officials based on a violation of the prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment. (Custer County Jail, Oklahoma)

U.S. Appeals Court
USE OF FORCE

Howard v. Barnett, 21 F.3d 868 (8th Cir. 1994). A prisoner sued a prison official alleging use of excessive force. The U.S. District Court entered judgment on a jury verdict for the prisoner and the official appealed. The appeals court, reversing and remanding, found that a violation of the Eighth Amendment required a finding that force was applied "maliciously and sadistically for the very purpose of causing harm." Force that was excessive within the meaning of the Eighth Amendment would be compensable if it caused the prisoner actual injury, even if the injury was not of great significance. (Missouri)

U.S. District Court
SMOKE

Jackson v. Berge, 864 F.Supp. 873 (E.D. Wis. 1994). An inmate brought a Section 1983 action for injunctive and monetary relief against prison officials for allegedly violating his civil rights when they placed him in a cell with a prisoner who smoked. The prison officials' filed a motion for summary judgment. The district court, granting the motion, found that the inmate did not satisfy the objective component of the cruel and unusual punishment test based on his confinement with a cellmate who smoked. He produced no competent evidence that he had a serious medical condition, or that second-hand smoke caused or aggravated any illness. In addition, he produced no evidence of the level of environmental tobacco smoke in his cell. The court also found that the inmate failed to establish that the prison officials acted with deliberate indifference in violation of the prohibition on cruel and unusual punishment in placing him in a cell with a roommate who smoked. Emergency overcrowding required housing in double rooms and the cell was designated a nonsmoking cell. Furthermore, the officials investigated the inmate's complaints, but they found no evidence of any smoking in the cell. They also provided the inmate with medical care every time he complained of chest pains or breathing problems. (Fox Lake Correctional Institution, Fox Lake, Wisconsin)

U.S. District Court
EXERCISE

Jones v. Stine, 843 F.Supp. 1186 (W.D. Mich. 1994). A prisoner brought a civil rights action against a warden and deputy warden. The district court found that allegations of the inmate, who was voluntarily classified to protective segregation, that he was limited to five hours of outdoor recreation per week in a fenced-in module, were sufficient to allege an Eighth Amendment claim for cruel and unusual punishment. (Alger Maximum Correctional Facility, Munising, Michigan)

U.S. District Court
INJURY
WORK

Lee v. Sikes, 870 F.Supp. 1096 (S.D.Ga. 1994). A prison inmate who was attacked by a boar hog while working at assigned duties in the prison's hog farm operation brought a civil rights suit against the warden and the supervisor of the operation. The district court found that the prison inmate failed to show "deliberate indifference" by the supervisor of the hog operation or prison warden, and thus failed to establish an Eighth Amendment violation. The inmate relied almost entirely on a list of safety rules and the supervisor's ignorance of the rules, but there was no evidence indicating deliberate indifference to the rules. In addition, the inmate was protected by the Eighth Amendment, which provides explicit protection to prisoners against cruel and unusual punishment, and could not bring a separate, independent claim for the same behavior by prison officials based on substantive due process. (Rogers Correctional Institution, Georgia)

U.S. District Court
MEDICAL CARE

Lowrance v. Coughlin, 862 F.Supp. 1090 (S.D.N.Y. 1994). A Muslim prisoner brought a Section 1983 action against various prison officials alleging violation of the First, Eighth, and Fourteenth Amendments. The district court found that prison officials violated the Eighth Amendment with respect to delaying surgery on the inmate's left knee, entitling the inmate to damages as compensation for pain that could have been reduced between the initial diagnosis and an operation, which did not take place for nearly two years. The prison medical staff had actual notice of the injured knee as reflected in prison medical records, yet failed to provide adequate care. The inmate was transferred from one prison to another on the eve of surgery in retaliation for exercising his protected religious and free speech right, despite the prison officials' having knowledge of the inmate's medical need, and the inmate was deprived of adequate postoperative treatment. (Green Haven Correctional Facility, and other facilities, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
FOOD
NOISE
SANITATION
USE OF FORCE

Lunsford v. Bennett, 17 F.3d 1574 (7th Cir. 1994). Prisoners brought a civil rights action against prison and county officials alleging violations of the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments. The U.S. District Court entered summary judgment for the officials, and the prisoners appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the prisoners' claims that they were denied basic hygiene items, subjected to loud noises over the intercom and served poorly prepared food did not, either individually or collectively, establish an Eighth Amendment violation. Shackling the prisoners to their cells so that trustees could mop up water in the cell block which prisoners had flooded did not constitute an Eighth Amendment violation. Pouring a bucket of water over the head of an inmate who was shackled to his cell during the cleanup of the cell block did not rise to a level of Eighth Amendment violation. Institutional security was threatened, prisoners and guards were talking "trash" to one another, some prisoners were splashing guards with water, and prison officials were obliged to restore order and control. Although pouring a bucket of water over the head of a prisoner who was already standing ankle deep in water might be seen as unnecessary in retrospect, it was a minor use of force that did not offend the conscience. (Elkhart County Security Center, Indiana)

U.S. District Court
HARASSMENT

Meadows v. Gibson, 855 F.Supp. 223 (W.D. Tenn. 1994). A prisoner brought a Section 1983 action against a prison counselor for verbal harassment. The district court found that a prison counselor's mere verbal harassment of the prisoner does not inflict pain so as to amount to obduracy and wantonness required for violation of the cruel and unusual punishment clause. (Shelby County Correctional Center, Tennessee)

U.S. District Court
FOOD

Prophete v. Gilless, 869 F.Supp. 537 (W.D. Tenn. 1994). A county jail inmate brought a civil rights action and the district court dismissed the complaint. The court found that the inmate was not subject to cruel and unusual punishment by the fact that food was transported from the kitchen to cells on carts, resulting in food being cold when it was served, despite the speculation of the risk the food could become contaminated with bacteria. (Shelby County Jail, Tennessee)

U.S. District Court
FAILURE TO PROTECT
USE OF FORCE

Shearin v. Correction Officer Pennington, 867 F.Supp. 1250 (E.D.Va. 1994). A state inmate brought a Section 1983 action against a corrections officer and other corrections employees, alleging that the officer committed assault and battery against the inmate and that the employees failed to protect the inmate, thereby subjecting the inmate to cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth Amendment. Both parties moved for summary judgment. The district court found that the inmate was not subjected to cruel and unusual punishment under the Eighth Amendment by the actions of the corrections officer in thrusting a metal window rod through the bars of the inmate's cell and charging at the inmate, after the inmate threw dissolved human waste onto the officer from his cell. The inmate was not subjected to the use of excessive force when the officer verbally provoked the inmate; the inmate was subjected to no further physical contact. There was no evidence that the inmate was physically harmed, and the officer acted to defend himself, rather than with a culpable state of mind. In addition, the inmate was not subjected to cruel and unusual punishment under the Eighth Amendment by the actions of a higher-ranking officer after the incident. The officer visited the inmate a few minutes after the incident and immediately presented the inmate to a physician for treatment. The officer protected the inmate from further harm, and moved to discipline the lower-ranking officer. (Powhatan Correctional Facility, Virginia)

U.S. Appeals Court
MEDICAL CARE

Sherrer v. Stephens, 50 F.3d 496 (8th Cir. 1994). An inmate brought a Section 1983 action against prison medical staff members for being deliberately indifferent to his medical needs under the Eighth Amendment in treating his broken index finger. The U.S. District Court granted summary judgment for the prison medical staff members and the inmate appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the treatment of the inmate's broken finger did not rise to the level of deliberate indifference based on evidence that he received painkillers, instructions to apply ice and perform motion therapy, x-rays, and examination by orthopedists. (Delta Regional Unit, Arkansas Department of Correction)

U.S. Appeals Court
CROWDING
REMEDIES

Shifrin v. Fields, 39 F.3d 1112 (10th Cir. 1994). An inmate brought a civil rights action claiming that eligibility requirements of the Oklahoma Prison Overcrowding Emergency Powers Act violated his rights to equal protection, due process, and to be free from cruel and unusual punishment. The U.S. District Court entered judgment against the inmate and he appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that violent offenders and repeat offenders were not members of any suspect class, and the Act was rationally related to legitimate penological concerns. The court found that the inmate had no constitutionally protected liberty interest in shortening his sentence through emergency time credits. Requiring a repeat offender who is incarcerated for a violent offense to remain in overcrowded prison conditions without the benefit of emergency time credits was not cruel and unusual punishment. (Oklahoma State Prison)

U.S. Appeals Court
DISCIPLINE

Sims v. Mashburn, 25 F.3d 980 (11th Cir. 1994). A prisoner brought a Section 1983 action against state prison officials, alleging that his Eighth Amendment rights were violated in connection with the stripping of his cell. The U.S. District Court entered judgment for the prisoner and appeal was taken. The court of appeals, reversing the decision, found that the alleged failure of a prison guard to monitor the prisoner after his cell was stripped, which allegedly caused the prisoner to be subject to a penalty for a period longer than necessary to achieve penal objectives, did not inflict cruel and unusual punishment upon the prisoner in violation of his Eighth Amendment rights. The official was allowed deference in determining when the penal objective had been reached, and his conduct had been in compliance with policies that were in place at the institution; consequently he could not be characterized as malicious or sadistic as needed for an Eighth Amendment violation. (St. Clair Correctional Facility, Alabama)

U.S. District Court
TOILETS

Torcasio v. Murray, 862 F.Supp. 1482 (E.D. Va. 1994). An inmate brought a suit against state officials, alleging that his civil rights were violated by prison officials' failure to provide for his morbidly obese condition. The district court found that the inmate failed to state an Eighth Amendment violation, except as to the size of the toilet in his cell. The prisoner, who was five feet seven inches tall and weighed in excess of 460 pounds and had a girth of 78 inches, alleged that the handrails for the toilet facilities were inadequate to accommodate him. In addition, the commode was so small that the defendant's groin and genitals were often submerged in the toilet bowl. (Virginia State Prison)

U.S. Appeals Court
MEDICAL CARE

Walker v. Shansky, 28 F.3d 666 (7th Cir. 1994), affirmed, 51 F.3d 276. A state inmate brought an action against medical personnel and prison officials alleging that two forced injections of tranquilizing drugs and his assignment to long-term segregation violated his constitutional rights. The U.S. District Court entered summary judgment for the officials and the inmate appealed. The appeals court found that the administration to the inmate of the forced injections did not violate a prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment where the inmate was engaging in explosive and assaultive behavior and a psychiatrist concluded that the inmate's behavior was a result of a borderline personality disorder. The inmate's history of obduracy with respect to medical advice combined with the self-destructive behavior led the psychiatrist to conclude that the inmate was irrational when making a decision concerning his health and welfare. (Centralia Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
USE OF FORCE

White v. Holmes, 21 F.3d 277 (8th Cir. 1994). An inmate brought an action against a prison librarian and supervisor to recover for injuries caused by an altercation with the librarian. The U.S. District Court denied a summary judgment motion by the librarian and supervisor, and they appealed. The court of appeals, reversing and remanding, found that the prison librarian did not commit cruel and unusual punishment by throwing keys at the inmate, putting her hands on his face, and flailing her arms at his head. The amount of force used was de minimis, and the librarian's behavior was not repugnant, diabolic, or inhuman. (Missouri State Penitentiary)

U.S. Appeals Court
HARASSMENT
USE OF FORCE

Wilkins v. Moore, 40 F.3d 954 (8th Cir. 1994). Prison guards appealed the denial by the U.S. District Court of the guards' motion for summary judgment in a civil rights action brought by a prisoner against them. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the jury could draw reliable inferences as to whether the prison guards' use of force on the prisoner could have been thought to be necessary, or instead exceeded the amount of force that was justified under the circumstances. The prison guards were not entitled to a defense of qualified immunity on a deprivation of clothing claim. The prison guards placed the inmate naked in a strip cell for 22 hours, where the guards allegedly verbally and physically abused the inmate continuously. The district court determined that the inmate's assault claim against the guards was a fact issue for trial, and the prison guards did not appeal this determination. (Potosi Correctional Center, Missouri)

U.S. Appeals Court
RESTRAINTS

Williams v. Vidor, 17 F.3d 857 (6th Cir. 1994). An inmate brought a civil rights action against a prison officer and deputy warden alleging that he was subject to cruel and unusual punishment and denied his right to equal protection when he was shackled to his bed for 73 hours. The U.S. District Court granted summary judgment for the officer and deputy warden, and the inmate appealed. The appeals court, affirming in part, reversing in part and remanding, found that the officer who carried out the order to place the inmate in shackles had qualified immunity. He did not make the decision to place the inmate in restraints nor to keep them on for any particular period of time, and he did carry out his duty to check on the inmate periodically. However, genuine issues of material fact existed as to whether the deputy warden was responsible for maintaining the inmate in shackles for 73 hours, precluding summary judgment. (Ionia Maximum Correctional Facility, Michigan)

U.S. District Court
CELLS
SANITATION
TEMPERATURE

Wilson v. Schomig, 863 F.Supp. 789 (N.D. Ill. 1994). A prisoner brought a civil rights action against prison officials based on alleged violations of the Eighth Amendment. The district court found that the inmate's claims that his cell contained dirt, dust, and roaches, and that the ceiling leaked during rainstorms did not allege conditions sufficiently serious to violate the objective standard of cruel and unusual punishment and did not state a claim based on the Eighth Amendment. However, the prison officials were not entitled to qualified immunity from the inmate's claim that they failed to clean up or allowed him to clean up human feces from his cell and a claim that the temperature in his cell fell below freezing during three days in January. (Stateville Correctional Center, Joliet, Illinois)

1995

U.S. District Court
THREATS

Arce v. Banks, 913 F.Supp. 307 (S.D.N.Y. 1996). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against a prison nurse, alleging that she violated his First and Eighth Amendment rights by yelling at him and threatening to punish him when he was discussing upcoming surgery. The defendant moved for dismissal and the court granted the motion. The incident occurred when the inmate was discussing the method to be used to remove a cyst-like growth from his forehead with the surgeon. The inmate claimed that the defendant became angry at him when he questioned the surgeon about the procedure, that she yelled at him and told him "you have no business coming here to ask questions on how the surgery will be perform [sic] by the surgeon." The inmate asked for $500,000 in monetary damages and reasonable attorney fees. The court found that the allegations did not rise to the level of a First Amendment violation, that the inmate's health condition was not sufficiently serious to form the basis of an Eighth Amendment claim, and that the nurse was entitled to qualified immunity. (Fishkill Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
CONDITIONS
MEDICAL CARE

Aswegan v. Henry, 49 F.3d 461 (8th Cir. 1995). A prisoner sued prison officials for alleged violation of the Eighth Amendment based on aggravation of his asthma which allegedly resulted from his being placed in a small shower stall during cell shakedown. The U.S. District Court granted an injunction for the prisoner, and the prison officials appealed. The appeals court, reversing the decision, found that the prisoner's bare assertion that being placed in the stall during cell shakedowns aggravated his asthma was insufficient to support a claim that being placed in the stall was a violation of his rights under the Eighth Amendment. The appeals court found that even if prison officials were aware of the inmate's various medical complaints, evidence presented no objective reason for them to believe that confinement in the shower stall during a cell shakedown would aggravate his breathing problems. On consultation with prison medical personnel, officials were told that the inmate had no medical need to avoid that type of confinement. (Iowa State Penitentiary, Fort Madison, Iowa)

U.S. District Court
CLOTHING
READING MATERIALS
WORK

Campbell-El v. District of Columbia, 881 F.Supp. 42 (D.D.C. 1995). A prisoner brought a civil rights action against prison officials, alleging violation of his Eighth Amendment rights. The district court found that the prisoner's allegation that his access to reading materials was severely restricted while he was incarcerated, that he received inappropriate winter clothing for his one hour period of outdoor recreation and that he was not allowed to engage in work was insufficient to state a claim for cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth Amendment, absent a showing of the extent and severity of the alleged deprivations. (Maximum Security Facility at Lorton, District of Columbia)

U.S. District Court
MEDICAL CARE

Coleman v. Wilson, 912 F.Supp. 1282 (E.D.Cal. 1995). Inmates challenged the adequacy of mental health care provided at institutions operated by the California Department of Corrections, alleging that the inadequacies were cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The district court reviewed the findings and recommendations of the chief magistrate judge after objections were filed by the defendants. The court found that evidence supported the magistrate's findings and recommendations regarding many aspects of the Department's mental health services, and ordered that a special master be appointed to monitor the Department's compliance with court-ordered injunctive relief. The court found that there were six components of a minimally-adequate prison mental health care delivery system under the Eighth Amendment: (1) a systematic program for screening and evaluating inmates to identify those in need of mental health care; (2) a treatment program that involves more than segregation and close supervision of mentally ill inmates; (3) employment of a sufficient number of trained mental health professionals; (4) maintenance of accurate, complete and confidential mental health treatment records; (5) the administration of psychotropic medication only with appropriate supervision and periodic evaluation; and (6) a basic program to identify, treat and supervise inmates at risk for suicide. The court found that evidence supported findings of deficiencies in all of these areas. The Department's mental illness screening procedures were based on self-reporting, use of records of prior hospitalization and/or past or current use of psychotropic medications, exhibition of bizarre behavior, and requests for care. The court found these procedures were used haphazardly and depended for efficacy on incomplete or nonexistent medical records, or observations of custodial staff who were inadequately trained to recognize the signs and symptoms of mental illness. The court found that medication management for mentally ill inmates was constitutionally deficient because: computers were not networked preventing inmate medication to be tracked when an inmate was transferred; some inmates were receiving timely medication and appropriate monitoring while others were not; and some medications that were effective in the treatment of serious mental disorders were not available. The court found deficiencies with the medical records maintained by the Department, including: disorganized, untimely and incomplete filing of medical records; incomplete or nonexistent treatment plans; and failure to send medical records with inmates when they were transferred. The court noted that it was the Department's responsibility to take reasonable steps to implement policies that would aid in obtaining medical information from counties from which inmates were transferred. The court found that policies and practices regarding the housing of mentally ill inmates in administrative segregation and segregated housing units (SHU) violated the Eighth Amendment rights of those inmates. Evidence supported the finding that regulations providing for case review and psychological assessment of segregated inmates had little or no effect on actual practices. (California Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
CELLS
FOOD

Demaio v. Mann, 877 F.Supp. 89 (N.D.N.Y. 1995). An inmate brought a Section 1983 action against officials at a New York correctional facility. On cross-motions for summary judgment, the district court found that the inmate had no protected liberty interest in confinement in an unshielded cell. The addition of a plexiglass shield to the cell did not inflict cruel and unusual punishment on the inmate where the shield did not interfere with the air circulation and the cell was, in all other respects, identical to the standard cell in which the inmate had been previously housed. The court found that a genuine issue of material fact precluded summary judgment on the issue of whether deprivation of the inmate's food was "sufficiently serious" to trigger Eighth Amendment concerns based on evidence that the inmate spit on a correction officer and that after the spitting incident correction officers deprived the inmate of his meals for two days. (Shawangunk Correctional Facility, New York)

- U.S. District Court
PLUMBING
SANITATION
TOILETS
TOTALITY OF CONDITIONS
- Geder v. Godinez, 875 F.Supp. 1334 (N.D. Ill. 1995). A prisoner brought a civil rights action against several prison officials alleging cruel and unusual conditions of confinement. On a motion by the defendants for summary judgment, the district court found that prison conditions, including the alleged presence of defective pipes, sinks and toilets, improperly cleaned showers, a broken intercom system, stained mattresses, accumulated dust and dirt, and infestation by roaches and rats, viewed separately or cumulatively, were insufficient to establish deprivation of human need sufficient to constitute a violation of the Eighth Amendment. No violation was shown absent a showing that prison officials knew of and consciously disregarded an excessive risk to inmates' health or safety. Prison conditions are not unconstitutional under the Eighth Amendment simply because they are restrictive or harsh. (Stateville Correctional Center, Joliet, Illinois)
- U.S. Appeals Court
CAPITAL
PUNISHMENT
- Ingram v. Ault, 50 F.3d 898 (11th Cir. 1995). A death row inmate brought a civil rights action alleging that execution by electrocution violated the Eighth Amendment. The U.S. District Court denied the inmate's motion for a temporary restraining order and the inmate appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the death row inmate was not entitled to a temporary restraining order because he failed to demonstrate the substantial likelihood of success on the merits of his claim that electrocution was cruel and unusual punishment. (Georgia Diagnostic & Classification Center, Jackson, Georgia)
- U.S. Supreme Court
CAPITAL
PUNISHMENT
- Lackey v. Texas, 115 S.Ct. 1421 (1995). A petitioner raised the question of whether executing a prisoner who had already spent 17 years on death row violates the Eighth Amendment's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment. A petition for a writ of certiorari was denied. The U.S. Supreme Court noted that, although the importance and novelty of the question presented by this certiorari petition were sufficient to warrant a review by the Court, those factors also provided a principled basis for postponing consideration of the issue until after it has been addressed by other courts. The Court also noted that a denial of certiorari does not constitute a ruling on the merits. Often, a denial of certiorari on a novel issue will permit the state and federal courts to "serve as laboratories in which the issue receives further study before it is addressed by the Supreme Court." (Texas)
- U.S. Appeals Court
FAILURE TO PROTECT
- MacKay v. Farnsworth, 48 F.3d 491 (10th Cir. 1995). A prison inmate brought a Section 1983 action against prison guards, alleging that they violated his Eighth Amendment right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment by not physically intervening in a fight between him and another inmate. The U.S. District Court granted the guards' motion for summary judgment and the inmate appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the requisite mental state in the prisoner's Section 1983 action alleging that prison officials did not respond with physical use of force to protect the inmate from harm by another inmate was that of deliberate indifference, rather than that of malicious and sadistic. In addition, there was no "deliberate indifference" on the part of prison officials who failed to physically intervene in the fight between the plaintiff inmate and another inmate who had a weapon and, thus, the plaintiff could not recover under Section 1983. The guards were successful in attempting to break up the fight verbally. The guards observed that the plaintiff and other inmate were evenly matched and that the other inmate's weapon was ineffective, and the guards called for additional staff and medical personnel and thus were preparing to intervene once sufficient staff were available in accordance with prison policy. (Utah State Prison)
- U.S. District Court
CLOTHING
FAILURE TO PROTECT
MEDICAL CARE
- McCorkle v. Walker, 871 F.Supp. 555 (N.D.N.Y. 1995). An inmate brought a civil rights action against various prison officials alleging violation of the Eighth Amendment. The district court found that the Eighth Amendment prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment was not violated either by the inmate's alleged lack of a change of underwear for 15 days or the failure to transfer the inmate after psychiatric personnel employed by the Office of Mental Health suggested that a transfer might reduce some of the inmate's stress. In addition, there was no violation of the Eighth Amendment prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment in the exposure of the inmate to tuberculosis (TB), allegedly while working in the prison infirmary. Prison officials demonstrated that they responded reasonably to the exposure, and it was undisputed that the inmate had not suffered, and was unlikely to ever suffer, an active case of TB. (Auburn Correctional Facility, New York)
- U.S. District Court
BEDDING
TEMPERATURE
- Maguire v. Coughlin, 901 F.Supp. 101 (N.D.N.Y. 1995). A former inmate sued corrections officials to recover for alleged verbal and physical abuse, inadequate cell conditions, and transfers. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants, in part, and denied it in part. The court found that the alleged verbal and physical abuse was not cruel and unusual punishment since officers did not apply force maliciously and sadistically to cause harm and did not use more than de minimus force. The court found that questions of fact precluded summary judgment on the claim that the former inmate's confinement in a cell without bed linens violated the Eighth Amendment. Because an inmate's Eighth Amendment right to adequate cell conditions was clearly established at the time of the alleged violations, the court held that the defendants were not entitled to qualified immunity. (Downstate Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
FIRE SAFETY
PLUMBING
SANITATION

Masonoff v. DuBois, 899 F.Supp. 782 (D.Mass. 1995). Prison inmates filed a class action suit against prison officials alleging that conditions of confinement violated their rights under the Eighth Amendment. The district court granted summary judgment, in part, for the inmates. The court found that the use of chemical toilets violated the Eighth Amendment rights of the inmates where the use and emptying of the toilets resulted in extremely unsanitary conditions, the toilets caused an unbearable stench, and prison inmates suffered numerous health problems caused by the use of toilets including nausea, burns, and rashes. The court also found that there were genuine issues of material fact as to whether prison officials acted with deliberate indifference regarding chemical toilets, precluding summary judgment. The court denied summary judgment for the prison officials with regard to fire safety issues raised by the inmates. Inmates alleged fire hazards caused by the lack of a functioning sprinkler system and the lack of automatic locks on cell doors, which are required by a state building code. Prison officials responded that the facility had implemented a rigorous fire safety program which mitigated any dangers imposed by these deficiencies. The court noted that while it may look to state codes in its effort to determine society's standard of decency, such standards do not necessarily reflect constitutional minima. The court found that the inmates' assertion that their exposure to asbestos fibers causes cancer stated a cognizable Eighth Amendment claim, precluding summary judgment. The court held that genuine issues of material fact precluded summary judgment on the allegation that pest or vermin infestation created inadequate sanitation in violation the Eighth Amendment. The court noted that infestation of vermin such as rats, mice, birds, and cockroaches in the prison is inconsistent with adequate levels of sanitation required by the Eighth Amendment. (Southeast Correctional Center, Massachusetts)

U.S. Appeals Court
SAFETY
SANITATION

Morrisette v. Peters, 45 F.3d 1119 (7th Cir. 1995). An inmate sued a prison and prison officials for violations of Section 1983 based on confinement stemming from alleged drug possession in prison. The U.S. District Court granted summary judgment to the defendants and the inmate appealed. The appeals court found that the prison officials could not be liable under the Eighth Amendment for denying humane conditions of confinement absent a showing that the officials were even remotely aware of the alleged unsanitary conditions in the cell in which the inmate was confined. Even if the guards were aware of the exposed wires in the cell and failed to fix the problem during the inmate's brief stay in controlled segregation, the guards were only guilty of negligence which would not support an Eighth Amendment claim. (Pontiac Correctional Facility, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
CONDITIONS
FIRE SAFETY

Nettles v. Griffith, 883 F.Supp. 136 (E.D. Tex. 1995). A prisoner who was placed in administrative segregation without a hearing and was injured when he exited his cell after it was set on fire, brought a Section 1983 action against the county sheriff and other officials. The district court found that the assignment of the prisoner to administrative segregation in a section of the jail designed primarily for the mentally imbalanced did not violate the Eighth Amendment's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment. Although the prisoner was injured when exiting his cell after it was set on fire by other prisoners, no jail official perceived that the prisoner was subject to a serious risk of harm from fire, since fires were ubiquitous in the jail and had not previously caused serious injuries. (Jefferson County Detention Center, Beaumont, Texas)

U.S. Appeals Court
MEDICAL CARE
USE OF FORCE

Sheldon v. C/O Pezley, 49 F.3d 1312 (8th Cir. 1995). A state prisoner sued corrections officers alleging that he had been subjected to cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The complaint was dismissed by the U.S. District Court and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court, affirming the decision, found that the inmate failed to show that he was subjected to cruel and unusual punishment by the failure to provide medical care after his wrist was allegedly injured during the forced return to his cell from the shower area. The inmate was immediately asked whether he wanted medical assistance and the only reason he did not receive it was that he refused to be handcuffed for transfer to an area where a nurse would have better light to examine him. The nerve inflammation allegedly suffered was not so obvious that a layperson would easily recognize the necessity for a doctor's care, and the inmate could have gone on sick call at any time. He waited 12 days before doing so and then was seen four times in the infirmary. The court found that the use of a "pain compliance hold" on the inmate, without actual application of force, was justified to maintain order in the institution and to maintain the safety of prison personnel and inmates during a strip search, after the inmate refused a direct order to return to his cell from the shower area. The use of force did not constitute an infliction of cruel and unusual punishment. (Iowa State Penitentiary)

U.S. District Court
CONDITIONS
SANITATION
VENTILATION
CLOTHING
EXERCISE

Stone-El v. Sheahan, 914 F.Supp. 202 (N.D.Ill. 1995). A pretrial detainee brought a civil rights suit against a sheriff, the executive director of a county department of corrections, and a jail superintendent, in their official and individual capacities, alleging violation of his due process rights. The district court dismissed the suit, finding that the detainee failed to allege that the defendants personally caused the conditions at the jail, as required for the imposition of individual capacity liability. The court found that the officials could not limit the number of pretrial detainees assigned to the jail, nor appropriate funds to improve conditions, and it was not alleged that they intentionally withheld available resources that could have improved conditions. The court found that even dramatic restrictions on outdoor exercise do not violate a detainee's due process rights as long as the detainee has ample opportunity for indoor activity. The detainee had alleged that vermin infested the jail, but the court found that keeping vermin under control in jails is a monumental task, and absent deliberate indifference, such conditions do not violate due process. Because the detainee failed to allege any harm caused by alleged poor ventilation, he failed to allege conditions serious enough to violate his due process rights. The court similarly found that the detainee's allegations fell short in the areas of excessive noise, floor-sleeping, hygiene items, sanitation, and security. (Cook County Jail, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
CROWDING FLOOR-SLEEPING FOOD
HYGIENE
MEDICAL CARE
SANITATION

Summers v. Sheahan, 883 F.Supp. 1163 (N.D. Ill. 1995). An inmate brought a pro se action against prison officials seeking compensatory and punitive damages for alleged violations of his constitutional rights. On the defendant officials' motion to dismiss, the district court found that the inmate's allegation that he contracted bronchitis because he did not receive his heart medicine failed to state a claim under the Eighth Amendment, absent an allegation that officials were aware of his condition or that they intentionally withheld his medication. The court found that the failure of the Department of Corrections to authorize the inmate's overnight stay at a county hospital did not amount to a constitutional violation, as the inmate was placed in the Department's hospital facility where he was observed overnight as recommended by the county physician. Absent allegations that the inmate, who was allegedly forced to sleep on cold floors for approximately two months, was placed in a cold cell for the purpose of punishment rather than as an inevitable consequence of overcrowding, the two-month period alleged had to be viewed as merely a "temporary inconvenience" which did not violate the inmate's Eighth Amendment rights. The court also found that although the alleged provision of vermin-infested food to the inmate rose to a level of a constitutional infraction, the inmate's indication that prison officials were "responsible" for a policy regarding all the conditions alleged in the complaint was insufficient to infer deliberate indifference on the part of the officials. The inmate's claim that he was forced to stay in an unsanitary, germ and bacteria-filled environment and that showers were filthy and clogged up failed to state a claim for a violation of the Eighth Amendment. The inmate's claim that he filed a grievance requesting to speak to a paramedic concerning his heart medication and diet and he did not obtain a response, would not support an inference that officials knew of and disregarded an excessive risk to the health and safety of the inmate. (Cook County Department of Corrections, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
DISCIPLINE
FOOD

Williams v. Coughlin, 875 F.Supp. 1004 (W.D.N.Y. 1995). A prison inmate sued a prison and officials under Section 1983 for a violation of the Eighth Amendment as a result of deprivation of food as punishment for a disciplinary infraction (refusal to return food trays). The district court found that there were genuine issues of material fact, precluding summary judgment for either the prisoner or the prison officials, as to whether deprivation of five consecutive meals over a period of two days was sufficiently serious to support a claim of Eighth Amendment violation. (Southport Correctional Facility, New York)

1996

U.S. District Court
SMOKE
SMOKE-FREE
ENVIRONMENT

Crowder v. Kelly, 928 F.Supp. 2 (D.D.C. 1996). Inmates who were nonsmokers brought an action against prison officials alleging they were subjected to high levels of environmental tobacco smoke (ETS) in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The district court granted the inmates' motion for a preliminary injunction, finding that the inmates were likely to succeed on their claim and that they would suffer irreparable injury if their exposure to ETS was not enjoined. The inmates had described a pattern of disregard for the prison's non-smoking policy by both the prison population and the corrections department. According to the court, evidence indicated that the inmates' involuntary exposure to ETS could have both long-term and short-term effects on their health, including coughing, chest discomfort, phlegm production and elevated risk of lung cancer and heart disease. (District of Columbia, Lorton Correctional Complex, Virginia)

U.S. District Court
CLOTHING

Davidson v. Coughlin, 920 F.Supp. 305 (N.D.N.Y. 1996). A state prison inmate filed a § 1983 action against prison officials alleging conditions that violated the Eighth Amendment. The court found that summary judgment for the defendants was precluded on the inmate's claim that prison officials failed to provide him with adequate winter clothing. The officials alleged that the inmate was provided with the clothing mandated by state corrections directives; the inmate alleged that they failed to provide inmates with various items of clothing, including winter underwear, winter boots or galoshes, sweaters, gloves, scarves and wool socks. The inmate alleged that some of these items were available for purchase only. (Auburn Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
DOUBLE-CELLING

El Tabech v. Gunter, 922 F.Supp. 244 (D.Neb. 1996). Inmates sued corrections officials alleging that the practice of double celling inmates with random cell assignment violated the Eighth Amendment. The district court ordered remedial measures and the officials appealed; the appeals court remanded the case for certification of findings. On remand, the district court held that evidence was sufficient to find that prison officials actually knew of and disregarded the substantial risk to the safety of inmates posed by making random double cell assignments without the use of classification information and without determining inmate compatibility.

The court noted that evidence supported the conclusion that the level of violence at the penitentiary, including violence in double cells, posed a substantial risk of harm to inmates. The court found that remedial measures, such as cell moves, protective custody, or posting staff on a gallery, did not render the decision not to use classification information reasonable. The court found that evidence established that wardens were personally responsible for the failure to use classification information before making cell assignments. (Nebraska State Penitentiary)

U.S. Appeals Court
TEMPERATURE
SANITATION
VENTILATION

Isby v. Clark, 100 F.3d 502 (7th Cir. 1996). An inmate filed a § 1983 action alleging violation of the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments, alleging that conditions of his restrictive segregation constituted cruel and unusual punishment, and that his transfer to the unit violated his due process rights. The district court entered judgment in favor of the defendant, but the appeals court remanded the case, finding the need for the district court to enter more precise findings on contested issues about alleged inhumane conditions as to temperature, sanitation and ventilation. The appeals court also found that the inmate's transfer to the more restrictive unit without prior notice or hearings did not violate his procedural due process rights. (Indiana State Prison, Michigan City)

U.S. Appeals Court
NOISE
VENTILATION
LIGHTING
TEMPERATURE
HARASSMENT

Keenan v. Hall, 83 F.3d 1083 (9th Cir. 1996). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against prison officials and employees. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part and reversed in part, finding that summary judgment was precluded for several allegations. The appeals court found that a disputed issue of material fact as to noise in the prison--whether there was constant yelling, screaming and banging--precluded summary judgment. The court also found that allegations that the prison had inadequate ventilation and air flow might state a claim for cruel and unusual punishment if the conditions undermine the health of inmates and the sanitation of the prison. The court found that material issues of fact as to allegations that food was spoiled and water was foul precluded summary judgment. Confinement in a 54 square foot cell did not violate the inmate's right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment. Although the average temperature of the inmate's cell tended to be either well above or well below room temperature, the inmate's constitutional rights were not violated. The court ruled that the practice of requiring inmates to live in constant illumination results in unconstitutional physical and psychological harm. (Oregon State Prison)

U.S. District Court
MEDICAL CARE
SMOKE

Little v. Lycoming County, 912 F.Supp. 809 (M.D.Pa. 1996). A female inmate brought a § 1983 action against county officials and staff asserting claims under the Eighth Amendment and the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA). The district court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment. The court dismissed the inmate's claim of cruel and unusual punishment due to exposure of the inmate to excessive levels of environmental tobacco smoke (ETS), noting that the inmate's single reported instance of congestion and coughing allegedly due to ETS was insufficient to trigger constitutional liability. The court ruled that the Americans with Disabilities Act is not applicable to facilities provided for prisoners in state prisons, granting county prison officials and medical staff qualified immunity from the inmate's claims because the right of inmates to protection was not clearly established at the time of the alleged injury. The court also found that the inmate's alleged knee and arthritic impairment was not "substantial" within the meaning of the Act, and that there was no record of complaints from the inmate about difficulty in using stairs. The court found that the prison complied with the requirements of the Eighth Amendment through its considerable and diligent efforts to address the inmate's multiple, almost daily medical problems and concerns. (Lycoming County Prison, Pennsylvania)

U.S. District Court
PLUMBING
TOILETS

Neal v. Clark, 938 F.Supp. 484 (N.D.Ill. 1996). A prisoner brought a § 1983 action against prison officials alleging violation of his Eighth Amendment rights as the result of his conditions of confinement. The district court held that the prisoner's conditions of confinement in his segregation cell were not sufficient to support an Eighth Amendment violation. The prisoner complained that during his 20-day confinement in a segregation cell there was no hot water and the toilet ran constantly and did not flush properly. (Joliet Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
DISCIPLINE
CLOTHING
EXERCISE
BEDDING

O'Leary v. Iowa State Men's Reformatory, 79 F.3d 82 (8th Cir. 1996). Iowa inmates who were placed in a progressive four-day behavior management program filed suit under § 1983 alleging cruel and unusual punishment. The district court entered judgment for the defendants and the inmates appealed. The appeals court affirmed the lower court decision, finding that the inmates were not denied the minimal civilized measures of life's necessities. The court also found that there was no showing that prison officials were deliberately indifferent to an excessive risk to inmate health or safety. The inmates had received disciplinary reports and were placed in the behavior management program. On the first day of the program prisoners are deprived of underwear, blankets, mattresses, exercise and visits; prisoners are provided with normal diets, sanitation and hygiene supplies, and they may read their mail but they may not retain it. On the second and following days prisoners gradually regain the deprived items--as long as they demonstrate satisfactory behavior. (Iowa State Men's Reformatory)

U.S. Appeals Court
SMOKE-FREE
ENVIRONMENT

Oliver v. Deen, 77 F.3d 156 (7th Cir. 1996). A state prison inmate sued prison officials seeking damages for alleged violation of his Eighth Amendment rights by housing him with smoking cellmates. The district court entered summary judgment in favor of the defendants and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the inmate failed to demonstrate that he had a sufficiently serious medical need to implicate the Eighth Amendment or to provide the basis for an award of damages. The court noted that while the inmate was asthmatic and showed signs of discomfort and the prison doctor issued a permit to the inmate to have a nonsmoking cellmate, the inmate's medical records showed that his asthma was mild, that he never required outside hospitalization, and the only evidence of a causal relationship between smoke and the inmate's discomfort was a few general news articles which indicated that smoke could aggravate an asthmatic condition. (Pontiac Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
PROTECTIVE CUSTODY
DOUBLE CELLING
FAILURE TO PROTECT
WORK
RESTRAINTS

Nami v. Fauver, 82 F.3d 63 (3rd Cir. 1996). Inmates who were housed under protective custody at a youth correctional facility brought a § 1983 action against corrections officials, alleging they were subjected to cruel and unusual punishment and were denied access to courts. The district court dismissed the complaint and the inmates appealed. The appeals court reversed the lower court decision, finding that allegations were sufficient to state claims for cruel and unusual punishment and denial of access to courts. The inmates alleged that double celling of inmates in the housing unit resulted in increased assaults and psychological stress, that unit inmates were required to spend 24 hours a day in their cells except for limited time for out of cell recreation, visits and job assignments. They also alleged that inmates in the general population had more out of cell recreation time. The inmates alleged that their access to drug and alcohol programs, as well as jobs and educational programs, was more restricted. Unit inmates were also required to wear a painful device when transported to other locations. The inmates had written to prison administrators about each of the matters set forth in their complaint. (Wagner Youth Correctional Facility, New Jersey)

U.S. Appeals Court
TOILETS
SANITATION
TEMPERATURE

Tokar v. Armontrout, 97 F.3d 1078 (8th Cir. 1996). A former inmate infected with the HIV virus brought a § 1983 action against former prison officials claiming that conditions in the segregation unit for HIV-positive inmates constituted cruel and unusual punishment and that his placement in the unit violated his right to privacy. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the officials and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the former inmate failed to show that the combination of broken windows and leaking roof in his housing unit caused a deprivation of an essential human need such as food, warmth or exercise; the inmate's cubicle did not have a window and the roof above his cubicle did not leak, and the inmate was able to use a blanket to stay warm before broken windows in the unit were repaired. The court also found that the inmate failed to establish that the alleged filthiness of toilet facilities in the housing unit violated the Eighth Amendment, noting that the inmate admitted that he had never asked for cleaning supplies. The appeals court held that the officials were entitled to qualified immunity with regard to the inmate's claim for violation of his right to privacy. The court noted that the inmate did not have a clearly established right to nondisclosure of his HIV status at the time he was segregated. (Jefferson City Correctional Center, Missouri)

U.S. District Court
SMOKE-FREE
ENVIRONMENT

Warren v. Keane, 937 F.Supp. 301 (S.D.N.Y. 1996). Prisoners brought a § 1983 action against prison officials alleging that their exposure to environmental tobacco smoke (ETS) violated their Eighth Amendment rights. The district court denied the defendants' motion for summary judgment, finding a fact question as to whether the level of smoke permeating the prison was so severe as to be a danger to the health of prisoners. The court also found that a fact question as to whether a prison corrections officer and fire and safety officer were entitled to qualified immunity precluded summary judgment. The court ruled that supervisors did not have qualified immunity because they were chargeable with the knowledge of the conditions of the prison and with the knowledge that second-hand smoke could cause serious health problems. The prisoners alleged that smoke permeated the facility due to underenforcement, inadequate smoking rules, overcrowding, and poor ventilation. (Ossining State Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
CLOTHING

Young v. Berks County Prison, 940 F.Supp. 121 (E.D.Pa. 1996). An inmate filed a § 1983 claim alleging that his conditions of confinement amounted to cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants, finding that the deprivation suffered by the inmate, who was often forced to wear ill-fitting and dirty, torn clothes, was not sufficiently serious to be of a constitutional dimension. The inmate was five feet, eleven inches tall and weighed approximately 300 pounds when he was admitted to the prison. He required size 4X pants and shirts, and he was consistently unable to receive a suitable standard issue of two sets of clothing. The prison did not have enough clothes large enough in stock and had particular difficulty supplying the inmate with pants. The prison permitted the inmate to do his own wash so that he would always have a set of clean clothes. The court noted that the inmate was no doubt caused substantial inconvenience and discomfort, but this did not rise to the level of a constitutional violation. (Berks County Prison, Pennsylvania)

U.S. District Court
MEDICAL CARE
TEMPERATURE
CLOTHING

Young v. Breeding, 929 F.Supp. 1103 (N.D.Ill. 1996). An inmate brought an action against correctional officers, a warden, a nurse and a physician, alleging violation of his constitutional rights. The district court found that the inmate stated a claim against the nurse and correctional officers who allegedly refused to provide him with medical attention during an asthma attack, and against a warden who allegedly ordered the transfer of the inmate to a psychiatric center. The court also found that the inmate stated an Eighth Amendment claim regarding his confinement in a hospital unit's strip cell for approximately 20 days, where he was stripped and forced to endure the cold temperature of his cell and had to wrap himself in toilet paper to stay warm. The court found that the inmate stated a claim against a physician who allegedly forcibly medicated the inmate against his will each time the inmate requested to be released from the strip cell. Officers allegedly sprayed the inmate with mace and refused to provide him with medical attention. (Joliet Correctional Center, Illinois)

1997

U.S. District Court
SMOKE-FREE
ENVIRONMENT
ADA-Americans with Disabilities Act

Boblett v. Angelone, 957 F.Supp. 808 (W.D.Va. 1997). An inmate filed a pro se § 1983 action against prison officials alleging constitutionally inadequate treatment for his knee problems and exposure to environmental tobacco smoke (ETS). The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court found that the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) did not apply to state prisons and that prison officials' alleged denial of proper rehabilitative therapy and knee braces did not amount to deliberate indifference. The court also found that the officials' refusal to assign the inmate to a nonsmoking dormitory and to assign him to a bottom bunk did not violate his constitutional rights. According to the court, the inmate failed to establish that the level of environmental tobacco smoke (ETS) to which he was exposed for a four-day period had created an unreasonable risk of serious damage to his future health. Although a prison physician did not examine the inmate until approximately one month after the inmate requested to see a physician, the court found nothing in the record to suggest that the delay stemmed from any deliberate indifference on the part of the physician or any other prison official. The court also found that the failure of prison officials to arrange for the inmate's immediate consultation with a prison physician regarding the inmate's request for a medical transfer did not amount to deliberate indifference. (Bland Correctional Center, Virginia)

U.S. District Court
EXERCISE

Davidson v. Coughlin, III, 968 F.Supp. 121 (S.D.N.Y. 1997). A state prisoner brought § 1983 actions against corrections officials alleging constitutional violations as the result of depriving him of outdoor exercise. The district court held that the inmate's rights were not violated when officials failed to provide the inmate at least one hour a day of outdoor exercise for several days during a 30-day period. The court also found that the prisoner was provided more than the amount of exercise required by the Eighth Amendment during a 4½ month period of segregation because deprivations were of limited duration and the inmate was allowed to participate in other out-of-cell activities and had opportunities for in-cell exercise. (Green Haven Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
USE OF FORCE
SANITATION

Dennis v. Thurman, 959 F.Supp. 1253 (C.D.Cal. 1997). An inmate proceeding pro se and in forma pauperis brought an action against 36 prison officials alleging constitutional violations because he was deprived of water for 36 hours. He also challenged the force used to extract him from his cell and alleged inadequate and untimely medical care for injuries he sustained during the cell extraction. The district court held that prison officials did not use excessive force in removing the inmate from his cell. The officials had used a block gun, which shot rubber blocks at a high velocity. The court found that no official acted maliciously or sadistically for the purpose of causing the inmate pain, and the cell extraction was necessary to allow a search which was conducted in response to a plan to kill a correctional officer. The court found that even if the inmate was without water for 36 hours during a search of his cell block, there was no Eighth Amendment violation. In the past, the inmate had used water to flood the cell block, creating a dangerous condition for both prison officials and other inmates. (California State Prison-Los Angeles County)

U.S. Appeals Court
CLOTHING
BEDDING
TEMPERATURE
VENTILATION

Dixon v. Godinez, 114 F.3d 640 (7th Cir. 1997). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against prison officials alleging that conditions of his confinement in protective custody violated the Eighth Amendment. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the officials and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part and reversed and remanded in part. The appeals court held that poor ventilation in the inmate's cell during the summer did not violate the Eighth Amendment, as the cell had a window which opened and an electric fan, and a small "chuckhole" in the door which provided some cross-ventilation. The prisoner's claims that the rank air in the cell exposed him to diseases and caused respiratory problems was not backed by medical or scientific sources. The appeals court found that summary judgment was precluded by issues of fact as to whether clothes and bedding provided to the prisoner adequately protected him from cold temperatures in his cell in the winter. The court noted that to determine whether low temperatures in the cell violated the prisoner's Eighth Amendment rights, the court should examine such factors as the severity of the cold, its duration, whether the prisoner has an alternative means to protect himself from cold, the adequacy of such alternatives, and whether the prisoner must endure other uncomfortable conditions as well as cold. (Stateville Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
THREATS

Harris v. Lord, 957 F.Supp. 471 (S.D.N.Y. 1997). A Muslim inmate brought a § 1983 action against correctional officers after she was denied permission to attend a weekly religious service and when she did not obtain immediate mental health services. The district court found that the section of the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) that denied an inmate a civil action for mental or emotional injury without a showing of physical injury did not apply retroactively. The court held that a prison official's verbal threats to an inmate do not violate due process unless accompanied by physical force or the present ability to effectuate the threat. The inmate was on her way to attend the religious service when an officer ordered her back to the recreation yard. When the inmate asked the officer why she could not attend her religious service the officer allegedly responded with obscenities. The inmate returned to her housing unit and requested to be seen by someone in the mental health department because she "was unstable" after her exchange with the officer and needed to "calm down." (Bedford Hills Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
DISCIPLINE
SEGREGATION

Leslie v. Doyle, 125 F.3d 1132 (7th Cir. 1997). A state prison inmate brought a civil rights action against corrections officials alleging he was placed in disciplinary segregation as the result of baseless charges filed by a prison guard. The district entered judgment in favor of the officials and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court found that the inmate's confinement in disciplinary segregation for 15 days was not sufficiently serious to be considered cruel and unusual punishment for Eighth Amendment purposes--even if the inmate had not committed the charged offense. The court also found that placing the inmate in disciplinary segregation for 15 days based on unfounded charges did not violate due process. According to the appeals court, "This case raises disturbing questions about the nature and extent of the constitutional rights that protect state prisoners from the arbitrary and arguably lawless acts of state prison officials." The inmate was exonerated by a prison administrative board of charges that he was insolent, but this exoneration occurred well after the inmate had served his 15-day term in disciplinary segregation. (Joliet Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
MEDICAL CARE

Maggert v. Hanks, 131 F.3d 670 (7th Cir. 1997). A prisoner brought an action alleging that a prison's failure to give him estrogen therapy for gender dysphoria was a form of cruel and unusual punishment. The district court dismissed the suit and the appeals court affirmed, finding that except in special circumstances, the Eighth Amendment does not entitle a prison inmate to curative treatment--such as a sex-change operation--for the psychiatric condition of gender dysphoria. The prison had offered the expert testimony of a psychiatrist who believed that the prisoner did not have gender dysphoria, which was not refuted by the prisoner. (Indiana)

U.S. District Court
TEMPERATURE

Mitchell v. Shomig, 969 F.Supp. 487 (N.D.Ill. 1997). A pro se inmate brought an action against prison officials alleging violation of his Eighth Amendment rights by exposing him to extreme cold while he was confined in a segregation cell. The district court found that the inmate's claim that officials exposed him to temperatures ranging from 32 to 50 degrees or less for an extended period asserted the existence of conditions sufficiently objectively harsh to state a claim for cruel and unusual punishment. The inmate attributed the lack of heat to the placement of his cell at the end of a gallery and improperly installed windows that allowed cold air to blow into the cell. The court refused to apply the exhaustion of administrative remedies requirement imposed by the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA). (Stateville Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
LETHAL INJECTION

Poland v. Stewart, 117 F.3d 1094 (9th Cir. 1997). A petitioner sought habeas corpus relief from his murder conviction and death sentence. The district court denied relief and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court held that the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act (AEDPA) did not apply to habeas corpus cases filed before the Act's effective date. The court also ruled that execution by lethal injection was not shown to be cruel and unusual punishment. (Arizona Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
FOOD
SANITATION

Thaddeus-X v. Blatter, 110 F.3d 1233 (6th Cir. 1997). Inmates filed a § 1983 action against prison officials, alleging they had retaliated against them for litigating a separate civil rights action against a warden. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The inmates appealed and the appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The appeals court held that genuine issues of material fact precluded summary judgment on whether an inmate required another inmate's assistance in order to have meaningful access to courts. The court found that the existence of a prison law library did not preclude an inmate's claim that prison officials retaliated against him for assisting another inmate with lawsuits, absent demonstration that the prison's policy of providing prisoners with law books requested by title was sufficient to provide the inmate with meaningful access to courts without the assistance of another inmate. The court also held that serving an inmate cold meals in retaliation for exercising his right of access to courts could be significant enough to be actionable under § 1983 and that genuine issues of material fact precluded summary judgment on this issue. The court found that summary judgment was also precluded for the inmate's claim that he was caused appreciable pain or injury because he was allegedly transferred without justification to a filthy unit which housed mentally ill inmates in retaliation for assisting another inmate with a lawsuit. (State Prison of Southern Michigan)

U.S. District Court
FOOD
DISCIPLINE

Warren v. Irvin, 985 F.Supp. 350 (W.D.N.Y. 1997). An inmate challenged his confinement in special housing that resulted from disciplinary determinations that were invalidated. The inmate had been found guilty of a disciplinary violation for attacking a corrections officer, but this determination was eventually reversed due to procedural errors. The district court held that the temporary loss of good-time credits and prison privileges, or confinement in a special housing unit for 161 days, did not implicate a liberty interest necessary to support a due process claim. The court also held that deprivations of food and water imposed on the inmate were not sufficiently serious to constitute cruel and unusual punishment under the Eighth Amendment. The inmate was deprived of one meal for violation of a requirement of returning trays and cups before receiving the next meal, and he was deprived of water because he was using it to flood the gallery. (Wende Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
SMOKE FREE
ENVIRONMENT

Weaver v. Clarke, 120 F.3d 852 (8th Cir. 1997). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against employees of the department of correctional services alleging Eighth Amendment violations arising from his exposure to environmental tobacco smoke (ETS). The defendants imposed a smoking ban in all correctional facilities and then prevailed on summary judgment motions on claims for damages and injunctive relief. In announcing the ban, the Director of the Department stated that "pending inmate litigation, both locally and nationally on the issue of second hand smoke are concerns that must be addressed." The inmate sought fees and expenses which were granted by the district court. The employees appealed and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the inmate was the prevailing party, affirming the district court award of $8,346 in attorney fees and $2,952 expenses. The court also found that the employees were not deliberately indifferent to the inmate's serious medical needs, as required to establish a § 1983 claim. The court noted that the employees took action to house the inmate in a smoke-free cell and took reasonable steps to ensure that the inmate's cellmate observed the no-smoking rule. (Lincoln Correctional Center, Nebraska)

U.S. District Court
CAPITAL
PUNISHMENT

Williams v. Hopkins, 983 F.Supp. 891 (D.Neb. 1997). A state prisoner filed a § 1983 action against a prison warden seeking injunctive relief and monetary damages for alleged violation of his civil rights arising out of his pending execution by electrocution. The district court dismissed the action, finding that neither electrocution nor multiple applications of current violated the Eighth Amendment. (Nebraska State Penitentiary)

U.S. Appeals Court
DEATH PENALTY

Williams v. Hopkins, 130 F.3d 333 (8th Cir. 1997). A state prisoner sentenced to death by electrocution brought a civil rights action challenging the constitutionality of electrocution in general and Nebraska's method of electrocution in particular. The district court dismissed the action as frivolous and the appeals court affirmed, finding that the action was the functional equivalent of a successive habeas action, subject to the procedural requirements of successive habeas actions. The court held that passing of more than one current of electricity into the body of a prisoner to effect his death does not support a claim of cruel and unusual punishment under the Eighth Amendment, absent any suggestion of malevolence. (Nebraska)

U.S. District Court
CAPITAL PUNISH-MENT
EXERCISE
PRIVACY

Williams v. Price, 25 F.Supp.2d 605 (W.D.Pa. 1997). Death row inmates challenged their conditions of confinement in a civil rights action. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the officials for most of the allegations. The court found that strip searches of inmates, including viewing of bodily cavities, before and after sessions with their attorneys, did not violate the inmates' Fourth Amendment rights. The court also found that the inmates were not denied equal protection because they were allowed only one hour of recreation per day, while inmates in another death row facility had two hours per day. The court held that the inmates' equal protection rights were not violated when they were denied access to recreational materials that were made available to inmates at other death row facilities, where there were more prisoners in their facility and contraband had been discovered. The court did not grant summary judgment to the defendants on the claim that failure to provide a soundproofed area for conversations between inmates and their attorneys violated the inmates' right to privacy. (State Correctional Institution at Greene, Pennsylvania)

1998

U.S. District Court
RESTRAINTS TOILET
WORK

Austin v. Hopper, 15 F.Supp.2d 1210 (M.D.Ala. 1998). Inmates in a state prison system brought a class action suit under § 1983, challenging several of the system's policies and practices. The district court held that an agreement settling the inmates' chain gang claim was not subject to the limitations on prospective relief imposed by the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) and the settlement was approved. The agreement called for a complete and permanent cessation of the practice of chaining prisoners together. Inmates on chain gangs had been shackled by leg irons in groups of five, separated by eight feet of chain between them, were required to wear white uniforms with "Chain Gang" printed in black, and were taken to public highways or work sites where they performed manual labor in ten-hour shifts. The court found that an automatic 90-day denial of visitation for inmates assigned to a shock incarceration program did not violate their First Amendment right to visitation. The inmates in the program were recidivists and parole violators. According to the court, the denial of visitation promoted the legitimate penological objectives of deterrence and rehabilitation in a common-sense way, and the inmates had mail and telephone calls as an alternative means of communication. The court held that the practice of disciplining inmates who refused to work or who were disruptive by chaining them to a "hitching post" was cruel and unusual punishment. The inmates experienced actual, significant pain while shackled to the post and were denied access to basic human needs such as shelter, water, and toilet facilities. The court declined to approve a proposed toilet facilities settlement in response to the inmates' claims that inmates on work squads were not provided with adequate toilet facilities. (Alabama Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
HARASSMENT

Aziz Zarif Shabazz v. Pico, 994 F.Supp. 460 (S.D.N.Y. 1998). A prison inmate brought a § 1983 action against prison officials and employees alleging violation of his constitutional rights. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants. The court held that the inmate failed to allege facts sufficient to support a conspiracy claim or that officials had acted in retaliation for the inmate's exercise of protected rights. The court concluded that kicking of the inmate inside his ankles and feet while performing a pat frisk, while not to be condoned, was a de minimis use of force and did not violate the Eighth Amendment. The court noted that at one time the inmate admitted that he had sustained no physical injuries. The court held that the pat frisk and strip frisk searches performed on the inmate were permissible and did not violate the provisions of a consent decree. The court found that performing a strip frisk on the prison inmate prior to his transfer to another facility did not violate his right of free exercise of religion, notwithstanding the inmate's religious objections to the requirement that he remove his clothing. According to the court, alleged verbal taunts, no matter how inappropriate, unprofessional or reprehensible they might seem, did not support a claim of cruel and unusual punishment absent any injury. Any psychological or emotional scars to the inmate were found to be de minimis and did not support a claim of cruel and unusual punishment. (Green Haven Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
DOUBLE CELLING
VENTILATION

Bolton v. Goord, 992 F.Supp. 604 (S.D.N.Y. 1998). Inmates brought a § 1983 suit claiming that New York's practice of housing two inmates in a prison cell previously used to house one inmate violated the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments. The district court held that double celling under the conditions set forth at trial did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment and that New York had not conferred on inmates a protected liberty interest in single-cell housing. The court held that the application of the Eighth Amendment is guided by contemporary standards of decency, but while the opinions of experts and the standards established by concerned organizations may be helpful on some questions, they do not establish constitutional minima. According to the court, public attitudes toward certain punishment, or what society is willing to tolerate in its prisons, is the more appropriate gauge of contemporary standards. The court noted that when double-celling was researched prior to its implementation, officials considered whether an inmate was violent or victim-prone before placing him in a double cell, evidence did not establish a cause and effect relationship between double-celling and an increase in violence, and guidelines for double-celling took into account medical conditions. According to the court, double-celling was in effect in most other state prison systems and in the federal system at the time it was implemented in New York. Inmates had the same access to extensive programs and services after double-celling was implemented, and there was no evidence of "overcrowding" in the sense that the facility had to compromise its services in order to handle the additional number of inmates. The court also noted that disputes between cellmates were handled quickly and never rose to more than minor incidents of physical violence, the small cell size was not shown to have resulted in the deprivation of any basic human need, and there was no indication that natural ventilation was so inadequate as to cause injury. According to the court, the Eighth Amendment does not guarantee inmates a certain type of ventilation or a certain rate of air exchange. (Woodburne Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
MEDICAL CARE

Bout v. Bolden, 22 F.Supp.2d 646 (E.D.Mich. 1998). A prisoner brought a civil rights action against prison officials. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants, finding that a prison official was not deliberately indifferent in refusing to reassign the prisoner to a lower bunk, even though the prisoner had been given a "medical detail" for assignment to a lower bunk. According to the court, even assuming that the official had knowledge of the medical detail, refusal to comply would not have posed conscious disregard for excessive risk to the prisoner's health and safety, given evidence of malingering in the prisoner's medical records. The court also held that drilling the prisoner's teeth without anesthesia for a short period in order to treat a dental condition is not the sort of barbarous and wanton infliction of pain from which a prisoner is protected by the Eighth Amendment. (Mich. Dept. of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
SANITATION

Davis v. Scott, 157 F.3d 1003 (5th Cir. 1998). A prisoner brought a pro se, in forma pauperis complaint against prison guards and their supervisors alleging unconstitutional conditions of confinement. The district court dismissed the complaint and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the prisoner's confinement for three days in a crisis management cell which he alleged had blood on the walls and excrement on the floor did not constitute an extreme deprivation so as to violate the prisoner's rights under the Eighth Amendment. The court noted that the prisoner had cleaning supplies available to him. (Coffield Unit, Texas)

U.S. District Court
THREATS
HARASSMENT

Jones v. Culinary Manager II, 30 F.Supp.2d 491 (E.D.Pa. 1998). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against a prison guard and prison officials. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants, finding that the prisoner's allegations were insufficient to state a claim for sexual harassment under the Eighth Amendment, given that both men involved with the incident were fully clothed and the incident lasted only 15 to 20 seconds. The prisoner alleged that a prison guard pinned him against some boxes and "started grinding" on his buttocks with his penis and threatened that he was going to have sex with him the first chance he got. The court also held that verbal harassment of a prisoner, without appreciable injury, is generally insufficient to sustain a claim under § 1983. (State Correctional Institution at Graterford, Pennsylvania)

U.S. District Court
CAPITAL PUNISH-MENT

Jones v. McAndrew, 996 F.Supp. 1439 (N.D.Fla. 1998). Four inmates who were sentenced to death brought an § 1983 action against corrections officials seeking injunctive relief with respect to electrocution procedures. The district court granted summary judgment to the officials. According to the court, under the Farmer standard the duty to avoid inflicting serious injury at the hands of the executioner was at least as great as the duty to avoid infliction of harm by fellow inmates. The inmates alleged that there was a risk of fire about the head of the person being executed, as occurred with a previous execution. The court found that the officials were not deliberately indifferent because after the execution during which fire broke out, the officials hired experts to analyze the problem and recommend solutions, took the experts' advice in changing the procedures, and obtained a favorable ruling from a state supreme court on the new procedures. (Florida State Prison)

U.S. Appeals Court
CAPITAL
PUNISHMENT

Langford v. Day, 134 F.3d 1381 (9th Cir. 1998). A prisoner sentenced to death claimed that hanging, his chosen method of execution under Montana law, violated the Eighth Amendment. The district court ruled that his claim became moot when the Montana legislature abolished hanging. (Montana)

U.S. District Court
SMOKE-FREE
ENVIRONMENT

McPherson v. Coombe, 29 F.Supp.2d 141 (W.D.N.Y. 1998). An inmate brought a § 1983 action alleging violations of his First, Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment rights arising from his exposure to environmental tobacco smoke (ETS). The district court denied the defendants' motion for summary judgment, finding that it was precluded by fact questions as to whether smoke conditions in the prison violated contemporary standards of decency, whether officials were aware of the potential risks to the inmate's future health, and whether the superintendent was personally involved in decisions leading to denial of the inmate's request to be housed in a smoke-free environment. The court found that prison smoking regulations, which permitted smoking in dormitory areas, did not violate the inmate's First Amendment rights to freedom of association because designated non-smoking areas gave the inmate opportunities to exercise his right to associate with other inmates. The inmate had alleged that the smoking policy restricted his movement within the dormitory in his attempt to evade contact with ETS. (Attica Correctional Facility and Orleans Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
SMOKE FREE
ENVIRONMENT

Scott v. District of Columbia, 139 F.3d 940 (D.C. Cir. 1998). Nonsmoking prisoners brought a civil rights suit against the District of Columbia alleging violation of their Eighth Amendment rights by exposing them to second-hand tobacco smoke. The district court entered an injunction requiring the District of Columbia to provide the prisoners with a smoke-free environment. The District appealed and the appeals court reversed, finding that evidence was insufficient to establish that the prisoners were exposed to an unreasonably high level of smoke, where measurements indicated that the amounts of second-hand smoke were within acceptable levels and the prisoners failed to demonstrate a relationship between the smoke and their alleged ailments. The appeals court also held that evidence was insufficient to establish that prison officials were deliberately indifferent to the risk of harm that second-hand smoke posed to prisoners, where evidence indicated that the officials made a good faith attempt to enforce a nonsmoking policy and improved ventilation in certain areas. (Lorton Correctional Complex, Virginia, District of Columbia)

U.S. District Court
TOTALITY OF CONDITIONS
DOUBLE CELLING FOOD
CROWDING
SANITATION

Simpson v. Horn, 25 F.Supp.2d 563 (E.D.Pa. 1998). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against a corrections commissioner and officials, alleging that conditions of confinement at an overcrowded facility violated his Eighth Amendment rights, and that a classification system for double-cell assignment violated the equal protection clause. The district court found that the alleged deficiencies in the facility were not cruel and unusual punishment, but that fact issues precluded summary judgment on the equal protection claim. The court questioned the officials' intent to cause racial segregation via double-celling, and ruled they were not entitled to qualified immunity with respect to that claim. The court noted that prison officials have the right, acting in good faith and in particularized circumstances, to take into account racial tensions in maintaining security, discipline, and good order in prisons and jails. The court found that housing two inmates in a cell designed for one inmate does not, per se, violate the Eighth Amendment proscription against cruel and unusual punishment, but it may if it results in deprivations of essential food, medical care, sanitation or other conditions intolerable for human confinements. The inmate had alleged that as the result of overcrowding, inmates were not provided with adequate furniture, cleaning supplies, laundry service, ventilation, bedding, clothing, seating, recreational equipment, or telephones. He also alleged that food was served cold 85% of the time and that the dining hall was not kept clean or free of vermin. (State Correctional Institution at Graterford, Pennsylvania)

U.S. Appeals Court
FOOD

Talib v. Gilley, 138 F.3d 211 (5th Cir. 1998). A former state inmate brought a § 1983 action against prison officials alleging violation of his constitutional rights by withholding his meals on certain occasions. The district court dismissed the case as frivolous and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that a prison regulation requiring prisoners being served meals in their cells while on lockdown status to face the wall on their knees with their hands behind their backs was reasonably related to legitimate penological interests in security and the safety of guards. The refusal of guards to serve meals to the inmate when he did not follow this procedure did not violate the Eighth Amendment. The court found that the inmate had also failed to show that his diet was nutritionally or calorically inadequate. (Texas Department of Criminal Justice)

U.S. Appeals Court
SMOKING

Webber v. Crabtree, 158 F.3d 460 (9th Cir. 1998). Inmates in a federal prison camp sued prison officials, seeking equitable relief from a camp ban on smoking. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants. The appeals court held that the smoking ban did not violate inmates' equal protection rights, but that prison regulations did not grant the warden the discretion to ban all smoking at the camp. Prison regulations provided that the warden "shall identify" outdoor smoking areas. (Federal Prison Camp, Sheridan, Oregon)

1999

U.S. District Court
CONDITIONS
SAFETY

Abarca v. Chevron U.S.A. Inc., 75 F.Supp.2d 566 (E.D.Tex. 1999). Prison employees and prison inmates, more than 1,000 total, sued the owner and operator of a pipeline and contractors who sold installed and maintained the pipeline's valves, alleging assault, negligence, gross negligence, strict products liability, and cruel and unusual punishment arising out of a pipeline leak near the prison. The plaintiffs were forcibly exposed to gas when they were unable to be evacuated and the inmates were confined to their cells. The district court found that there was no federal question for which federal jurisdiction existed, dismissing the case. (Texas Department of Corrections, Liberty County, Texas)

U.S. District Court
TEMPERATURE
MEDICAL CARE

Anton v. Sheriff of DuPage County, Ill., 47 F.Supp.2d 993 (N.D.Ill. 1999). A pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against a county and county officials alleging that he was subjected to unconstitutional conditions of confinement at a county jail. The district court refused to dismiss the case, finding that his alleged exposure to low temperature in a detention cell while naked and with no alternative means of protecting himself from the cold supported a claim of inadequate shelter against the county. The detainee allegedly repeatedly complained to jail officers for hours and they responded with jeers and laughter, and he was not provided with medical care until he threatened litigation. When a nurse finally attended to the detainee, his body temperature was three degrees below normal. The detainee had just attempted suicide and had been placed in a rubberized cell without clothing and was observed every 15 minutes. The court also found that deputies' alleged thwarting of medical treatment given to the detainee supported a claim of violation of his right to medical attention. The officers allegedly removed a blanket that was given to the detainee by the nurse, which the court held supported a claim for deliberate indifference. The court denied qualified immunity for the officers, finding that it was clearly established at the time of this incident that pretrial detainees had a constitutional right to adequate heat and medical attention. (DuPage County Jail, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
EXERCISE
PLUMBING

Beckford v. Irvin, 49 F.Supp.2d 170 (W.D.N.Y. 1999). Defendants moved to set aside a jury verdict and dismiss an inmate's case against them. The district court denied the motions, finding that the award of compensatory and punitive damages was not excessive. The inmate had been confined to a wheelchair since 1984. In 1994 he was transferred from a psychiatric center to another correctional facility where he was assigned to a Mental Health Observation Unit (MHU). The court noted that the inmate was "...not placed in MHU for mental health treatment. He was placed in MHU because the cell was bigger and because his wheelchair fit in the cell." But shortly after his transfer officials took away his wheelchair and denied him access to it for the majority of his time at the facility. The inmate repeatedly requested permission to use his wheelchair and his requests were denied. The jury concluded that the inmate's rights had been violated because he was unable to participate in outdoor exercise or to take a shower because he was not allowed to use his wheelchair. The jury awarded $125,000 in compensatory damages for violations of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) and punitive damages totaling $25,000 against two supervisory officials for being deliberately indifferent to the inmate's serious medical needs. The court noted that the fact that the jury did not assess liability on the part of lower ranking prison officials did not preclude the jury from assessing liability on the supervisory officials. (Wende Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
SMOKE-FREE ENVIRON.
SMOKE

Henderson v. Sheahan, 196 F.3d 839 (7th Cir. 1999) U.S. Cert Den. at 120 S.Ct. 2691. A pretrial detainee who was held in a county jail for four-and-one-half years brought a § 1983 action against the sheriff and corrections officials claiming injuries allegedly sustained as the result of his exposure to second-hand smoke. The district court dismissed the action. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the inmate's alleged present injuries were not sufficiently serious to support a due process claim and that the detainee could not recover for future injuries absent a showing to a reasonable medical certainty that he faced an increased risk of developing a future injury attributable to the alleged exposure. The detainee alleged present injuries that included breathing problems, chest pains, dizziness, sinus problems, headaches, and loss of energy. Although the jail had a non-smoking policy the detainee claimed that inmates routinely violated it. (Cook County Jail, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
WORK

Howard v. Headly, 72 F.Supp.2d 118 (E.D.N.Y. 1999). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against prison officials alleging that they required him to work beyond his physical capabilities. The district court denied qualified immunity to the officials, finding that the prisoner had stated a claim for a violation of the Eighth Amendment. The court noted that the officials required the prisoner, who had a back injury, to work sanitation duty despite the pain and agony that it caused the prisoner, and despite the knowledge that a physician's orders precluded such work. (Arthur Kill Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
BEDDING
CLOTHING LABOR
SANITATION
TEMPERATURE
TOILETS

Palmer v. Johnson, 193 F.3d 346 (5th Cir. 1999). A state inmate brought a § 1983 action for monetary and injunctive relief against correctional officials, alleging violation of his constitutional rights when he was forced to spend a night on a work field, along with other members of a work squad, without adequate bathroom facilities and shelter. The district court found a warden and assistant warden liable in their individual capacities, granted injunctive relief, and ordered claims for monetary damages to proceed to trial. The appeals court affirmed in part and remanded, finding that the inmate had demonstrated a violation of his clearly established Eighth Amendment rights and that the warden and assistant warden were not entitled to summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity. The inmate alleged that he and other members of his work crew were confined outdoors overnight without any shelter, jackets, blankets, or a source of heat while the temperature dropped and the wind blew, and without bathroom facilities for 49 inmates sharing a small bounded area. The warden allegedly ordered this "sleep-out" in response to the inmates' response to a lecture they had received from a sergeant after lunch. They were ordered to stop and sit in the field, even though some of them wanted to go to work. They were confined to an area measuring approximately twenty feet by thirty feet, bounded by poles and a string of lights. Correctional officers were ordered to shoot any inmate who attempted to leave the designated area. When the inmate asked permission to leave the area to urinate and defecate he was informed that he would be shot if he attempted to do so outside of the boundaries that had been set. The inmates were dressed in short sleeve shirts for a day of work in the field, but the temperature fell below fifty-nine degrees overnight and the inmates were forced to stay warm by huddling together. Both the warden and assistant warden were present during the evening of the "sleep-out" and the warden allegedly threatened another such event if the inmates refused to work. (Texas Department of Criminal Justice, Institutional Division)

U.S. Appeals Court
MEDICAL CARE

Ralston v. McGovern, 167 F.3d 1160 (7th Cir. 1999). An inmate brought a civil rights action against a state prison officer, alleging that the officer denied him medical care in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The district court entered summary judgment for the officer. The appeals court reversed and remanded, finding that the inmate could maintain a claim based on allegations that the officer refused to give him medicine prescribed to alleviate pain caused by radiation treatment for Hodgkin's Disease. The appeals court ruled that the officer was not entitled to qualified immunity from suit. The appeals court stated that the officer's "refusal to treat, at trivial cost, the pain caused by cancer and cancer treatments bordered on barbarous, and the guard's deliberate refusal of request for pain medication was gratuitous cruelty, even if the context of cancer were ignored." (Green Bay Correctional Institution, Wisconsin)

U.S. Appeals Court
FOOD
MEDICAL CARE

Reed v. McBride, 178 F.3d 849 (7th Cir. 1999). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action alleging that prison officials violated his Eighth Amendment rights by withholding food and life-sustaining medication from him while he was incarcerated. The district court entered summary judgment in favor of the defendants but the appeals court reversed and remanded. The appeals court held that the prisoner's medical condition was sufficiently serious to support an Eighth Amendment claim and that material fact issues existed as to whether the officials acted with deliberate indifference to the prisoner's serious medical needs. According to the court, depriving a prisoner doctor-prescribed medication that allegedly led to agonizing and extreme pain, internal bleeding and periods of unconsciousness, was a serious medical condition for the purposes of § 1983. The court found that depriving a prisoner of food may be so objectively serious as to support a claim of cruel and unusual punishment under the Eighth Amendment, when the amount and duration of the deprivation is considered. The inmate suffered from a variety of ailments, including paralysis, heart disease, Hunt's syndrome, high blood pressure, rheumatoid arthritis, and other crippling diseases of the legs, ankles, feet, hands and spine. The inmate complained that every Friday for an unspecified period of time he was returned from treatment at a local hospital and was unable to retrieve his identification badge until the following Monday or Tuesday. Without the badge he was not permitted to receive food or medication from prison authorities. (Westville Correctional Facility, Indiana)

U.S. District Court
LIGHTING

Richard v. Reed, 49 F.Supp.2d 485 (E.D.Va. 1999). A prisoner brought a § 1983 complaint alleging that county jail officials violated his Eighth Amendment rights by depriving him of direct sunlight for more than 100 days. The district court dismissed the case, finding that the prisoner failed to state an Eighth Amendment claim because deprivation of sunlight for 100 days was not a sufficiently serious deprivation of a human need. The court held that the case was frivolous. The prisoner was confined in a housing unit comprised of a dayroom which had no windows and ten cells, each of which had a window. Prisoners were not allowed in their cells between 8:30 a.m. and 5:30 p.m. and prisoners who wanted to take recreation could use an indoor recreation area. The prisoner alleged that his health was placed in danger because he was exposed to illness caused by a lack of exposure to direct sunlight. The court suggested that there might be extreme circumstances under which deprivation of sunlight or light for an extended period of time might amount to a serious deprivation, but found this was not such a case. The court cited Charles Dickens's A Tale of Two Cities in which a character was imprisoned in the Bastille for almost eighteen years in a small cell "where the light of day has never shone." But after reviewing nine cases that had considered a similar question with varied results, the court concluded that "the threshold for constitutional significance occurs well short of the Dickens example.” The court found that the conditions cited by the prisoner did not violate contemporary notions of decency, stating that “This conclusion finds support given that people who serve on nuclear submarines or who live within the Arctic Circle or in Antarctica go without direct exposure to sunlight for similarly long periods of time.” The court also noted that the window in the prisoner’s cell would provide natural light in the summertime when he was allowed back into the cell at 5:30 p.m. (Fairfax County Adult Detention Center, Virginia)

U.S. Appeals Court
HARASSMENT

Snider v. Dylag, 188 F.3d 51 (2nd Cir. 1999). An inmate brought a § 1983 suit against a correctional officer for alleging telling other inmates that it was “open season” on him. The district court dismissed the action but the appeals court vacated the decision and remanded the case. The appeals court held that the inmate had stated a claim under § 1983 for violation of his Eighth Amendment right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment and his Fourteenth Amendment right to be protected equally. The court noted that although the officer was not present when the inmate was assaulted by two or three other inmates, this was not required for the inmate to establish a violation of his rights by the officer. (Attica Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
CAPITAL
PUNISHMENT

Faulder v. Johnson, 99 F.Supp.2d 774 (S.D.Tex. 1999). A prisoner filed a § 1983 action alleging that he had been subjected to psychological torture as the result of repeated stays of his execution and that his right to consult with consular officials had been violated. The district court held that the prisoner’s twenty-two year wait on death row did not violate the Eighth Amendment. (Texas Department of Criminal Justice, Institutional Division)

U.S. District Court
DEATH PENALTY

Henderson v. Collins, 101 F.Supp.2d 866 (S.D. Ohio 1999). A convicted offender petitioned for habeas corpus relief alleging that Ohio’s execution process constituted cruel and unusual punishment. The district court held that Ohio’s process, in which a prisoner is offered a choice between death by lethal injection or death by electrocution, did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment. (Hamilton County, Ohio)

U.S. Supreme Court
CAPITAL PUNISH-MENT

Stewart v. LaGrand, 119 S.Ct. 1018 (1999). An inmate who was sentenced to death petitioned for a writ of habeas corpus challenging the use of lethal gas as a cruel and unusual form of execution. The district court denied the petition but the appeals court granted a certificate of appealability and enjoined the state from executing the prisoner by means of lethal gas. The United States Supreme Court reversed the appeals court decision and vacated the injunction. The Court held that the inmate had waived his claim that execution by lethal gas violated the Eighth Amendment by choosing to be executed with lethal gas rather than by lethal injection. (Arizona)

U.S. Appeals Court
SMOKE

Warren v. Keane, 196 F.3d 330 (2nd Cir. 1999). State inmates brought an § 1983 action alleging that they were subjected to cruel and unusual punishment through exposure to second-hand smoke. The district court denied summary judgment for the defendants and they appealed. The appeals court affirmed and remanded the case. The appeals court held that at the time the inmates brought the action it was clearly established that prison officials could violate the Eighth Amendment through deliberate indifference to inmates’ exposure to levels of environmental tobacco smoke (ETS) that posed an unreasonable risk of future harm to the inmates’ health. According to the court, fact issues existed as to whether the prison officials reasonably believed that they were not violating the inmates’ Eighth Amendment rights in permitting their exposure to allegedly severe levels of ETS. (Cell Block A, Sing Sing Prison, New York)

2000

U.S. District Court
CLOTHING

Ashann-Ra v. Com. Of Virginia, 112 F.Supp.2d 559 (W.D.Va. 2000). A prisoner sued state officials alleging various constitutional violations. The court held that the prisoner’s claim that correctional officers failed to provide him with well-fitted shoes for 24 days did not state an Eighth Amendment claim, where he did not allege that he suffered any serious physical injury to his feet or any other part of his body. The court found that the prisoner’s claim that correctional officials misapplied grievance procedures by refusing to accept grievances about a grooming policy that had not yet been enforced, failed to state a deprivation of any constitutionally protected rights. According to the court, an institution’s failure to comply with state grievance procedures does not compromise an inmate’s right of access to courts because state grievance procedures are separate and distinct from state and federal legal procedures. (Red Onion State Prison, Virginia)

U.S. District Court
PROTECTIVE CUSTODY

Graham v. Perez, 121 F.Supp.2d 317 (S.D.N.Y. 2000). Protective custody inmates at a state prison brought a § 1983 action challenging their conditions of confinement. The district court dismissed the case, finding that the inmates failed to exhaust their administrative remedies prior to filing suit. The court also found that certain complained-of conditions of confinement were insufficiently serious to constitute Eighth Amendment violations as a matter of law. The complaints included: only two and one-half hours out of cell time daily, deprivation of job opportunities and prison wages, limited location and content of meals, inadequate lighting, lack of electrical outlets in cells, limited recreational opportunities, limited access to newspapers, limited personal telephone calls, and limited personal grooming opportunities. (Fishkill Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
SANITATION
RESTRAINTS TEMPERATURE

Johnson v. Lewis, 217 F.3d 726 (9th Cir. 2000). Inmates who had been held out-of-doors while prison officials searched buildings after quelling disturbances brought two class actions against prison officials under § 1983, asserting that the conditions under which they were held violated the Eighth Amendment. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants in each case and the inmates appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded, holding that the inmates' evidence, if believed, would establish deprivations sufficiently serious to satisfy the objective component of the Eighth Amendment. The court found that the evidence was sufficient, if believed, to show that the officials had actual knowledge of the inmates' exposure to the elements and need for sanitation, edible food, and adequate drinking water, and that they intentionally disregarded these conditions. The inmates alleged that during the four days that they were held out-of-doors in the summer they did not receive protection from the elements sufficient to ward off heat-related illnesses, that they received inedible food and inadequate drinking water, and that they did not receive adequate access to toilets to avoid soiling themselves and were not allowed to clean themselves after. The inmates had also been held out-of-doors for 17 hours in subfreezing temperatures in the winter. (Arizona State Prison in Safford)

U.S. District Court
TEMPERATURE
FOOD

Leach v. Dufraim, 103 F.Supp.2d 542 (N.D.N.Y. 2000). A state prison inmate brought a § 1983 action against corrections officials alleging constitutional violations. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants. The court held that there was no evidence concerning allegedly cold cell conditions, such as the date, outside temperature, or a corroborating statement by another prisoner. The court found that the regulation of hair length was not gender discrimination. According to the court, the denial of hot food for two months as discipline for misconduct was not cruel and unusual punishment, absent a showing of nutritional inadequacy or immediate danger to the prisoner's health and well-being. (Franklin Corr. Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
VENTILATION

Sarro v. Essex County Correctional Facility, 84 F.Supp.2d 175 (D.Mass. 2000). A state prison inmate sued prison officials under § 1983 for violation of the Massachusetts Tort Claims Act. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants, finding that the requirement that the inmate keep his cell windows shut for three days and nights did not violate the Eighth Amendment. According to the court, the inmate's allegation that he was not "breathing normally" during the period that the windows were shut, and that he needed to use his inhaler to help him breathe normally, was an insufficient assertion of a physical injury to maintain a suit to recover for alleged mental and emotional injury. (Essex County Correctional Facility, Massachusetts)

U.S. District Court
THREATS

Warren v. Westchester County Jail, 106 F.Supp.2d 559 (S.D.N.Y. 2000). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against a county jail, administrators and officers, alleging Eighth Amendment violations. The district granted summary judgment for the defendants, holding that a jail officer who fought with the inmate had not employed excessive force when he grabbed the inmate in a bear hug in a good faith effort to restore order, even though the inmate claimed that the officer took advantage of the situation to administer additional blows. The court also held that verbal abuse, which the inmate had alleged he was subjected to, did not rise to the level of a constitutional violation that was actionable under § 1983. (Westchester County Jail, New York)

U.S. District Court
EXERCISE

Williams v. Goord, 111 F.Supp.2d 280 (S.D.N.Y. 2000). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against corrections officials alleging constitutional violations. The district court held that the conditions and duration of the prisoner's 75-day confinement in a Special Housing Unit (SHU) did not violate the prisoner's due process rights because they did not pose atypical or significant hardships. The conditions of the SHU included limited exercise times that were conducted in "cages" and limitations on the number of showers per week. The district court held that the fact that a prison employee issued a purportedly false misconduct report against the prisoner three days after he filed a grievance against the employee was insufficient to establish the prisoner's retaliation claim. But the district court denied summary judgment for the defendants on the issue of whether the officials knew that keeping the prisoner in mechanical restraints during his exercise period violated the Eighth Amendment. The court also held that there were genuine issues of material fact regarding whether placing the prisoner in mechanical restraints during his one-hour exercise period caused him "physical injury" as required by the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) to prevail on his Eighth Amendment claim. (Sullivan Correctional Facility, New York)

2001

U.S. Appeals Court
SMOKE -FREE
ENVIRONMENT

Alvarado v. Litscher, 267 F.3d 648 (7th Cir. 2001). A prisoner brought an action against a prison alleging deliberate indifference to his exposure to environmental tobacco smoke in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The district court denied the prison's motion to dismiss and the appeals court affirmed, finding that the prisoner stated a claim upon which relief could be granted. The court found that the prisoner's current and future health had been endangered because he had chronic asthma. The prisoner alleged that other prisoners in his non-smoking housing unit smoked in violation of prison policy because correctional officers were frequently not at their post to enforce the smoking ban. The prisoner also alleged that he is unable to participate in programs that would enhance his chances of parole because smoking is permitted in common areas of the prison. (Dodge Correctional Institution, Wisconsin)

U.S. District Court
SMOKING

Brashear v. Simms, 138 F.Supp.2d 693 (D.Md. 2001). A state inmate challenged policies banning smoking and sale of tobacco products and possession of tobacco by inmates in state prisons. The district court dismissed the action as frivolous, finding it did not violate equal protection. (Maryland Department of Public Safety and Correctional Services)

U.S. District Court
NOISE
SANITATION
TEMPERATURE

Caldwell v. District of Columbia, 201 F.Supp.2d 27 (D.D.C. 2001). An inmate filed a § 1983 action against the District of Columbia and several employees of its corrections department, alleging unconstitutional conditions of confinement and denial of medical care. A jury entered a verdict in favor of the inmate, on all claims, and awarded $174,178. The appeals court granted judgment for the defendants as a matter of law, in part, denied judgment for the defendants in part, and did not reduce the damage award. The court found that statements by the inmate's attorney during his closing argument, suggesting specific dollar amounts to be considered by the jury, did not warrant a new trial. The appeals court held that findings that conditions were unconstitutional were supported by evidence, as were findings that officials were deliberately indifferent to the inmate's serious medical needs. The appeals court held that the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) does not require a prisoner to allege or prove serious, permanent physical injury in order to bring an action for violation of his constitutional rights. The appeals court held that the prisoner sufficiently alleged a "physical injury" for the purposes of PLRA, with allegations that excessive heat in his cell made him dizzy, dehydrated, and disoriented, gave him a severe rash, and that smoke from rolled toilet paper "wicks" and frequent use of mace gave him bronchial irritation and a runny nose. The inmate also alleged that the small bunk aggravated his arthritis. According to the court, the inmate did not have to allege that excessive noise in the cell block caused him hearing loss, where his contention was that the noise levels contributed a deprivation of sleep. The appeals court held that the inmate's exposure to feces in his cell, foul water, filth, excessive heat, smoke, and mace, and the lack of outdoor exercise, resulted in a substantial risk of serious harm. The appeals court upheld the inmate's deliberate indifference claim, noting that it was supported by evidence that treatment for the inmate's glaucoma and skin cancer was delayed for substantial periods. (Maximum Security Facility, Lorton Corr'l Complex, Dist. of Columbia)

U.S. Appeals Court
PLUMBING
SANITATION

Carroll v. Detella, 255 F.3d 470 (7th Cir. 2001). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against state prison officials and state environmental protection officials, seeking damages and injunctive relief on the grounds that the drinking water at two state prisons was contaminated. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that alleged lead contamination in one prison, and radium contamination in another prison, did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment. According to the court, the lead contamination was caused by corrosion of the water pipes, but only when water was still in the pipes overnight, and the inmate had been told to let water run before drinking it in the morning. The environmental protection agency had found the level of radium in the water at the other prison was less than half of the maximum allowed in a revised standard. The court noted that failing to provide a maximally safe environment, one completely free from pollution or safety hazards, is not a violation of the Eighth Amendment. (Stateville and Menard Corr'l Facil., Ill.)

U.S. District Court
USE OF FORCE
MEDICAL CARE

Ducally v. Rhode Island Dept. of Corrections, 160 F.Supp.2d 220 (D.R.I. 2001). A prisoner brought a § 1983 action against a corrections department and corrections officers alleging cruel and unusual punishment. The district court dismissed the claims against the department, but found that the prisoner stated a claim against an officer with his allegations that the officer intentionally slammed a cell door on his hand and delayed the provision of medical care. The prisoner alleged that he suffered two cuts, swollen fingers, and loss of power and feeling in his fingers and hand. (Adult Correctional Institution, Cranston, Rhode Island)

U.S. District Court
SMOKE

Reilly v. Grayson, 157 F.Supp.2d 762 (E.D.Mich. 2001). A prisoner brought a § 1983 action against a warden, deputy warden, and Michigan Department of Corrections physicians, alleging violation of his Eighth Amendment rights. After a bench trial, the district court ruled that the warden and deputy wardens were deliberately indifferent to the prisoner's serious medical need to be placed in a smoke-free environment, supporting the prisoner's cruel and unusual punishment claims. The court found that the wardens were reckless in their disregard of the prisoner's rights, and awarded the prisoner $18,250 in punitive damages and $36,500 in compensatory damages for the five years of inaction by the wardens. The prisoner had two Individual Management Plans (IMP) which required that he be placed in a smoke-free environment, but the non-smoking regulations in the prisoner's cell block were consistently violated and the wardens were aware of the violations. After receiving notice that the IMPs were not being followed, the wardens continued to do nothing to remedy the situation. The court concluded that the three wardens "...each clearly ignored his supervisory obligations and, as a consequence, should suffer the opprobrium of punitive damages, not so much to deter each of them in the future, but to deter other officials in like positions of ignoring their responsibility." (Trustee Division, State Prison of Southern Michigan)

U.S. District Court
TEMPERATURE

Scotti v. Russell, 175 F.Supp.2d 1099 (N.D.Ill. 2001). An inmate brought a § 1983 action seeking injunctive relief and damages for alleged Eighth Amendment violations. The district court entered judgment for the defendants, finding that the temperature of the inmate's cell was not sufficiently cold as to constitute an Eighth Amendment violation of the inmate's right to adequate shelter. According to the court, temperature logs and maintenance records showed that the heating system was functioning adequately at the time, with the exception of two breakdowns that were quickly repaired. The inmate's medical records showed no indication of temperature-based health complaints. The court also noted that extra blankets were made available to inmates, and the prison supplemented the heating system with a program to insulate cells by taping plastic sheeting over the windows and by cleaning heating ducts. (Stateville Correctional Center, Illinois)

2002

U.S. District Court
SECURITY

Austin v. Wilkinson, 189 F.Supp.2d 719 (N.D. Ohio 2002). A class of current and former prisoners at a high maximum security prison brought a § 1983 action seeking injunctive relief, alleging denial of due process in their placement and retention at the facility. The district court held that: (1) the inmates had a liberty interest in their conditions of confinement; (2) the inmates were entitled to due process protection in decisions to send them and retain them at the facility; (3) the inmates were denied due process in the decisions to send them to, and retain them at, the facility; and (4) new corrections policies failed to provide adequate due process safeguards. The court held that the combination of conditions faced by inmates at the high maximum security prison imposed an atypical and significant hardship, giving the inmates a liberty interest protected by due process. The court noted that inmates in the prison were subjected to lengthy stays of indefinite duration, had extremely limited contact with other individuals, were never allowed outdoor recreation, were subject to extremely intrusive restrictions when they were allowed out of their cells, and were denied parole eligibility. "Having found that the defendants violated, and will continue to violate, the plaintiffs' constitutionally liberty interest," the court ordered the parties to file proposed injunctive orders to correct the violations. (Ohio State Penitentiary)

U.S. Appeals Court
LIGHTING

Carney v. Craven, 40 Fed.Appx. 48 (6th Cir. 2002). A state prisoner brought a civil rights action under § 1983. The district court dismissed the action and the appeals court affirmed, as modified. The appeals court held that the prisoner failed to show that prison officials were deliberately indifferent to his request to fix a faulty light which was producing a strobe-like effect, and which allegedly caused him headaches and eye pain. The court noted that the prisoner's request to have the bulb repaired was not recklessly disregarded, but rather, a new light bulb was not immediately available, and the prisoner was ultimately moved to a new cell eleven days after reporting the problem. (Tennessee)

U.S. Appeals Court
SMOKE

Davis v. New York, 316 F.3d 93 (2nd Cir. 2002). A pro se state prisoner brought a § 1983 action alleging he was exposed to unreasonably high levels of second-hand smoke, in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court held that summary judgment was precluded on the issue of whether the prisoner was exposed to unreasonable levels of second-hand smoke. The court held that the prisoner's claim was not moot, even though he had been transferred to a different housing block and the prison implemented a restrictive smoking policy, because the prisoner was housed in a block without individual cell windows and in conditions similar to those he experienced prior to the transfer. The prisoner also asserted that the prison's new smoking policy was not being enforced. (Attica Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
TEMPERATURE

Flores v. O'Donnell, 36 Fed.Appx. 204 (7th Cir. 2002). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against corrections officials alleging cruel and unusual punishment. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the officials and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals held that while an issue of fact existed as to whether the duration and severity of cold in the inmate's cell was serious enough to implicate the Eighth Amendment, officials were not deliberately indifferent to the inmate's complaints about the cold. The court noted that in order to assess whether cold cell temperatures violated the Eighth Amendment, the court must consider factors that include the severity of the cold, its duration, whether the prisoner had alternatives means to protect himself from the cold, and the adequacy of such alternatives. According to the court, officials responded to the inmate's complaints by offering him clothing, three hours after he first complained of the cold, on the condition that he wear a mask to prevent him from spitting on officers. The inmate refused, and later received medical attention several times. (Waupun Correctional Facility, Wisconsin)

U.S. Supreme Court
RESTRAINTS
DISCIPLINE

Hope v. Pelzer, 122 S.Ct. 2508 (2002). An Alabama prison inmate who was allegedly handcuffed to a "hitching post" twice in 1995 for disruptive conduct, brought a civil rights action against three correctional officers involved in the incidents. The federal appeals court held that the hitching post's use for punitive purposes violated the Eighth Amendment but found that the officers were entitled to qualified immunity. The U.S. Supreme Court reversed, finding that the defense of qualified immunity was not available to the officers at the summary judgment phase of the case. The Court found that the prisoner's allegations, if true, established an Eighth Amendment claim for cruel and unusual punishment because the alleged conduct would be "unnecessary and wanton" infliction of pain for reasons "totally without penological justification." The Court held that a reasonable officer would have known that using a hitching post as the prisoner alleged was unlawful. During a 2-hour period in May of 1995, when the inmate was handcuffed to the hitching post, the inmate was offered drinking water and a bathroom break every 15 minutes. He was handcuffed above shoulder height, and when he tried moving his arms to improve circulation, the handcuffs cut into his wrists, causing pain and discomfort. In a second incident after a fight with an officer at his chain gang's worksite in June, he was subdued, handcuffed, placed in leg irons, and transported back to the prison. Once there, he was ordered to take off his shirt, thus exposing himself to the sun, and spent seven hours on the hitching post. He was given one or two water breaks, but no bathroom breaks, and he claimed that an officer taunted him about his thirst. (Alabama Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
TEMPERATURE

Moore v. Gardner, 199 F.Supp.2d 17 (W.D.N.Y. 2002). An inmate brought a pro se action against prison officials under § 1983 and § 1985, alleging mail tampering and unconstitutional conditions of confinement. The district granted summary judgment, in part, to the defendants, finding that the alleged mail tampering did not result in an actual injury to the inmate. The court denied summary judgment for the defendants on the issue of whether the inmate was subjected to unconstitutionally cold conditions. The inmate alleged he was forced to live in a cold, drafty cell for three weeks during the winter, without his bed sheets and with only one blanket. (Southport Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
NOISE
SANITATION

Oliver v. Powell, 250 F.Supp.2d 593 (E.D.Va. 2002). A prisoner brought a civil rights action alleging various constitutional violations. The prisoner and the defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants on all of the prisoner's claims. The court held that the prisoner's allegations that prison officers deprived him of sleep by keeping him up with their singing, talking and other noise, and that his segregation cell had roaches, a leaky toilet, peeling paint and writing on the wall, did not rise to the level of an Eighth Amendment claim. The court found that these claims did not lie outside of the scope of the ordinary discomfort accompanying prison life, and noted that the prisoner neglected to report plumbing problems or use roach traps. (Southampton Correctional Center, Virginia)

U.S. Appeals Court
SMOKE-FREE
ENVIRONMENT

Reilly v. Grayson, 310 F.3d 519 (6th Cir. 2002). A prisoner brought a § 1983 action against prison officials alleging violation of his Eighth Amendment right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment. The district court entered judgment for the prisoner and awarded damages. The defendants appealed and the appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that the prisoner had a right not to be exposed to environmental tobacco smoke that presented a serious risk to his health, and to removed from places where smoke hovered. The court affirmed the lower court findings that the prisoner's asthma was a serious medical condition and that it was exacerbated by exposure to second-hand smoke, and that the defendants repeatedly failed to respond to repeated recommendations by medical personnel that the prisoner be moved to a smoke-free setting. The appeals court affirmed the award of actual damages rather than nominal damages in the amount of $36,500, and the award of punitive damages in the amount of $18,250. The court found no abuse of discretion in the district court's award of $51,786 in attorney's fees. (Michigan Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
HARASSMENT

Seaver v. Manduco, 178 F.Supp.2d 30 (D.Mass. 2002). State inmates filed a § 1983 action alleging that corrections officials harassed them because of their status as sex offenders, and conducted retaliatory visual body cavity searches. The district court dismissed the action, finding that injunctive relief was not warranted, the inmates' claims for money damages based on harassment were barred by the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) and that officials were entitled to qualified immunity from liability for the searches. The court noted that the PLRA barred claims for mental or emotional injury without a showing of physical injury and that correctional officers had reasonable justification for conducting a visual body cavity search of the inmates where they were responding to a prison alarm because of what appeared to be a fight. The inmates alleged that staff members had posted a sign that stated "All sex offenders should be castrated" and that they were subjected to assaults from other prisoners as a result of the signs. (North Central Correctional Institution, Massachusetts)

U.S. District Court
DOUBLE-CELLING
FAILURE TO PROTECT

Smith v. Muccino, 223 F.Supp.2d 396 (D.Conn. 2002). A state prisoner brought a pro se action alleging that the practice of housing him with violent inmates, sometimes in retaliation for his complaints, violated his constitutional rights. After an agreement to settle the case fell through, the court reopened the case and held that the prisoner's allegations stated a claim for an Eighth Amendment violation. The court noted that the prisoner was not claiming that double-celling was per se unlawful. The prisoner, who is Caucasian and who believes he is perceived to be gay, alleged that he was repeatedly housed with racist and homophobic inmates, and that his requests for a cell change were ignored. (Osborn Correctional Institution, Connecticut)

2003

U.S. Appeals Court
SMOKE

Atkinson v. Taylor, 316 F.3d 257 (3rd Cir. 2003). An inmate brought a suit under § 1983 claiming that prison officials violated his Eighth Amendment rights by exposing him to environmental tobacco smoke (ETS) that created a serious medical need and posed an unreasonable risk of harm. The district court denied summary judgment for the defendants and they appealed. The appeals court held that the defendant officials were not entitled to qualified immunity on the ETS claim because the right of a prisoner not to be subject to the risk posed by ETS was clearly established, and there was evidence that the inmate was housed for over seven months with "constant" smokers and that officials knew that tobacco smoke was dangerous. The inmate alleged that he suffered numerous symptoms as a result of his exposure to ETS and that no change was made in his housing conditions after he told prison officials about his sensitivity to ETS. (Delaware Multi-Purpose Crim. Justice Facility)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEARCHES

Calhoun v. Detella, 319 F.3d 936 (7th Cir. 2003). A male state prisoner sued prison employees under § 1983, alleging that a strip search conducted in the presence of female officers violated his Eighth Amendment rights. The district court dismissed the case for failure to state a claim and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, and vacated and remanded in part. The appeals court held that the prisoner's allegations stated an Eighth Amendment claim. The prisoner alleged that he was strip searched in front of female officers, that the officers made explicit gestures during the search and forced him to perform sexually provocative acts, and that the female officers were invited spectators. The appeals court also held that the Civil Rights of Institutionalized Persons Act (CRIPA) that barred federal civil actions by prisoners for mental or emotional injuries without a showing of physical injury, did not foreclose an action for nominal or punitive damages for violations that did not involve a physical injury. (Stateville Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
SEPARATION
LIGHTING
EXERCISE

Freeman v. Berge, 283 F.Supp.2d 1009 (W.D.Wis. 2003). An inmate challenged the conditions of his confinement. The district court granted qualified immunity to the defendants, finding that depriving an inmate of sensory stimulation or social interaction did not violate the inmate's clearly established rights. The inmate alleged he was denied access to the outdoors, was subject to 24-hour lighting and audio and video monitoring. The court noted that agreement among mental health professionals regarding the deleterious effects of solitary confinement did not translate into legal notice that the defendants may have been violating the Eighth Amendment. (Supermax Correctional Facility, Boscobel, Wisconsin)

U.S. District Court
SMOKE

Gill v. Smith, 283 F.Supp.2d 763 (N.D.N.Y. 2003). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against a correctional officer, alleging violation of his Eighth Amendment rights by exposure to environmental tobacco smoke (ETS.) The district court held that it was clearly established that prison officials could violate the Eighth Amendment through deliberate indifference to an inmate's exposure to levels of ETS, and that genuine fact issues precluded summary judgment in favor of the officer. The inmate suffered from chronic asthma and breathing conditions, and alleged that the officer smoked while on duty in the law library, the general library, while at his assigned post, while traversing in and about the prison's media center, and while at the law library desk. The inmate allegedly repeatedly asked the officer not to smoke near him. (Auburn Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
CELLS
DOUBLE CELLING

Hurst v. Snyder, 63 Fed.Appx. 240 (7th Cir. 2003) [unpublished]. A state prison inmate brought an action against prison officials, alleging that he was deprived of adequate living space. The district court dismissed the case as frivolous and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The appeals court held that a former state statute that required prison facilities to provide at least 50 square feet of cell space per person did not give the inmate a protected liberty interest in having 50 square feet of cell space. The court found that the amendment of the statute, to delete the express reference to a "per person" space requirement, did not violate the ex post facto clause. (Menard Correctional Center, Illinois)

2004

U.S. District Court
THREATS

Booth v. King, 346 F.Supp.2d 751 (E.D.Pa. 2004). An inmate brought a pro se § 1983 action against employees and former employees of a city prison system. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants in part, and denied in part. The court held that the inmate failed to show that he suffered actual injury due to the alleged restrictions imposed on his access to the prison law library, opening of his legal mail outside of his presence, and destruction and confiscation of his legal papers. The court found that correctional officers did not violate the inmate's Eighth Amendment right against cruel and unusual punishment when they allegedly verbally abused him and threatened him with false reports, mail tampering, or violence. The court noted that verbal abuse and threats will not, without some reinforcing act accompanying them, sustain an Eighth Amendment claim. (Curran Fromhold Correctional Facility, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania)

U.S. Appeals Court
TEMPERATURE

Chandler v. Crosby, 379 F.3d 1278 (11th Cir. 2004). Death row inmates brought a class action against state prison officials, alleging that high temperatures in their prison cells during the summer months amounted to cruel and unusual punishment. The district court denied relief following a bench trial and the inmates appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the inmates failed to satisfy the objective component of their Eighth Amendment claim. The court found that the heat was not constitutionally excessive because the building mass generally remained between 80 degrees at night, and 85 to 86 degrees during the day. During the relevant period, the unit experienced temperatures over 90 degrees only nine percent of the time, recorded temperatures over 95 degrees only seven times, and never recorded temperatures over 100 degrees. The court noted that the building, although not air conditioned, had an effective ventilation system, and numerous conditions such as access to cold water, alleviated rather than exacerbated the heat. (Union Correctional Institution, Florida)

U.S. Appeals Court
FAILURE TO PROTECT

Christopher v. Buss, 384 F.3d 879 (7th Cir. 2004). A state inmate brought a § 1983 action alleging that failure to correct an allegedly defective condition on a prison softball field constituted cruel and unusual punishment. The district court dismissed the case and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that an allegedly “protrusive lip” on a softball field, even if it was hazardous when a ball hit it in a certain way, did not amount to a condition which was objectively serious enough to implicate the Eighth Amendment. The inmate claimed that a softball had bounced up and permanently damaged his eye. (Westville Correctional Facility, Indiana)

U.S. Appeals Court
LETHAL INJECTION

Cooper v. Rimmer, 379 F.3d 1029 (9th Cir. 2004). A state prisoner sentenced to death by lethal injection filed a § 1983 action, alleging that the lethal injection process violates the Eighth Amendment. The district court denied relief and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the prisoner failed to show that the lethal injection procedure involved an unnecessary risk of unconstitutional pain or suffering. The court found that medical evidence established that the injection mixture would render the vast majority of individuals unconscious and unable to breathe within 60 seconds from the start of the administration of the drugs. (California State Prison at San Quentin)

U.S. Appeals Court
LIGHTING
LAUNDRY
TEMPERATURE

Gates v. Cook, 376 F.3d 323 (5th Cir. 2004). A death row prisoner brought a suit on behalf of himself and other prisoners confined to death row, alleging that certain conditions of confinement on death row violated the Eighth Amendment's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment. The district court found that a number of conditions violated the Eighth Amendment and issued an injunction designed to alleviate the conditions. The defendants appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part and vacated in part. The court held that the prison's accreditation by a national correctional association (American Correctional Association) was not proof that the conditions of confinement did not violate the Eighth Amendment. The court noted that compliance with association standards could be a relevant consideration, but was not evidence of constitutionality. The court held that evidence supported findings that the probability of heat-related illness was extreme at the death row unit in which the class members were housed, and that corrections officials had displayed deliberate indifference. The court found that lighting in each death row cell was less than twenty foot-candles, in violation of the constitutional rights of the class members. Expert testimony was presented that lighting in the cells was grossly inadequate for the purposes of sanitation, personal hygiene and reading, and that these conditions contributed to further mental health deterioration. The court did not find a constitutional violation in the condition of the inmate laundry, which required inmates to wash their own clothes with bar soap. The court found that parts of the district court injunction that applied to sections of the death row unit that did not house class members exceeded the scope of the litigation and were invalid. The injunction directed the prison to provide fans, ice water, and daily showers when the heat index was 90 degrees or above, or to make such arrangements from May through September. The court found an Eighth Amendment violation due to mosquito infestation coupled with insufficient screen gauge, which exacerbated the heat problems by deterring death row inmates from opening their windows to increase circulation. The court noted that pest infestation problems were linked to chronic sleep deprivation, which exacerbated the symptoms of mental illness. The court found a violation due to “ping-pong” toilets, and that corrections officials were deliberately indifferent to the risk of harm that these toilets presented to death row inmates. Experts established that a serious health hazard resulted when the feces of one inmate bubbled up in the neighboring cell, and that this was exacerbated when toilets overflowed. According to the court, the State Department of Health warned corrections officials every year for the past eleven years that the malfunctioning toilets were a critical public health problem that required immediate attention. According to the court, inmates were afforded insufficient mental health care, in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The court cited the isolation and idleness, squalor, poor hygiene, temperature, and the noise of extremely psychotic prisoners, which created an environment that was “toxic” to the prisoners' mental health.

U.S. District Court
LETHAL INJECTION

Harris v. Johnson, 323 F.Supp.2d 797 (S.D.Tex. 2004). A death row prison inmate brought a civil rights action under § 1983 alleging that the protocol for lethal injection used by Texas violated the Eighth Amendment's prohibition of cruel and unusual punishment. The district court granted a temporary restraining order, staying the execution. The court held that the particular combination of chemicals used by Texas was not the only available means of causing death by lethal injection, and the inmate had presented two "lethal-injection alternatives that would not cause undue pain and suffering." (Texas Department of Criminal Justice, Institutional Division)

U.S. District Court
SMOKING

Johnson v. Pearson, 316 F.Supp.2d 307 (E.D.Va. 2004). A prisoner brought a civil rights action under § 1983 against state prison officials, alleging that they acted with deliberate indifference to his risk of medical harm when they refused to assign him to a nonsmoking cell. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants in part, and denied in part. The court held that the defendants acted with deliberate indifference to the risk of serious damage to the prisoner's future health as the result of his exposure to environmental tobacco smoke, and that the defendants were not entitled to qualified immunity from the prisoner's future injury claims. The court also held that the prisoner's allegations regarding present injuries from environmental tobacco smoke stated a cognizable claim under the Eighth Amendment, and that the defendants were not entitled to qualified immunity from that claim. The inmate alleged that he experienced mild headaches, difficulty breathing, eye irritation, runny nose, dizziness, and occasional stomach cramping when he was housed with a smoking inmate. The court noted that officials never considered the consequences of future health problems when they refused to transfer the inmate to a nonsmoking cell, but were only concerned with administrative convenience. (Sussex II State Prison, Virginia)

U.S. Appeals Court
HARASSMENT

Johnson v. Unknown Dellatifa, 357 F.3d 539 (6th Cir. 2004). A pro se state prisoner brought separate § 1983 actions against various prison officials and staff. The district court dismissed the actions and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court consolidated the cases, and affirmed. The court held that the prisoner's allegations of harassment by a corrections officer, if true, "demonstrated shameful and utterly unprofessional behavior" but did not violate the Eighth Amendment. The prisoner alleged that the officer banged and kicked on his door, threw his food tray through the slot in the cell door, made aggravating remarks to him, growled and snarled at him, behaved in a racially prejudicial manner toward him, and jerked and pulled the him unnecessarily hard when escorting him from his cell. (Marquette Branch Prison, Michigan)

U.S. Appeals Court
TEMPERATURE

Jones-El v. Berge, 374 F.3d 541 (7th Cir. 2004). Prisoners of a "supermax" prison brought a suit challenging their conditions of confinement. After the plaintiff class was certified and a preliminary injunction was entered, a consent decree was approved by the court. The prisoners subsequently moved to enforce the decree. The district court entered an order directing the installation of air conditioning and the defendants appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the district court's order was not a grant of "prospective relief" that was subject to the requirements of the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA). (Wisconsin Secure Program Facility)

U.S. District Court
TOILETS

Masonoff v. Dubois, 336 F.Supp.2d 54 (D.Mass. 2004). State inmates filed a class action under § 1983 alleging that conditions of their confinement violated their Eighth Amendment rights. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants in part, and denied it in part. The court held that the facility's superintendent and administrator were not entitled to qualified immunity because a prisoner's right to adequate and hygienic means to dispose of his bodily wastes was clearly established in 1991. The court noted that a state court had required prison officials to inspect toilets at least twice per month and issued specific directions regarding their inspection, cleaning and replacement. The officials allegedly did nothing to alleviate obvious sanitation problems associated with the cleaning and maintenance of the toilets. (Southeast Correctional Center, Massachusetts)

U.S. District Court
LETHAL INJECTION

Reid v. Johnson, 333 F.Supp.2d 543 (E.D.Va. 2004). A death row inmate filed a § 1983 action alleging the means by which the state intended to carry out his execution violated the Eighth Amendment ban on cruel and unusual punishment. The district court dismissed the action and the inmate appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. On remand, the district court denied the inmate's motion for a preliminary injunction. The court found that the inmate was not likely to suffer irreparable harm as the result of the state's mechanism for carrying out the sentence of death by lethal injection. The court held that the possibility that there could be some minor difficulty locating the vein for lethal injection did not subject the inmate to offensive punishment, in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The inmate alleged that there was a possibility that the sedative to be used would not function properly, but the court noted that the chance the inmate would be conscious of any pain was less than 6/1000 of one percent. The court noted that the inmate had chosen lethal injection over the constitutionally-acceptable method of electrocution. (Virginia Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court RESTRAINTS FOOD ISOLATION TOILETS	Ziamba v. Armstrong, 343 F.Supp.2d 173 (D.Conn. 2004). A state inmate filed a civil rights action alleging that prison officials failed to provide constitutionally adequate health care, failed to protect him from the use of excessive force, and used excessive force. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants in part, and denied it in part. The district court held that fact issues remained as to whether a prison supervisor adequately trained correctional officers with respect to the use of four-point restraints, and failed to respond to reports and complaints of use of force against the inmate. The court denied qualified immunity, finding that a reasonable prison official ought to have understood in 1998 that it was a constitutional violation to restrain a mentally ill prisoner for twenty-two hours, with no penal justification, no food or water, and no access to a bathroom. (Northern Correctional Institution, Connecticut) 2005
U.S. District Court MEDICAL CARE SMOKE	Bartlett v. Pearson, 406 F.Supp.2d 626 (E.D.Va. 2005). A state prison inmate who was a non-smoker suffering from asthma, brought a § 1983 Eighth Amendment action against corrections officials alleging that being housed in a cell and housing unit with inmates who smoked endangered his health. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held the officials were not deliberately indifferent to the inmate's request for non-smoking housing and they were not indifferent to the inmate's asthma. The court noted that an allegation that exposure to environmental tobacco smoke (ETS) posed an unreasonable risk of serious damage to future health is cognizable under the Eighth Amendment. The prison had a policy aimed at limiting, when practicable, inmates' exposure to ETS, and they twice offered the inmate the option of residing in special or segregated housing. The inmate was moved to a non-smoking area after being housed with smokers for a total of 17 weeks, which the court found to be "not unreasonable" given the level of crowding at the prison and the fact that safety concerns took precedence over smoking preferences. (Sussex II State Prison, Virginia)
U.S. Appeals Court LETHAL INJECTION	Beardslee v. Woodford, 395 F.3d 1064 (9th Cir. 2005). A death row inmate filed a § 1983 action alleging that his execution pursuant to a state's lethal injection protocol would violate his Eighth Amendment right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment and his First Amendment right to freedom of speech. The district court denied the inmate's motion for a preliminary injunction and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed, and the United States Supreme Court denied certiorari. The appeals court held that the inmate failed to establish the likelihood that he would be sufficiently conscious during the administration of lethal drugs to experience pain. (California State Prison at San Quentin)
U.S. Appeals Court SANITATION TEMPERATURE TOILETS	Hearns v. Terhune, 413 F.3d 1036 (9th Cir. 2005). A state prison inmate brought a § 1983 action alleging violation of his Eighth Amendment rights related to an attack in prison, and inhumane conditions in a disciplinary segregation unit. The district court dismissed the action and the inmate appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The court held that the inmate's allegations stated a claim that conditions were sufficiently serious to form the basis for an Eighth Amendment violation. The inmate alleged that there was a lack of drinkable water in the prison yard, where temperatures exceeded one hundred degrees. The inmate also alleged that conditions in disciplinary segregation created serious health hazards, including toilets that did not work, sinks that were rusted, and stagnant pools of water that were infested with insects. (Calipatria State Prison, California)
U.S. Appeals Court SMOKE-FREE ENVIRONMENT	Kelley v. Hicks, 400 F.3d 1282 (11th Cir. 2005). A prisoner brought an action under § 1983 alleging that prison officials were deliberately indifferent to his future health by allowing him to be exposed to harmful levels of environmental tobacco smoke while he was incarcerated. The district court granted summary judgment for the officials and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court held that the prisoner failed to establish that the warden and assistant warden were deliberately indifferent to the prisoner's future health. The court noted that the facility had a no-smoking policy in place, and any prisoner caught smoking within the facility would be disciplined. According to the court, the prisoner failed to show that the ventilation system was not sufficient. The court found that the prisoner showed at most, that the warden and assistant warden were negligent in enforcing the non-smoking policy. (Coffee County Correctional Facility, Georgia)
U.S. District Court LIGHTING	King v. Frank, 371 F.Supp.2d 977 (W.D.Wis. 2005). A state prison inmate brought a § 1983 action against corrections officials, alleging undue restrictions on telephone usage and access to written publications, improper cell illumination, and failure to provide adequate mental health care. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the officials. The court held that the inmate was not deprived of a basic human need by the presence of a constantly illuminated nine-watt fluorescent light in his cell, even though he alleged that the light caused him sleeplessness and other problems. The court noted that a registered nurse and a psychologist both examined the inmate and concluded that he suffered no ill effects. The court found that the mental health care that the inmate received was adequate, noting that the inmate received treatment not only from the prison's psychological services unit, but also from his unit's supervisor as well. (Waupun Correctional Institution, Wisconsin)

U.S. Appeals Court
SMOKE

Larson v. Kempker, 405 F.3d 645 (8th Cir. 2005). A state inmate brought an action under § 1983 and the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA), alleging that he was not adequately protected from exposure to second-hand cigarette smoke while he was imprisoned. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the inmate was not entitled to a preliminary injunction. The court held that there was no objective evidence that the inmate was subjected to unreasonably high levels of environmental tobacco smoke (ETS) and no scientific tests were conducted to establish the levels of ETS in his cell. (Crossroads Correctional Center, Missouri)

U.S. Appeals Court
SMOKE

Larson v. Kempker, 414 F.3d 936 (8th Cir. 2005). An inmate brought a civil rights action against prison officials alleging that he was exposed to excessive cigarette smoke while he was confined. The district court awarded summary judgment in favor of the officials and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that evidence was insufficient to establish that the inmate was exposed to unreasonable levels of environmental tobacco smoke (ETS). The court noted that the inmate's expert performed no scientific tests to establish the level of ETS in the inmate's cell, and the inmate did not present any other reliable basis to estimate levels of ETS to which he was exposed, or evidence concerning how those levels of ETS would affect his future health. (Crossroads Correctional Center, Missouri)

U.S. District Court
FAILURE TO PROTECT

Little v. Shelby County, Tenn., 384 F.Supp.2d 1169 (W.D.Tenn. 2005). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against a county and sheriff, alleging that he had been raped in jail in violation of his Eighth Amendment rights. The county stipulated to liability and an order of injunctive relief was issued. Later, the district court found the county in contempt, and the county sought to purge itself of the contempt finding. The court entered a purgation order. The court held that the county and sheriff complied with the Eighth Amendment and purged themselves of contempt through the adoption of a structured reform to correct conditions that included violence, rape and gang control among inmates. In reaching its conclusion, the court considered whether officials took all reasonable steps within their power to comply with the order, which included whether they marshaled their own resources, asserted their highest authority, and demanded the results needed from subordinate persons and agencies in order to effectuate the course of action required by the order. The court praised the county, noting that it had adopted a focused, systemic and information-driven structural reform based on critical expert assessment of essential institutional functions. The county adopted a 14-point remedial scheme that included implementing direct supervision management of inmate cellblocks, improving population management, collecting and utilizing data, and installing an objective inmate classification system. (Shelby County Jail, Tennessee)

U.S. District Court
TEMPERATURE
VENTILATION

Moody v. Kearney, 380 F.Supp.2d 393 (D.Del. 2005). A state inmate filed a § 1983 action alleging that prison officials locked him in an unventilated room, causing him to suffer a severely debilitating heat stroke. The district court dismissed the case and the inmate appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. On remand, the district court granted summary judgment for the defendants in part, and denied it in part. The court held that the inmate stated a claim for deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs and that fact issues remained as to whether a private contractor that provided medical services for the prison had a policy of not protecting vulnerable inmates from high temperatures. The inmate alleged that he was receiving anticholinergic medication and was therefore particularly vulnerable to heat stroke, and that prison officials knew about this vulnerability but acted with deliberate indifference by keeping him in a room with no windows, no ventilation, or access to running water when the temperature inside the facility was 120 degrees. (State Correctional Institution, Georgetown, Delaware)

U.S. Appeals Court
SMOKE

Patel v. Fleming, 415 F.3d 1105 (10th Cir. 2005). A pro se prisoner brought a § 1983 action against prison officials, challenging his conditions of incarceration at two federal correctional facilities. The district court dismissed the action and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the prisoner failed to meet the exhaustion requirements of the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA). The prisoner alleged that his Eighth Amendment rights were violated by his forced exposure to secondhand smoke. (Federal Correctional Institute, El Reno, and Federal Transfer Center, Oklahoma)

U.S. District Court
ISOLATION
LIGHTING

Scarver v. Litscher, 371 F.Supp.2d 986 (W.D.Wis. 2005). A state prison inmate sued officials seeking damages for their alleged indifference to his illness and challenging his conditions of confinement. The district court entered judgment in favor of the officials. The court held that the officials did not show deliberate indifference to the inmate's mental illness condition, because he was examined and prescribed various antipsychotic medications. The inmate alleged that the only deficiency in his treatment was that officials failed to provide art supplies when they were requested. The court found that there were fact issues as to whether the inmate was subjected to conditions that were severe enough to violate the Eighth Amendment, but that the officials had qualified immunity from the inmate's damages suit. The court held that placing the mentally ill inmate in a continuously-illuminated maximum security cell without windows was not clearly established to be an Eighth Amendment violation at the time they placed the inmate in the most extreme isolation section of the maximum security prison. (Wisconsin Secure Program Facility)

U.S. Appeals Court
SMOKE
VENTILATION

Talal v. White, 403 F.3d 423 (6th Cir. 2005). An inmate brought an action against a state corrections department and individual officials alleging that his exposure to environmental tobacco smoke (ETS) violated his Eighth Amendment rights. The district court dismissed the claim and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The court held that the prisoner stated a claim that satisfied the objective component of the test for determining deliberate indifference based on exposure to ETS, by alleging that he had been subjected to excessive levels of ETS at the hands of both staff and other inmates and that the prison's ventilation system merely re-circulated smoke-filled air. The inmate provided medical documentation that he suffered from an ETS allergy and establishing that smoke caused him sinus problems and dizziness. The inmate's complaint and exhibits indicated that prison officials were aware of the inmate's ETS allergy and that they smoked and allowed prisoners to smoke in the prison's non-smoking units. (Turney Center Industrial Center, Tennessee)

U.S. District Court
MEDICAL CARE

Valdes v. Crosby, 390 F.Supp.2d 1084 (M.D.Fla. 2005). The estate of an inmate who died in prison after an alleged beating by correctional officers brought a § 1983 action against prison officials and prison nurses. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants in part, and denied it in part. The court found that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact on a supervisory liability claim against a warden. The court concluded that nurses were not liable under § 1983 where a nurse's physical examination of the inmate following alleged abuse by officers during the extraction of the inmate from his cell revealed that the inmate suffered only minor injuries consistent with those seen by medical personnel in prisons following cell extractions. The court held that any delay in the nurse's response to a call for immediate medical help for the inmate did not create or exacerbate injuries the inmate received from an alleged beating by prison officers, since the nurse arrived within minutes of receiving the call and officers were attending to the inmate's medical needs by administering cardiopulmonary resuscitation. (Florida State Prison)

U.S. Appeals Court
CAPITAL PUNISHMENT
LETHAL INJECTION

White v. Johnson, 429 F.3d 572 (5th Cir. 2005). A prisoner who had been sentenced to death brought a § 1983 action seeking injunctive relief, alleging that the state's method of execution by lethal injection violated his constitutional rights. The district court dismissed the action because the inmate had waited for more than six years to challenge the procedures the state had been using for his entire stay on death row. (Texas Department of Criminal Justice, Institutional Division)

U.S. District Court LIGHTS
LIGHTING

Wills v. Terhune, 404 F.Supp.2d 1226 (E.D.Cal. 2005). A state prison inmate brought a § 1983 action alleging that constant illumination in the prison's security housing unit constituted cruel and unusual punishment. The inmate moved for a preliminary injunction. The court denied the motion. The court held that the constant illumination did not constitute an unsafe condition of confinement and that the defendants established a valid security purpose for the lighting. The inmate alleged that the low wattage bulb prevented his sleep, but conceded that it was not bright enough to read or write by. (California State Prison, Corcoran)

2006

U.S. District Court
SMOKE

Abdullah v. Washington, 437 F.Supp.2d 137 (D.D.C. 2006). An inmate brought a pro se civil rights action under § 1983 against the District of Columbia and certain jail officials, in their individual and official capacities, seeking damages related to his alleged exposure to second-hand tobacco smoke while confined at a jail. The district court granted the officials' motion to dismiss in part, and denied in part. The court held that the inmate's allegations that he was subjected to an intolerable level of second-hand tobacco smoke while confined at the jail, and that jail officials were deliberately indifferent to his condition because they did not resolve the numerous grievances he filed on the issue, were sufficient to support an Eighth Amendment claim based on exposure to environmental tobacco smoke (ETS). The court found that the inmate's Eighth Amendment right to be free from levels of second-hand smoke that posed an unreasonable risk of serious damage to the inmate's future health was clearly established, and thus, the officials were not entitled to qualified immunity. (District of Columbia Department of Corrections, Central Detention Facility)

U.S. District Court
USE OF FORCE

Avratin v. Bermudez, 420 F.Supp.2d 1121 (S.D.Cal. 2006). A prisoner who was involved in a fight with another inmate brought a civil rights action against a corrections officer, alleging that the officer used excessive force in attempting to stop the fight. The officer moved for summary judgment and the district court granted the motion. The court held that the officer's alleged conduct of firing a wooden projectile from a launcher directly at an unarmed prisoner involved in a fight with another inmate, causing a severe injury to the inmate's leg, violated the prisoner's Eighth Amendment right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment. The court noted that no correctional officers, prison personnel or other inmates were at immediate risk during the fight and the officer failed to use any lesser degree of force before firing his launcher. However, the court found that the officer was entitled to qualified immunity for his alleged conduct because it would not be clear to a reasonable officer that the alleged conduct was unlawful, as a reasonable officer could conclude that the fight posed a risk of serious bodily injury, the officer aimed at the prisoner's leg, virtually eliminating the risk that the prisoner would suffer a life-threatening injury, the fight occurred in a heightened security setting with numerous other inmates present in the yard, and the prisoner and other inmate refused orders to desist. (Centinela State Prison, California)

U.S. District Court
SMOKE-FREE
ENVIRONMENT

Bacon v. Taylor, 414 F.Supp.2d 475 (D.Del. 2006). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against three correctional officers, alleging denial of his First Amendment right of access to courts, retaliation for exercising his First Amendment free speech rights, and cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants in part, and denied it in part. The court held that the prisoner's allegations that a correctional officer, on one occasion, smoked a cigarette on the tier by another inmate's cell and blew smoke into that inmate's cell, and that on several occasions the correctional officer smoked in the isolated control pod, did not sufficiently allege that the prisoner was exposed to unreasonably high levels of environmental tobacco smoke (ETS) to the degree necessary to state claim a under § 1983 for violation of the Eighth Amendment. (Howard R. Young Correctional Institution, Delaware)

U.S. District Court
LETHAL INJECTION

Evans v. Saar, 412 F.Supp.2d 519 (D.Md 2006). A prison inmate sued a state under § 1983 seeking a temporary restraining order barring his execution by lethal injection, pending review of his claim that a three-drug protocol constituted cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The district court denied the motion. The court found that intravenous sodium pentothal, administered in a massive dose, would ensure profound unconsciousness before the lethal drugs pancuronium bromide (Pavulon) and potassium chloride were administered. The court noted that while there were problems with the inmate's veins caused by years of drug abuse, medical experts confirmed they were adequate, and placement of medically-trained observers in the room next to the execution chamber was an acceptable compromise between the need to have them available and the need for them to remain anonymous. (Maryland Department of Public Safety and Correctional Services)

U.S. Appeals Court
OUTDOOR EXERCISE
SEGREGATION

Fogle v. Pierson, 435 F.3d 1252 (10th Cir. 2006). A state prisoner brought a civil rights action against state prison officials. The district court dismissed the action and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded. The court held that the district court abused its discretion when it found that the inmate's three-year period of administrative segregation, during which time the prisoner was confined to his cell for all but five hours each week and denied access to any outdoor exercise, was not "atypical" in violation of the prisoner's due process rights. (Limon Correctional Facility, Colorado)

U.S. Appeals Court
FOOD

Freeman v. Berge, 441 F.3d 543 (7th Cir. 2006). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against prison officials, alleging cruel and unusual punishment. After a jury returned a verdict in favor of the inmate, the district court granted judgment as a matter of law for the defendants, and the inmate appealed. The court of appeals affirmed. The court held that the prison's feeding rule requiring that, when meals were delivered to an inmate's cell, the inmate had to be wearing trousers or gym shorts, was a reasonable condition to the receipt of food in light of security issues and respect for female security officers' privacy. The court found that prison officials' withholding of food from the inmate when he refused to put on trousers or shorts did not constitute the use of food deprivation as punishment, for the purposes of the Eighth Amendment prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment. The court found that prison officials' withholding of food from the inmate when he wore a sock on his head when meals were delivered to his cell was a reasonable condition to the receipt of the food, in light of security issues presented by the possibility that a sock could be used as a weapon if something was inside it. According to the court, withholding of food from the inmate when he refused to remove the sock from his head did not constitute the use of food deprivation as punishment. Inmates in the Supermax are fed their three meals a day in their cells. The prison's rule requires that the prisoner stand in the middle of his cell with the lights on when the meal is delivered and that he be wearing trousers or gym shorts. If the inmate does not comply with the rule, the meal is not served to him. The inmate wanted to eat in his underwear, and on a number of occasions over a two-and-a-half-year period he refused to put on pants or gym shorts. As a result was not served. Because he skipped so many meals he lost 45 pounds. (Wisconsin Maximum Security Facility, "Supermax")

U.S. Appeals Court
ISOLATION
FOOD CLOTHING
BEDDING

Gillis v. Litscher, 468 F.3d 488 (7th Cir. 2006). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 claim against prison officials, alleging that a behavioral modification program imposed on him violated his Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment rights. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the officials and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court vacated and remanded, finding that fact issues precluded summary judgment. According to the court, there were fact issues as to whether the prisoner, who was subjected to a behavioral modification program, was denied the minimal civilized measure of life's necessities and whether prison officials acted with disregard of a substantial risk of serious harm to the prisoner. The appeals court opinion opened with the following statement. "Stripped naked in a small prison cell with nothing except a toilet; forced to sleep on a concrete floor or slab; denied any human contact; fed nothing but 'nutri-loaf'; and given just a modicum of toilet paper-four squares-only a few times. Although this might sound like a stay at a Soviet gulag in the 1930s, it is, according to the claims in this case, Wisconsin in 2002. Whether these conditions are, as a matter of law, only "uncomfortable, but not unconstitutional" as the State contends, is the issue we consider in this case." The facility is an all-segregation facility, designed to house recalcitrant inmates. At the time of this case, the facility used a five-level system of inmate classification, with Level One being the most restrictive. All inmates were placed in Level One upon their arrival at the prison. (Wisconsin Secure Prog. Facil., Boscobel)

U.S. District Court
EXERCISE

Hurd v. Garcia, 454 F.Supp.2d 1032 (S.D.Cal. 2006). A state inmate filed a § 1983 action alleging that conditions of his confinement during a lock down violated his constitutional rights. The court held that suspension of outdoor exercise at the state prison for 150 days was not motivated by prison officials' deliberate indifference or malicious and sadistic intent to harm or punish the inmate, and thus did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment in violation of Eighth Amendment. The court noted that the entire unit was locked down as the result of a riot between African-American and Caucasian inmates, and restrictions on outdoor exercise were instituted for the primary purpose of preventing further race-based attacks, injuries, and homicides. (Calipatria State Prison, California)

U.S. District Court
DOUBLE CELLING
SANITATION
SMOKE

Jones v. Goord, 435 F.Supp.2d 221 (S.D.N.Y. 2006). Inmates brought an action against New York prison officials, challenging the double-celling policy at maximum-security prisons. Double-celling is a practice in which two prisoners are housed in a cell originally designed for one person. The complaint was filed in 1995, and was effectively stayed for some time pending litigation of a companion case challenging the same practice in medium security prisons. After a full trial on the merits, the district court in the medium security case denied the plaintiffs any relief.

The district court dismissed all of the inmates' class claims, but reserved decisions on individual plaintiffs' claims for damages under the Eighth Amendment and the First Amendment. The court held that the practice of double-celling, and the undesirable conditions allegedly created by double-celling of inmates, including facts that inmates were forced to sleep near a toilet, were exposed to cellmates' odors, and kept excess personal property in their cells, did not violate the Eighth Amendment.

The court found that Muslim inmates' claim that double-celling interfered with their First Amendment right to free exercise of religion was not moot after they were no longer being double-celled, where many of the inmates were double-celled on numerous occasions for short periods of time, and the policy of double-celling inmates continued. The defendant's voluntary cessation of a challenged practice does not deprive a federal court of its power to determine the legality of the practice. According to the court, even assuming that the policy of double-celling some inmates in New York's maximum-security prisons burdened religious practices of Muslim inmates by making it difficult for them to pray in their cells. According to the court, the policy was rationally related to the legitimate goal of finding sufficient bed space to house all maximum security inmates, and thus did not violate the inmates' right to free exercise of religion. The court ruled that the inmates were not entitled to amend their complaint to add a claim under the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA).

The court noted that the Eighth Amendment does not guarantee prisoners freedom from any and all sorts of unsavory environs, and that to the extent that conditions are restrictive and even harsh, they are part of the penalty that criminal offenders pay for their offenses against society.

According to the court, the practice of double-celling inmates did not result in a substantial risk of serious harm to inmates due to violence, in violation of the Eighth Amendment, where incident reports indicated that six years after the implementation of the double-celling policy, inmates generally faced a lower risk of assault than they did before the policy was implemented, and there was no evidence that any under-reporting of assaults affected the reporting of incidents in double cells more than the reporting of incidents generally.

The court also found that injury and disease allegedly caused by double-celling did not create an unreasonable risk of serious damage to inmates' health, in violation of the Eighth Amendment, noting that although nine inmates had been injured getting into or out of the top bunk in their cells, and six inmates caught colds from their cellmates, there was no evidence that the design or placement of the bunks was unsafe, or that any inmate actually contracted, or was even exposed to, a serious disease from his cellmate in a double cell.

The court ruled that alleged exposure to excessive levels of secondhand smoke in double cells did not create an unreasonable risk of serious damage to inmates' future health, in violation of the Eighth Amendment, where the state had banned smoking in all its prison facilities, and there was no evidence that inmates in double cells were exposed to unreasonably high levels of secondhand smoke after that policy was adopted. (New York Department of Correctional Services)

U.S. District Court
SEGREGATION

McGoldrick V. Farrington, 462 F.Supp.2d 112 (D.Me. 2006). An inmate brought a civil rights action against state prison officials alleging cruel and unusual punishment and violation of due process. The defendants filed a motion to dismiss. The court held that the prisoner failed to allege any physical injury, and was not deprived of due process. According to the court, the inmate's loss of mattress privileges while housed in the Special Management Unit failed to allege any physical injury that resulted from the removal of his mattress, as required to bring a civil rights action for mental or emotional injury suffered while in custody. (Maine State Prison)

U.S. Appeals Court
LETHAL INJECTION

Morales v. Hickman, 438 F.3d 926 (9th Cir. 2006). A death row inmate brought a § 1983 action against a warden, seeking to enjoin a state from executing him by lethal injection, and alleging that, due to a combination of circumstances, execution by lethal injection pursuant to a prison's protocol would constitute cruel and unusual punishment. The inmate petitioned for a stay of execution. The district court entered an order permitting the execution and the inmate appealed. The court of appeals held that the district court did not abuse its discretion in modifying the lethal injection protocol so as to give the state the option of having an anesthesiologist present to insure that the inmate was unconscious during the lethal injection procedure. The district court found substantial questions as to whether the protocol would constitute cruel and unusual punishment by creating undue risk that the inmate would suffer excessive pain, and as to whether a person rendered unconscious by sodium thiopental might regain consciousness. The court-modified protocol did not render the anesthesiologist powerless, but clearly contemplated that he or she would have the authority to take steps to immediately place or return the inmate into an unconscious state or to alleviate pain if necessary. The inmate had alleged that a combination of circumstances, including the specific drugs chosen, the procedure by which the drugs are administered, and the absence of medically trained personnel overseeing the execution, created a foreseeable and undue risk that he would experience unnecessary and wanton pain constituting cruel and unusual punishment under the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments. (California State Prison at San Quentin)

U.S. District Court COMMISSARY
CONDITIONS

Pepper v. Carroll, 423 F.Supp.2d 442 (D.Del. 2006). A state inmate filed a § 1983 action alleging that prison officials violated his constitutional rights. The court granted the officials' motion for summary judgment. According to the court, the prison officials' denials of several privileges while the inmate was voluntarily housed in a security housing unit, including extra visits, reading material, exercise, television, cleaning tools, boiling water, ice, razors, and additional writing utensils, were not a sufficiently serious deprivation to support the inmate's claim that the denials constituted cruel and unusual punishment under the Eighth Amendment. The court found that the inmate had no constitutionally protected right to purchase food or other items as cheaply as possible through the prison commissary, and therefore prison officials did not violate the inmate's Eighth Amendment rights by allegedly overcharging for commissary products. (Delaware Correctional Center)

U.S. District Court
TORTURE

Rasul v. Rumsfeld, 414 F.Supp.2d 26 (D.D.C. 2006). Former detainees at a military facility in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, sued the Secretary of Defense and commanding officers, alleging they were tortured. The defendants moved to dismiss and the district court granted the motion in part, and deferred in part. The court held that military personnel supervising the interrogation of detainees at the facility had qualified immunity from a claim that they promoted or condoned torture in violation of Fifth and Eighth Amendment rights of detainees, because the question as to whether the detainees had rights under the constitution had not been resolved by high courts and therefore personnel could not have known that their conduct was wrongful. The court noted that District of Columbia law applied to the question of whether military personnel at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, were acting within the scope of their employment when they allegedly tortured detainees. The prisoners alleged various forms of torture, including hooding, forced nakedness, housing in cages, deprivation of food, forced body cavity searches, subjection to extremes of heat and cold, harassment in the practice of their religion, forced shaving of religious beards, placing the Koran in the toilet, placement in stress positions, beatings with rifle butts, and the use of unmuzzled dogs for intimidation. The court found "most disturbing" their claim that executive members of the United States government were directly responsible for the "depraved conduct the plaintiffs suffered over the course of their detention." (U.S. Naval Station, Guantanamo Bay, Cuba)

U.S. Appeals Court
LIGHTING
NOISE
SEGREGATION

Scarver v. Litscher, 434 F.3d 972 (7th Cir. 2006). A state prisoner brought a civil rights action against officials at a "supermax" prison, alleging that his conditions of confinement had aggravated his mental illness. The district court granted summary judgment for the officials and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the officials did not unconstitutionally subject the prisoner to cruel and unusual punishment, absent evidence that they knew that the conditions were making his mental illness worse. According to the court, prison authorities must be given considerable latitude in the design of measures for controlling homicidal maniacs without exacerbating their manias beyond what is necessary for security. The prisoner alleged that the heat in the cells in the Summer interacted with the his antipsychotic drugs and caused him extreme discomfort, and that the constant illumination of the cells also disturbs psychotics. The prisoner alleged that the low level of noise, without audiotapes, a radio, or any source of sound, prevented him from stilling the voices in his head. (Wisconsin Secure Program Facility)

U.S. Appeals Court
LETHAL INJECTION

Smith v. Johnson, 440 F.3d 262 (5th Cir. 2006). A death row inmate sought injunctive relief pursuant to § 1983, alleging that the lethal injection method of execution used by Texas caused excruciating pain in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The district court dismissed the case and the inmate appealed. The court of appeals held that the inmate's delay in bringing the challenge was not excusable and that the inmate was not entitled to a stay of execution pending a United States Supreme Court's decision in a case that also involved a challenge to this method of execution. The court noted that the inmate's direct appeal had been final for more than nine years and that the lethal injection procedure had been used by Texas during his entire stay on death row. (Texas Department of Criminal Justice, Correctional Institutions Division, Huntsville Unit)

U.S. District Court
SMOKING

Thiel v. Nelson, 422 F.Supp.2d 1024 (W.D.Wis. 2006). Patients who were involuntarily committed to a mental health facility pursuant to a state's sexually violent persons statute filed state court actions challenging a smoking ban enacted at the facility. After removal to federal court, the patients moved to remand, and the officials moved to dismiss the complaint. The district court dismissed the complaint. The court held that the decision to completely ban smoking at the facility was rationally related to legitimate state interests of improving patients' health and safety, reducing fire hazards, maintaining clean and sanitary conditions, and reducing complaints and the threat of litigation from patients who did not smoke. The court found that the smoking ban did not violate the patients' equal protection rights, even if another state detention facility continued to permit its patients to smoke. The court noted that, unlike criminally confined offenders who may be subject to punishment as long as it is not cruel and unusual under the Eighth Amendment, persons who are civilly confined may not be punished. According to the court, involuntarily committed patients may be subjected to conditions that advance goals such as preventing escape and assuring the safety of others. The court also found that the patients were not deprived of their due process right to adequate treatment as result of state's decision to completely ban smoking at facility. (Sand Ridge Secure Treatment Center, Wisconsin)

U.S. District Court
LIGHTING

Walker v. Woodford, 454 F.Supp.2d 1007 (S.D.Cal. 2006). State inmates filed a § 1983 action alleging that prison officials violated their Eighth Amendment rights by refusing to turn off lights in their cells. The inmates alleged that the light prevented them from sleeping adequately, and that this has caused a variety of sleep-related problems. The district court ruled that the state prison's policy prohibiting inmates from covering lights in their cells did not violate the inmates' equal protection rights, even though the policy did not apply in other facilities in the state, absent an allegation that prison officials implemented the policy with the intent to discriminate against inmates, that other inmates at the facility were treated differently, or that inmates at other facilities were similarly situated. (Calipatria State Prison, California)

U.S. District Court
SMOKE

Williams v. District of Columbia, 439 F.Supp.2d 34 (D.D.C. 2006). A former inmate filed a pro se § 1983 action seeking damages for alleged exposure to second-hand tobacco smoke while he was confined in jail. The district court denied the defendants' motion for summary judgment. The court held that the former inmate's allegations that while he was in jail he was subjected to an intolerable level of environmental tobacco smoke (ETS), that such exposure caused health problems at the time he was confined and posed a risk to his future health, and that the individual defendants were deliberately indifferent to his condition, if true, were sufficient to establish an Eighth Amendment violation. The court found that genuine issues of fact existed, precluding summary judgment. The inmate alleged that inmates and staff in his housing unit smoked tobacco, the unit did not have adequate ventilation or windows or doors that could be opened to remove the tobacco smoke, and his cellmate smoked five packs of cigarettes a day and kept a homemade toilet paper wick burning at all times for the purpose of lighting cigarettes. The inmate said that he experienced nausea and nosebleeds, and he filed a number of grievances. (District of Columbia Department of Corrections, Central Detention Facility)

2007

U.S. Appeals Court INJURY
WORK
SAFETY

Ambrose v. Young, 474 F.3d 1070 (8th Cir. 2007). The personal representative for the estate of a state prisoner who was electrocuted while on a prison work detail brought a § 1983 action against state corrections officials. The district court denied the officials' motion for summary judgment and they appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part and reversed in part. The court held that: (1) the deliberate indifference standard applied; (2) the corrections officer in charge of the prisoner's work crew was deliberately indifferent to the serious risk of the prisoner's electrocution; (3) the corrections officer was not entitled to qualified immunity; (4) the supervisory official for the DOC was not deliberately indifferent; and (5) the warden was not deliberately indifferent to the lack of training of the corrections officer in charge of the work crew. The court noted that the prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment applies to the conditions of confinement, and that prison work assignments fall under the ambit of conditions of confinement.

According to the court, the Eighth Amendment forbids knowingly compelling an inmate to perform labor that is beyond an inmate's strength, dangerous to his or her life or health, or unduly painful, and requires supervisors to supervise and train subordinates to prevent the deprivation of the inmate's constitutional rights. The prisoner was on an Emergency Response Team (ERT) when he was killed. ERTs are comprised of minimum-security inmates from South Dakota's four state penitentiaries. The ERTs are dispatched to natural disaster clean-up sites, where they assist in removing downed trees and other debris. The inmates are required to comply with correctional officers' orders and conduct themselves appropriately. The only training the inmate received was watching a chainsaw safety training video. The court held that qualified immunity will be defeated in a § 1983 claim if a government official knew or reasonably should have known that the action he took within his sphere of official responsibility would violate the constitutional rights of the plaintiff, or if he took the action with the malicious intention to cause a deprivation of constitutional rights or other injury. It is enough that the official acted or failed to act despite his knowledge of a substantial risk of serious harm. The court found that the corrections officer had the opportunity to deliberate and think before the electrocution incident occurred. The prisoner was electrocuted by a downed power line and the officer knew that the dangling, live power line created a substantial risk of harm, and despite the risk, the officer told the prisoner and other inmates to stomp out a non-threatening fire within arms reach of the line. The court held that the corrections officer was not entitled to qualified immunity for his deliberately indifferent conduct, in ordering the prisoner and other inmates to stomp out a fire near a dangling live power line, where the law was clearly established at the time of the electrocution incident that knowingly compelling a prisoner to perform labor that was dangerous to his life or health violated the Eighth Amendment. (South Dakota Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
HARASSMENT

Greene v. Mazzuca, 485 F.Supp.2d 447 (S.D.N.Y. 2007). A prisoner brought a pro se § 1983 action against prison officials, alleging harassment in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The district court dismissed the case. The court held that the prison employees' alleged actions of yelling at the prisoner, spitting at him, and threatening him with time in a security housing unit (SHU), if proven, did not rise to the level of cruel and unusual punishment. (Fishkill Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
LETHAL INJECTION

Harbison v. Little, 511 F.Supp.2d 872 (M.D.Tenn. 2007). A state death row inmate brought a § 1983 action alleging that his execution pursuant to Tennessee's lethal injection protocol would violate his Eighth Amendment right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment. A bench trial was held. The court entered judgment for the inmate and ordered injunctive relief. The court held that the three-drug protocol used by the state presented an inherent and unnecessary risk of serious pain. The court found that the Commissioner of Corrections knowingly disregarded such risk by rejecting a proposed one-drug protocol recommended by a protocol committee. The court enjoined the state from executing the inmate under the current execution procedures for lethal injection. (Tennessee Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
MEDICAL CARE

Lee v. Frederick, 519 F.Supp.2d 320 (W.D.N.Y. 2007). A state prison inmate brought a § 1983 suit against corrections staff, claiming deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs, in violation of his Eighth Amendment rights. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The court held that placing the inmate on "TB hold" status unless he consented to take TB medication did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The court noted that the inmate's TB test was negative and that he shared a cell with an inmate who was not on TB hold, but other test results indicated that the inmate's immune system was not functioning properly, and conditions at the facility made it impracticable to completely isolate the inmate from the rest of the population.

The court found that a delay of six or seven hours in obtaining treatment for the inmate's eye condition after he reported the condition to a nurse did not constitute deliberate indifference to the inmate's serious medical needs in violation of the Eighth Amendment's prohibition of cruel and unusual punishment. According to the court, the inmate received treatment at a hospital and made a full recovery, and even assuming that the inmate was in pain during the delay, there was no indication that a nurse or a physician assistant who responded to the report deliberately delayed taking action for the purpose of causing the inmate pain or to prolonging his suffering. (Five Points Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
CONDITIONS
EXERCISE
ISOLATION
SEGREGATION

Maddox v. Berge, 473 F.Supp.2d 888 (W.D.Wis. 2007). A state prisoner brought a civil rights action under § 1983 against prison officials and employees, alleging that his administrative confinement for participating in a riot violated his Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment rights. The court found that allegations that the prisoner was confined to his cell 23 hours a day and that he was denied "outside recreation" while he was in administrative confinement demonstrated injuries from an objectively serious deprivation, for the purposes of his conditions or confinement claim. The court held that the allegation that the prisoner was subjected to 24-hour illumination stated a claim for violation of his Eighth Amendment rights, although the prisoner did not allege that he suffered any adverse effects as a result of the lighting. According to the court, the lack of educational or rehabilitative programming while he was in administrative confinement did not deny the prisoner a minimal civilized measure of life's necessities, in violation of the Eighth Amendment.

The court ruled that a prison requirement that the prisoner leave all of his outgoing nonlegal mail open to be inspected by prison officials did not violate the prisoner's First Amendment rights, where his outgoing mail was not censored or delayed. The court allowed the prisoner to proceed in forma pauperis on his claim that he was denied access to magazines and newspapers in violation of his First Amendment rights.

The district court held that placement of the prisoner in administrative confinement, which subjected him to highly restricted non-face-to-face visits, lack of communication with other prisoners, nearly complete idleness in a cell that was constantly illuminated, lack of recreation, extremely limited out of cell time, and lack of access to any meaningful programming, was not clearly established as conduct that violated a prisoner's Eighth Amendment rights, and therefore the warden and secretary of the corrections department had qualified immunity from the prisoner's damages suit under § 1983. (Green Bay Correctional Institution, Wisconsin)

U.S. Appeals Court
FAILURE TO PROTECT
THREATS

Rodriguez v. Secretary for Dept. of Corrections, 508 F.3d 611 (11th Cir. 2007). A Florida prisoner brought a § 1983 suit against two prison officials, alleging that they violated his Eighth Amendment right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment. The prisoner was assaulted by a fellow prisoner hours after his release from administrative segregation and reentry into the general prison population. The prisoner had asked to be transferred to another institution or to be placed in protective custody. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the chief of prison security, and judgment as a matter of law in favor of an assistant warden, and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court vacated and remanded. The court held summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact existed as to whether the defendants had subjective knowledge that the prisoner faced a substantial risk of serious harm from his former gang members. The court ruled that it was a jury question as to whether the prison security chief's actions "caused" the Eighth Amendment violation. There was evidence that the prisoner told the security chief that he was a former gang member who decided to renounce his membership, that gang members had threatened to kill him when he returned to the compound in retaliation for his renunciation, and that the prison compound was heavily populated with gang members. (Everglades Correctional Inst., Florida)

U.S. District Court
SEARCHES

Teahan v. Wilhelm, 481 F.Supp.2d 1115 (S.D.Cal. 2007). An indigent state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against two correctional officers, challenging the conditions of his confinement. The court dismissed the action. The court held that the prisoner's allegations that prison officials searched his cell numerous times over the course of one evening, resulting in several items of the prisoner's property being seized, did not state a claim of cruel and unusual punishment in violation of Eighth Amendment. (Centinela State Prison, California)

U.S. District Court
CONDITIONS
EXERCISE
ISOLATION
SEPARATION

Wilkinson v. Stalder, 639 F.Supp.2d 654 (M.D.La. 2007). Two state prisoners brought Eighth Amendment claims for cruel and unusual punishment, and claims under state law, against state officials and prison officials, including the Secretary of the Louisiana Department of Public Safety and Corrections, a prison warden, and members of the lockdown review board, relating to the prisoners' extended lockdown of approximately 28 to 35 years in the prison's closed cell restriction (CCR) unit. The prisoners asserted deprivation of sleep, exercise, social contact, and environmental stimulation. Both prisoners had been charged with and convicted of murdering a correctional officer during a riot. The district court granted summary judgment to the defendants in part and denied in part. The court held that the Secretary of Louisiana Department of Public Safety and Corrections was not liable, as a supervisory official, to state prisoners under § 1983 for the alleged violation of the Eighth Amendment protection against cruel and unusual punishment, absent evidence that the Secretary was aware that the prisoners' extended lockdown allegedly was without a current legitimate penological justification.

The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the prisoners' extended lockdown, for from approximately 28 to 35 years, in prison's closed cell restriction (CCR) unit deprived them of at least one of the basic human needs asserted by prisoners, i.e., sleep, exercise, social contact, or environmental stimulation. The court also found a genuine issue of material fact as to whether there was lack of legitimate penological justification for the extended lockdown of the prisoners, which was relevant to whether prison officials were deliberately indifferent to state prisoners' basic human needs. According to the court, prison officials had fair warning that continued confinement of the prisoners in extended lockdown for over 28 years could be constitutionally infirm, and thus, they were not entitled to qualified immunity from the prisoners' § 1983 claims alleging cruel and unusual punishment under the Eighth Amendment. (Louisiana State Penitentiary at Angola, Louisiana)

2008

U.S. District Court
SMOKE-FREE
ENVIRONMENT

Abdullah v. Washington, 530 F.Supp.2d 112 (D.D.C. 2008.) An inmate filed a § 1983 action seeking damages for violation of his Eighth Amendment rights stemming from his alleged exposure to second-hand tobacco smoke while confined at a District of Columbia detention facility. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants. The court held that the plaintiff's expert's testimony failed to demonstrate a causal relationship between environmental tobacco smoke (ETS) and the increased risk of harm to the inmate. The court noted that the expert was a biophysicist, not a medical doctor, never went to the jail, and never examined the inmate or his medical records. The court held that the officials were not deliberately indifferent to the health risks caused by environmental tobacco smoke (ETS), even if the officials inadequately enforced no-smoking rules, where a non-smoking policy was in existence during the inmate's incarceration, and the jail was undergoing extensive renovation to improve air quality, including the ventilation system. (District of Columbia Department of Corrections, Central Detention Facility)

U.S. District Court
LETHAL INJECTION

Arthur v. Allen, 574 F.Supp.2d 1252 (S.D.Ala. 2008). A death-row inmate sought a temporary restraining order (TRO) against a contemplated autopsy on his body following his lethal injection. The district court denied an injunction and dismissed the case. The court held that the inmate was ineligible for the requested TRO because of his inequitable conduct, and the inmate otherwise had no substantial likelihood of success on the merits of claim. The court noted that the inmate conducted himself in a manner irreconcilable with the basic principles of due diligence, good faith, and conscientious enforcement of his rights. According to the court, the inmate had been aware of the state's intentions to perform an autopsy on his body for many years, the inmate was clearly apprised of his daughter's attempt to block the autopsy via a § 1983 suit and yet elected to remain on the sidelines. When the inmate suddenly invoked the equitable power of the court just two days before his scheduled execution, he offered no explanation for why he could not have initiated the action earlier. (Alabama)

U.S. Appeals Court TEMPERATURE	Bibbs v. Early , 541 F.3d 267 (5 th Cir. 2008). A state inmate brought a claim under § 1983 against corrections officers alleging that he was subjected to severe cold in retaliation for filing grievances. The district court granted the officers' motion for summary judgment and the inmate appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether subjecting the inmate to four straight nights of 20-degree temperatures was sufficiently severe to deter the inmate from filing future grievances. The court also found a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the inmate's actions of writing grievances against corrections officers caused the officers to retaliate by turning on "purge" fans, subjecting the inmate to cold temperatures. (Clements Unit, Amarillo, Texas)
U.S. District Court INJURY	Connolly v. County of Suffolk , 533 F.Supp.2d 236 (D.Mass. 2008). An inmate who fractured his arm after falling from a bunk bed in his cell sued a county, alleging negligence under state law and Eighth Amendment violations under § 1983. The district court entered summary judgment for the county. The court held that the failure of prison officials to equip the inmate's bunk bed with a ladder was not cruel and unusual punishment and that failure to provide ladders for prison bunk beds did not constitute deliberate indifference to the inmate's rights. (Suffolk County House of Corrections, Massachusetts)
U.S. District Court CELLS TEMPERATURE TOILETS	Decker v. Dunbar , 633 F.Supp.2d 317 (E.D.Tex. 2008). Affirmed 358 Fed.Appx. 509. An inmate filed a pro se § 1983 action against prison officials, asserting Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment violations, among other constitutional claims. The officials moved for summary judgment and the district court granted the motion. The court held that the officials' conduct in delaying the inmate's use of a restroom for 30 minutes did not amount to deliberate indifference to his medical needs in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. According to the court, the delay in taking the inmate to a restroom was caused by the need to conduct a prisoner count, and the inmate failed to demonstrate that he suffered any injury as a direct result of the delay. The court found that placement of the inmate in a holding cell for 90 minutes on a day that the outside temperature reached 95 degrees did not amount to cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The court noted that even assuming the holding cell was extremely hot, 90 minutes was not an excessive period of time rising to the level of a constitutional violation. (Texas Department of Criminal Justice, Correctional Institutions Division)
U.S. Appeals Court LETHAL INJECTION	Emmett v. Johnson , 532 F.3d 291 (4 th Cir. 2008). A condemned inmate brought a § 1983 action against state correctional officials, seeking equitable and injunctive relief for alleged violations, threatened violations, or anticipated violations of his right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed, finding that the state's lethal injection protocol did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment. The court noted that the injection procedures were supervised by state correctional officials, and executions were carried out by experienced, well-trained personnel. (Greensville Correctional Center, Sussex I State Prison, Virginia)
U.S. Appeals Court MEDICAL CARE TEMPERATURE	Gibson v. Moskowitz , 523 F.3d 657 (6 th Cir. 2008). The representative of the estate of a mentally disabled inmate who died of dehydration in a state prison brought a § 1983 action against a prison psychiatrist and others, alleging deliberate indifference to serious medical needs, and asserting medical malpractice claims. The district court denied the defendants' motion for summary judgment, and subsequently entered judgment, upon a jury verdict, in favor of the representative. The court awarded $1.5 million in compensatory damages and $3 million in punitive damages. The psychiatrist appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part and reversed in part. The court held that evidence was sufficient to support a determination that the inmate had an objectively serious medical condition and that the psychiatrist subjectively ignored the inmate's serious medical needs. The court found that the compensatory damages award was not excessive and that the representative was entitled to recover punitive damages. The court found that the punitive damages award was not excessive. According to the court, the psychiatrist was in charge of the inmate's treatment team, he admittedly was aware that the temperature in the observation room where the inmate was held exceeded 90 degrees, and that the combination of the inmate's medication and the room temperature was potentially deadly. A psychiatric expert testified that the inmate's medication affected the part of the brain that regulated body temperature and dissipated heat, and another medical expert testified that the inmate's dehydration occurred over a period of several days. Evidence was presented that during that period, the inmate lost 42 pounds. The psychiatrist never asked for the inmate's temperature to be monitored, even when he had learned from a nurse and other prison employees that the inmate had vomited. The nurse had advised the psychiatrist that the inmate was suffering from dehydration and severe weight loss, and that his condition was deteriorating. The psychiatrist did not examine the inmate, change his medication, or move the inmate to a cooler room. (Riverside Correctional Facility, Michigan)
U.S. District Court MEDICAL CARE	Hart v. Bertsch , 529 F.Supp.2d 1032 (D.N.D. 2008). A state inmate brought a § 1983 action against prison officials for violations of his constitutional right to receive necessary medical care. The inmate alleged that the officials failed to provide adequate medical care for his serious medical needs because he had been housed in a cell that utilized "steam heat," and that officials had not provided him with a medical alert button necessary due to his sleep apnea. The officials moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The court held that the officials did not act with deliberate indifference toward the inmate's central sleep apnea condition or alleged sensitivity toward "steam heat," as would have violated the Eighth Amendment prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment. The court noted that the inmate had been subjected to a multitude of physical examinations and diagnostic tests in an effort to diagnose the cause of his breathing complaints, and that the treating physician found no medical or factual basis to support another physician's recommendation that the inmate needed to avoid steam heat. According to the court, the inmate failed to follow through with recommended treatments, and the physician had never received a recommendation that the inmate be provided with a medical alert button, nor would such a procedure have been consistent with the inmate's condition. (North Dakota State Penitentiary)

U.S. Appeals Court
FAILURE TO PROVIDE CARE
MEDICAL CARE
SEGREGATION

Hernandez v. Velasquez, 522 F.3d 556 (5th Cir. 2008). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action alleging violations of his Eighth Amendment and due process rights. The district court granted summary judgment to all defendants and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the prisoner failed to show that he was placed at a substantial risk of serious harm when he was placed on lockdown status for 13 months, and therefore he could not show deliberate indifference on the part of prison personnel to his health or safety, as required for prison personnel to be liable under § 1983 for imposing conditions of confinement that constituted cruel and unusual punishment under the Eighth Amendment. The court noted that even if the prisoner suffered from muscle atrophy, stiffness, loss of range of motion and depression, there was no indication that those conditions posed a substantial risk of serious harm. The court held that the prisoner failed to show that prison personnel failed reasonably to address his medical needs, as required for prison personnel to be liable under § 1983 for deliberate indifference to the prisoner's serious medical needs in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The court noted that the sick call requests that the prisoner submitted while he was in lockdown, complaining of muscle soreness, stiffness and loss of range of motion, bore notations from medical staff showing that they responded to the prisoner in timely manner, treating his back pain with heat packs, conducting an x-ray, advising him to take medication for soreness and recommending exercises for soreness and stiffness. The court held that the prisoner failed to show that his confinement on lockdown status for 13 months posed an atypical or significant hardship on him in relation to the ordinary incidents of prison life, and he was therefore not deprived of a cognizable due process liberty interest. According to the court, even if the prisoner was confined to a shared cell with permission to leave only for showers, medical appointments and family visits, his assignment to lockdown was well within the range of confinement to be normally expected for a prisoner serving a life sentence for capital murder. (Texas Department of Criminal Justice, Polunsky Unit)

U.S. Appeals Court
FAILURE TO PROTECT HARASSMENT SAFETY
THREATS

Irving v. Dormire, 519 F.3d 441 (8th Cir. 2008). An inmate in the Missouri penal system filed suit under § 1983 against several employees of a state correctional facility, alleging multiple violations of his constitutional rights of due process, access to the courts and freedom from cruel and unusual punishment. The district court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment on the due process and access to courts claims, but denied the defendants' request for qualified immunity on the Eighth Amendment claim. The parties appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part and remanded. The court held that the corrections officers' alleged conduct in opening cell doors so as to allow an inmate to attack the plaintiff inmate was sufficiently serious to support a failure to protect claim. According to the court, the inmate's allegations that a corrections officer made several threats to kill the inmate, have him killed or have him beaten were sufficiently serious to form the basis of an injury, as required to support the inmate's Eighth Amendment claim. The court noted that the inmate's right to be free from threats by corrections officers was clearly established at the time the corrections officer allegedly made death threats against the inmate. According to the court, an officer's alleged conduct in threatening the inmate with a can of pepper spray and another officer's conduct in stating that she wanted the inmate dead did not rise to the level of being objectively credible. The court also held that an officer was on clear notice that his alleged conduct in labeling the inmate a "snitch" or a "rat" unreasonably subjected the inmate to the threat of a substantial risk of serious harm at the hands of his fellow inmates. The officer allegedly made three unsuccessful offers of payment to other inmates to assault the inmate, labeled the inmate a snitch in an effort to induce inmates to attack him and even armed another inmate with a razor blade for use in such an attempt. (Jefferson City Correctional Center, Missouri)

U.S. Appeals Court
LETHAL INJECTION

McNair v. Allen, 515 F.3d 1168 (11th Cir. 2008). A death row inmate moved for a stay of his execution, on the theory that the method of execution to which he was subject, death by lethal injection, violated his right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment. The district court granted the motion to allow the inmate to litigate his § 1983 claims and the defendants appealed. The appeals court vacated. The court held that the two-year statute of limitations on the § 1983 claim brought by the inmate began to run when the inmate when the inmate became subject to the new execution protocol, not at the time of the inmate's execution or on the date that a federal habeas review was completed. (Holman Correctional Facility, Alabama)

U.S. District Court
CELLS
MEDICAL CARE
NOISE
TEMPERATURE

Osterback v. McDonough, 549 F.Supp.2d 1337 (M.D.Fla. 2008). Inmates sued corrections officials, alleging that conditions of close management (CM) status amounted to cruel and unusual punishment. Following the grant of the inmates' motion to certify the class, and issuance of an order entering the officials' revised offer of judgment (ROJ), the officials moved to terminate the ROJ pursuant to the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA). The district court granted the motion. The court held that corrections officers were deliberately indifferent in violation of the 8th Amendment when inmates on close management (CM) status who truly were suicidal or otherwise suffered from severe psychological distress declared psychological emergencies. According to the court, the officers failed to summon mental health staff, and inmates thereafter attempted to commit suicide or otherwise harmed themselves, or, in one case, actually committed suicide. But the court found no Eighth Amendment violations with regard to mental health screening procedures, access to mental health care, the level of mental health staff, and instances in which security staff interfered with the delivery of mental health services. The court found that housing provided to inmates on close management (CM) status did not violate the Eighth Amendment, even though the inmates' expert concluded that CM cells were not appropriate due to extreme heat in summer and cold temperatures in winter, inasmuch as the inmates were not subjected to extreme deprivations. The court found that restrictions on the ability of inmates on close management status to speak to each other, including a ban on shouting, did not violate the Eighth Amendment, in that inmates had adequate opportunities to communicate with each other, allowing inmates to speak loudly would jeopardize security, and there were no ready alternatives to prohibiting yelling or other disruptive behavior. The court held that termination of the revised offer of judgment (ROJ), which was previously adopted by the district court as a final order and judgment, was appropriate under the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) in that isolated instances of prison staff's failure to appropriately respond to a bona fide psychological emergency of inmates in close management status did not create a current and ongoing violation of the class members' Eighth Amendment rights. (Everglades Corr'l Institution, Florida)

U.S. Appeals Court TORTURE	Rasul v. Myers , 512 F.3d 644 (D.C. Cir. 2008). Former detainees at a military facility in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba sued the Secretary of Defense and commanding officers alleging they were tortured. The detainees asserted claims under the Alien Torture Statute, under the Geneva Conventions, under the Religious Freedom Restoration Act (RFRA) and also asserted Fifth and Eighth Amendment claims on a Bivens cause of action. The defendants moved to dismiss and the district court granted the motion in part and denied the motion as to the RFRA claim. Both sides appealed. The district court affirmed in part and reversed as to the RFRA claim. The court held that the acts of torture allegedly committed against aliens detained at the military base in Cuba were “within the scope of employment” of military personnel who were allegedly committing such acts, for the purpose of deciding whether the United States should be substituted as defendant. The court found that the aliens were without property or presence in the United States and therefore lacked any constitutional rights and could not assert a Bivens claim against military personnel for alleged due process violations and cruel and unusual punishment inflicted upon them. The court held that the term “persons” as used in the RFRA to generally prohibit the government from substantially burdening a “person’s exercise of religion” did not extend to non-resident aliens. (United States Naval Base at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba)
U.S. District Court EXERCISE SEARCHES	Sanchez Rodriguez v. Departamento de Correccion y Rehabilitacion , 537 F.Supp.2d 295 (D.Puerto Rico 2008). An inmate filed a § 1983 action alleging that Puerto Rico prison officials denied him his constitutional right to enjoy daily recreational time outside of his cell because he refused to submit to visual body cavity searches. After dismissal of his complaint, the inmate filed a motion for reconsideration. The district court denied the motion. The court held that the searches did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment. According to the court, the requirement that inmates submit to visual body cavity searches in order to leave their cells for recreation was needed to preserve internal order and institutional security, and thus did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth Amendment. (Maximum Security Prison, Ponce, Puerto Rico)
U.S. Appeals Court CONDITIONS SANITATION	Townsend v. Fuchs , 522 F.3d 765 (7th Cir. 2008). A state inmate filed a civil rights suit against a prison official and a correctional officer alleging violation of his due process rights in placing him in administrative segregation for 59 days, and violation of his Eighth Amendment right against cruel and unusual punishment due to unsanitary conditions in segregation. The district court granted the official’s motion for partial summary judgment. The court later denied the inmate’s motion to amend to add a warden as a defendant and entered summary judgment for the prison official and correctional officer. The inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, reversed in part and remanded. The court held that the discretionary placement of the inmate in non-punitive administrative segregation for 59 days while officials investigated his possible role in a prison riot did not give rise to a liberty interest entitled to protection under procedural due process. The court noted that the federal Constitution does not create a liberty interest in avoiding transfer within a correctional facility. However, the court found that the inmate’s sleeping on a moldy and wet mattress involved a sufficiently serious prison condition to deny a civilized measure of life’s necessities, as required for an Eighth Amendment claim. The court held that summary judgment on the issue of deliberate indifference was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether a correctional officer knew about the condition of the inmate’s wet and moldy mattress. (New Lisbon Correctional Institution, Wisconsin)
U.S. Appeals Court LETHAL INJECTION	Walker v. Epps , 550 F.3d 407 (5 th Cir. 2008). Death row inmates brought a § 1983 action challenging the constitutionality of a state’s lethal injection protocol, and seeking a preliminary injunction to prevent the state from executing them during the pendency of their action. The inmates’ motion for a stay pending appeal was denied. The district court entered summary judgment in the state’s favor, and the inmates appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the action was subject to the statute of limitations for general personal injury actions and the cause of action accrued on the date the inmates’ convictions and sentences became final on direct review, or on the date on which the challenged protocol was adopted. The court found that the state did not fraudulently conceal its lethal injection protocol. (Mississippi Department of Corrections and Mississippi State Penitentiary)
U.S. District Court LETHAL INJECTION	Walker v. Epps , 587 F.Supp.2d 763 (N.D.Miss. 2008). Death row inmates brought a § 1983 action against prison officials, challenging the constitutionality of a state’s lethal injection protocol, and seeking a preliminary injunction to prevent the state from executing them by lethal injection during the pendency of their action. The state moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The court held that the three-year statute of limitations on the inmates’ § 1983 action accrued on the later date of when their individual cases became final on direct review or on the effective date of the state’s adoption of lethal injection as a means of execution, which was the date when each inmate knew that, as a matter of right, any impediment to setting an execution date had been removed. (Mississippi Department of Corrections)
U.S. District Court LIGHTING MEDICAL CARE SECURITY	Walker v. Woodford , 593 F.Supp.2d 1140 (S.D.Cal. 2008). A state prisoner filed a civil rights action against a prison and its personnel alleging that prison officials violated his Eighth Amendment rights by refusing to turn off the lights in their cells. The defendants filed a motion for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The court held that the prisoner had to present evidence showing that the prison’s 24-hour illumination policy was the cause of his insomnia or related problems before the prison could be required to explain why legitimate penological interests justified it. According to the court, the prisoner’s testimony did not establish that the illumination caused the unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain, or that prison personnel were deliberately indifferent to his serious medical needs in not modifying the illumination policy. The court found that prison officials were not plainly incompetent in requiring low-level lighting in prison cells 24 hours per day for security purposes. (Calipatria State Prison, California)

U.S. District Court
THREATS

Abney v. Jopp, 655 F.Supp.2d 231 (W.D.N.Y. 2009). A federal prisoner brought a § 1983 action against three corrections officers, alleging a verbal confrontation with one officer and impeding the progress of an investigation into the incident by the other officers. The district court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment. The court held that even if a correctional officer referred to the prisoner as a "snitch" in front of other inmates, the officer did not, absent some other action, violate the prisoner's Eighth Amendment rights, where the prisoner was never physically attacked, injured or threatened as a result of the officer's alleged actions. The court found that an alleged verbal altercation between the federal prisoner and one correctional officer, in which the officer called the prisoner a "pussy" and accused him of being afraid of "little women" did not give rise to an Eighth Amendment claim against the officer. The court noted that without more, allegations of verbal threats or abusive language were insufficient to form the basis of a § 1983 claim. (Batavia Federal Detention Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
SMOKE-FREE
ENVIRONMENT

Abuhouran v. U.S., 595 F.Supp.2d 588 (E.D.Pa. 2009). A prisoner brought a negligence action against the United States under the Federal Tort Claims Act alleging prison officials exposed him to excessive amounts of environmental tobacco smoke (ETS). The defendants moved for summary judgment and the district court granted the motion. The court held that the prisoner was precluded, under the discretionary function exception of the Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA), from challenging the warden's designation of smoking areas, as federal regulations explicitly assigned the exercise of choice or judgment to the warden to designate areas subject to ETS. The court noted that the stated policy considerations for implementing the "no smoking areas" in prisons was to provide a clean air environment and to protect the health and safety of staff and inmates, suggesting the designation of smoking areas was the kind of discretionary function the FTCA exception was meant to shield. The court held that under Pennsylvania law, the prisoner failed to present any medical evidence or expert witnesses to establish a causal connection between his exposure to environmental tobacco smoke (ETS) and his alleged injury, as required to prevail on his negligence claim. The court also held that the prisoner failed to present any evidence of an actual injury. (Federal Detention Center, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania)

U.S. District Court
SMOKE-FREE
ENVIRONMENT

Adams v. Banks, 663 F.Supp.2d 485 (S.D.Miss. 2009). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against a warden and other prison officials for exposure to unreasonable levels of secondhand smoke, or environmental tobacco smoke (ETS), and for denial of adequate medical care. The defendants moved for summary judgment, and the inmate moved for summary judgment on his claim against a prison nurse. The district court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the inmate was exposed to unreasonably high levels of environmental tobacco smoke (ETS) from cellmates who smoked in his cell and from other inmates in the area outside his cell. The court also found fact issues as to whether the complaints made by the inmate were sufficient for the warden and assistant supervisor to infer that ETS posed a substantial risk of serious harm to him, such that they acted with deliberate indifference to the inmate's situation. The court found that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to the seriousness of the inmate's medical condition as a result of exposure to environmental tobacco smoke (ETS) in his cell, as well as to the nature of a prison nurse's responses to the inmate's three sick call request forms complaining of coughing, chest pains, nausea, dizziness, difficulty breathing and vomiting as a result of exposure to ETS. The court held that neither the warden nor the assistant supervisor were involved in a decision to deny the inmate medical care as a result of exposure to secondhand smoke, and thus they were not deliberately indifferent to the inmate's serious medical needs in violation of the Eighth Amendment. (Wilkinson County Corr'l. Facility, Mississippi)

U.S. District Court
LETHAL INJECTION

Chester v. Beard, 657 F.Supp.2d 534 (M.D.Pa. 2009). Pennsylvania death-row inmates brought a class action under § 1983 against Pennsylvania Department of Corrections officials, seeking a permanent injunctive relief against alleged violations of their right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment and their right to due process, arising from Pennsylvania's use of lethal injection as an execution method. The district court denied the defendants' motion to dismiss. The court held that the inmates had Article III standing to bring a § 1983 challenge to the state's use of lethal injection as an execution method, seeking permanent injunctive relief, even if the inmates were not under active death warrants. The court noted that the fact that the inmates were subject to the death sentence conferred a sufficient personal stake in the action to satisfy the standing requirements. The court held that the death-row inmates stated a § 1983 claim against the DOC by alleging that the state's use of lethal injection as an execution method, in the absence of adequate training for those conducting the executions, exposed the inmates to the risk of extreme pain and suffering. (Pennsylvania Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
MEDICAL CARE

Conseillant v. Alves, 599 F.Supp.2d 367 (W.D.N.Y. 2009). A prisoner brought a § 1983 action against a physician employed by the New York State Department of Correctional Services (DOCS) alleging improper or inadequate treatment, in violation of his rights under the Eighth Amendment. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the physician. The court held that the prisoner's allegations that a nurse practitioner misdiagnosed him as suffering from hepatitis, and that the defendant physician knew of this misdiagnosis but allowed the prisoner to think he had a deadly disease, were insufficient to demonstrate deliberate indifference. The court noted that the prisoner's medical treatment was not so inadequate as to amount to "cruel or unusual punishment" prohibited by the Eighth Amendment. According to the court, the prisoner did not establish that he had a "serious medical need," or that the physician ignored any serious medical need. The court noted that the physician was not personally involved in any misdiagnosis, as the evidence only showed that the physician ordered follow-up testing, not that he told the prisoner that he had an active hepatitis infection. (New York State Department of Correctional Services)

U.S. Appeals Court
DISCIPLINE
FOOD

Foster v. Runnels, 554 F.3d 807 (9th Cir. 2009). A female inmate brought a civil rights action against a prison official, alleging the official deprived her of 16 meals over a 23-day period in violation of the Eighth Amendment's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment. The district court entered summary judgment for the official, and the inmate appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The court held that the official's conduct in allegedly depriving the inmate of 16 meals over a 23-day period for the inmate's failure to remove a paper from the rear window of her cell was a sufficiently serious deprivation of a life necessity, as required to establish violation of the Eighth Amendment's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment. The court noted that the official's argument-- that the alleged deprivation was due to the inmate's personal choice not to comply with a prison policy-- failed to demonstrate how the inmate's failure to remove a paper from a window jeopardized her safety or security during in-cell feeding. The court found that the official was not entitled to qualified immunity because the inmate's right to adequate meals was clearly established, and the case law alerting prison officials to their obligations to provide inmates with adequate meals should have put the official on notice of her Eighth Amendment rights. (High Desert State Prison, California)

U.S. District Court
CLOTHING
FOOD
MEDICAL CARE
RESTRAINTS
TEMPERATURE

Gay v. Chandra, 652 F.Supp.2d 959 (S.D.Ill. 2009). A state prisoner, who suffered from antisocial and narcissistic personality disorders, brought a § 1983 action against a psychiatrist who treated him in prison, alleging that conditions of confinement to which the psychiatrist subjected him violated the Eighth Amendment. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the psychiatrist in part, and denied in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the cell where the prisoner was restrained naked was excessively cold, and as to whether the psychiatrist knew that the prisoner would in fact be restrained naked in excessively low temperatures. Similarly, the court found fact issues as to whether the psychiatrist's decision not to allow the prisoner to wear any clothing while he was restrained denied the prisoner a "civilized measure" of life's necessities, and as to whether the psychiatrist was deliberately indifferent to the fact that the prisoner was restrained without clothes. According to the court, summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the psychiatrist's denial of food to the prisoner while the prisoner was restrained for 32 hours constituted an Eighth Amendment violation. The court found that the decision of the psychiatrist to use therapeutic restraints on the prisoner did not, in and of itself, violate the Eighth Amendment; where the psychiatrist's decision to restrain the prisoner was to protect the prisoner from harming himself. The court found that the psychiatrist was not entitled to qualified immunity in the prisoner's § 1983 action alleging Eighth Amendment violations arising from his medical treatment; where a fact issue existed as to whether the psychiatrist violated the prisoner's Eighth Amendment rights, and the prisoner's right to receive medical treatment for his serious medical needs, and his right not to be punished through conditions of his confinement, was a clearly established right. (Tamm's Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
DISCIPLINE
EXERCISE

Greene v. Furman, 610 F.Supp.2d 234 (W.D.N.Y. 2009). A state inmate brought a pro se § 1983 action against corrections officials, alleging various constitutional violations arising out of disciplinary proceedings instituted after he allegedly spit at another inmate. The district court dismissed the case. The court held that an allegation that a corrections officer issued a false misbehavior report against the inmate failed to state a claim for a due process violation. The court noted that the issuance of false misbehavior reports against an inmate by corrections officers is insufficient on its own to establish a denial of due process. According to the court, the allegation that the inmate, who was being escorted to a mental health appointment when he became involved in an altercation with another inmate and was not allowed to continue to his appointment, failed to state a claim for an Eighth Amendment violation. The court found that any delay in the inmate's mental health treatment did not cause him actual harm or put his health at risk, and there was no evidence that the delay resulted from any sadistic or otherwise impermissible motive. The court held that the allegation that the inmate was denied exercise, showers and haircuts after he became involved in an altercation with another inmate failed to state a claim for an Eighth Amendment violation based on his conditions of confinement, where the deprivations alleged were not atypical, did not result in any physical injury, and did not amount to cruel and unusual punishment. Southport Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
LETHAL INJECTION

Harbison v. Little, 571 F.3d 531 (6th Cir. 2009). A state prison inmate under death sentence brought a § 1983 action challenging a state's lethal injection protocol. The district court granted judgment in favor of the inmate, holding that the protocol violated the Eighth Amendment, and the state appealed. The appeals court vacated and remanded. The appeals court held that: (1) lack of a physical inspection to determine unconsciousness after the administration of the first drug in the three-drug protocol did not create a substantial risk of severe pain; (2) procedures for selecting and training personnel involved in executions did not create a substantial risk of severe pain; (3) the procedure for visual monitoring of the administration of drugs used in the protocol did not create a substantial risk of severe pain; and (4) the state's rejection of a one-drug lethal injection protocol did not create an objectively intolerable risk of serious harm. (Tennessee Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
SEARCHES
USE OF FORCE

Jackson v. Gerl, 622 F.Supp.2d 738 (W.D.Wis. 2009). A prisoner brought a § 1983 action against a warden and other prison officials, alleging that the use of a stinger grenade to extract him from his cell constituted excessive force in violation of the Eighth Amendment, and that an abusive strip search following the deployment of the grenade also violated the Eighth Amendment. The defendants moved for summary judgment and the district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that a prison lieutenant's extraction of the prisoner from inside his cell by means of a stinger grenade, which when detonated created a bright flash of light, emitted a loud blast accompanied by smoke, and fired rubber balls, was not "de minimis," as would bar a claim for excessive force under the Eighth Amendment. The court found that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the extraction of the prisoner from his cell by means of a stinger grenade was malicious and sadistic, or whether the use was in a good-faith effort to maintain or restore discipline. The court held that the prison security director's authorization of the prisoner's extraction by means of a stinger grenade was not malicious and sadistic, as required to establish excessive force under the Eighth Amendment. According to the court, the director was aware that the prisoner was refusing to cooperate, the prisoner had invited officials to "suit up" to "come in and play," and had covered his window and had put water on the floor. The director knew that tasers and incapacitating agents could not be used against the prisoner, and relied on the lieutenant's statements that she had been trained and was certified in the use of the grenade, having never used one himself. The court held that members of the prison's emergency response unit did not act with deliberate or reckless disregard of the prisoner's rights against excessive force under the Eighth Amendment when they failed to speak out against higher ranking officers from extracting prisoner from cell by means of a stinger grenade. According to the court, the prison's training captain and the commander of the emergency response unit did not provide inadequate training on the use of a stinger grenade, with a deliberate or reckless disregard to the prisoners' Eighth Amendment rights against excessive force, as required to subject the captain to § 1983 liability, even though the captain advised trainees that stinger grenades could be used in a cell and did not tell them of the danger of using the grenade in the presence of water. The captain lacked knowledge that using the grenade in a cell or in the presence of water would likely be an excessive use of force even where immediate weapons would otherwise be justified. The court found that the officials' alleged failure to give the prisoner an opportunity to strip down on his own so that officials could perform a visual inspection of his person rather than be subject to a manual strip search was for a legitimate penological purpose, and thus did not violate the Eighth Amendment as a wanton infliction of psychological pain. The officials decided to manually strip search the prisoner after he had resisted following orders along every step of the way. The court noted that the performance of the strip search in front of a cell, rather than inside a cell, was not done to demean and humiliate the plaintiff, where the cell was not in an area widely visible to prisoners, but rather was at the end of a hall with no cell across from it. (Wisconsin Secure Program Facility)

U.S. District Court
CONDITIONS
SAFETY
SMOKE
WORK

Jackson v. Goord, 664 F.Supp.2d 307 (S.D.N.Y. 2009). A state prisoner brought an action against correctional staff and officials, alleging that the defendants had violated his constitutional rights. After granting summary judgment for the defendants with respect to all of the prisoner's claims, except for his environmental claims, the defendants filed a supplemental motion for summary judgment on the environmental claims. The district court denied the motion. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to conditions in the prison auto body shop when the inmate worked there, the risk that the toxic materials in the shop created, and whether the inmate's alleged headaches, nosebleed, and nausea were related to his work at the auto body shop. The court also found that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the prisoner was exposed to asbestos for four to five hours a day over an extended period of time, and whether there was a risk to his health as a result of such exposure. According to the court, summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the prisoner was exposed to an unreasonable risk of serious harm from the prison's water quality or from exposure to cigarette smoke, and whether the prison defendants knew that the prisoner faced substantial risks of serious harm and disregarded those risks by failing to take reasonable measures to abate the risks. The court also found a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the prison superintendent knew of the allegedly ongoing constitutional violations and had the authority to correct the problems and failed to do so. (Green Haven Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
MEDICAL CARE

Jones v. Pramstaller, 678 F.Supp.2d 609 (W.D. Mich. 2009). The personal representative for a prisoner's estate brought a § 1983 action against prison employees and others, alleging that the defendants were deliberately indifferent to the prisoner's known serious medical need in violation of his Eighth Amendment right to be free of cruel and unusual punishment. The representative also brought state law claims for gross negligence and recklessness. Several employees moved for judgment on the pleadings, or, in the alternative, for summary judgment. The district court granted the motions in part and denied in part. The court held that the personal representative stated a claim against a prison physician by alleging that the physician should have realized the likely gravity and urgency of the prisoner's condition when he read a report that the prisoner had lost control of his muscles, could not walk, and had his eyes rolling back in his head involuntarily, but failed to order an immediate examination of the prisoner. The court also held that a claim was stated against the prison's coordinator of healthcare services by alleging that the coordinator failed to investigate whether the prisoner was under a physician's care after his symptoms and complaints indicating a grave and urgent medical condition were reported to her, and to act promptly once she learned that he was not. According to the court, the prison's warden and deputy director were entitled to rely on the judgment of the healthcare risk management coordinator, indicating that she had checked on the prisoner's well-being and assuring them that his medical needs were being addressed, and, thus, they were not liable under § 1983 for deliberate indifference to the prisoner's known serious medical need. The court ordered further discovery to determine whether the director and coordinator failed to put in place policies and procedures requiring that prisoner complaints, symptoms, or diagnoses of a certain type or severity be communicated to officials within a certain time period after the information became available. (Ernest Brooks Correctional Facility, Michigan)

U.S. District Court
FOOD
MEDICAL CARE

Marquez v. Quarterman, 652 F.Supp.2d 785 (E.D.Tex. 2009). A prisoner, proceeding pro se and in forma pauperis, brought a § 1983 action complaining about the prison system's refusal to provide him with dentures. The district held that the prisoner's allegations were sufficient to state an Eighth Amendment "deliberate indifference to medical needs" claim under § 1983, where the prisoner complained about an inability to chew food, stomach cramps, gas, and spastic colon, which resulted in a loss of weight of 13 pounds since his arrival at the prison system. According to the court, the prisoner did not state an Eighth Amendment deliberate indifference claim under § 1983 against the dental clinic, where the hygienist was not involved in the denial of dentures, but instead referred the prisoner to dentists for screening to see if he should receive dentures. The court noted that the hygienist was receptive to the prisoner's request and forwarded his name for consideration, as opposed to being deliberately indifferent by automatically denying his request for dentures. The court allowed the prisoner to proceed with his deliberate indifference claims against a food services officer, who purportedly denied him a soft food diet, despite the prescription for it. (Polunsky Unit, Texas Dept. of Criminal Justice, Institutional Division)

U.S. District Court
EXERCISE

Norwood v. Woodford, 661 F.Supp.2d 1148 (S.D.Cal. 2009). A state inmate brought a § 1983 action against prison officials alleging violation of his Eighth Amendment rights when he was denied outdoor exercise for five weeks. The district court granted summary judgment for the defendants. The court held that the inmate's denial of outdoor exercise for a period of five consecutive weeks during a lockdown at the prison supported the objective component of an Eighth Amendment claim for cruel and unusual punishment, but failed to meet the subjective component since the officials did not act with deliberate indifference to his needs. The court noted that the lockdown was instituted after an inmate's death in a prison riot involving the attempted murder of prison staff. According to the court, even though the inmate was transferred to the facility after the riot and was not a participant, the lockdown of all prisoners was necessary to ensure immediate and long-lasting safety to inmates and staff. (California State Prison, Corcoran)

U.S. Appeals Court
USE OF FORCE

Palmer v. Valdez, 560 F.3d 965 (9th Cir. 2009). A state prison inmate brought a pro se § 1983 action against corrections officials, alleging use of excessive force in violation of the Eighth Amendment's prohibition of cruel and unusual punishment. Following a bench trial, the district entered judgment for the officials, and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the district court did not abuse its discretion by declining to appoint counsel for the inmate under the in forma pauperis statute. The prisoner claimed that the district court improperly conditioned his use of telephonic testimony on his waiver of a jury trial, but the appeals court found that a bench trial that featured telephonic testimony was the prisoner's strategic choice. (California)

U.S. District Court PRIVACY
SEARCHES

Quinones-Ruiz v. Pereira-Castillo, 607 F.Supp.2d 296 (D.Puerto Rico 2009). A state inmate brought a pro se § 1983 action for injunctive and monetary relief against state prison officials, alleging that the requirement that he squat over a mirror set on the floor in order to have his anus examined when moved to different areas of the facility was conducted in a hostile and denigrating manner, and that it humiliated and frustrated him. The district court dismissed the action. The court found that the inmate's complaint failed to provide any details which could lead the court to conclude that the prison's requirement was unreasonable, or that the inmate was an inmate being held for a minor offense or one that did not involve drugs, weapons, or other forms of contraband, as required to state a § 1983 claim for a violation of the inmate's right against unreasonable searches and seizures or cruel and unusual punishment. (Las Cucharas Correctional Facility, Puerto Rico)

U.S. District Court
TELEPHONE
TOILETS

Shariff v. Coombe, 655 F.Supp.2d 274 (S.D.N.Y. 2009). Disabled prisoners who depended on wheelchairs for mobility filed an action against a state and its employees asserting claims pursuant to Title II of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), Title V of Rehabilitation Act, New York State Correction Law, and First, Eighth, and Fourteenth Amendments. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that a state prisoner who depended on a wheelchair for mobility was not required by the administrative remedy exhaustion requirement under the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA) to appeal a grievance regarding the height of a food service counter before bringing suit, where the grievance that he filed conceivably was resolved in his favor. The court noted that although the height of a counter was not lowered in response to the grievance, the prison had attempted to remedy the situation by changing the way in which hot food was served from the counter. According to the court, the inability of disabled prisoners who depended on wheelchairs for mobility to access restrooms throughout a state prison rose to the level of an objective violation of the Eighth Amendment, where the prisoners soiled themselves up to several times per week. The court noted that the sheer frequency with which those incidents occurred, not to mention the physical injuries that at least some prisoners had suffered in attempting to use an inaccessible restroom, indicated that the prisoners had been denied a minimal civilized measure of life's necessities or there was an unreasonable risk of serious damage to their future health. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the prison and its employees were deliberately indifferent to the prisoners' restroom needs.

The court found that the height of a food service counter and the absence of accessible water fountains throughout the state prison were not conditions that deprived disabled prisoners, who depended on wheelchairs for mobility, of minimal civilized measure of life's necessities and they did not pose an unreasonable risk of serious damage to their future health, as required for a violation of the Eighth Amendment's prohibition on cruel and unusual punishment. The court noted that although one prisoner suffered a burn on his hand caused by hot food or liquid falling from a food service counter, falling or spilled food did not create an unreasonable risk of serious damage to the prisoner's health. The court held that the existence of potholes and broken concrete in state prison yards did not constitute a violation of the Eighth Amendment's prohibition on cruel and unusual punishment as to disabled prisoners who depended on wheelchairs for mobility, even if those prisoners had fallen and suffered injuries as a result. According to the court, the inaccessibility of telephones throughout a state prison, inaccessibility of a family reunion site, inaccessibility of a law library, and malfunctioning of a school elevator, that did not cause any physical harm or pain to disabled prisoners who depended on wheelchairs for mobility, were not the kind of deprivations that denied a basic human need, and thus did not constitute a violation of the Eighth Amendment's prohibition on cruel and unusual punishment. (New York State Department of Correctional Services, Green Haven Correctional Facility)

2010

U.S. District Court
EXERCISE
MEDICAL CARE
TEMPERATURE
VENTILATION
SANITATION

Antonetti v. Skolnik, 748 F.Supp.2d 1201 (D.Nev. 2010). A prisoner, proceeding pro se, brought a § 1983 action against various prison officials, alleging various constitutional claims, including violations of the First, Fifth, Sixth, Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments. The district court dismissed in part. The court held that the prisoner's allegations were factually sufficient to state a colorable § 1983 claim that prison officials violated the Eighth Amendment by depriving him of needed medical care. The prisoner alleged that he was housed in segregation/isolation, leading to a mental health breakdown, and: (1) that he was seen by mental health professionals eight times over a five year period instead of every 90 days as required by administrative regulations; (2) that mental health professionals recommended he pursue art and music for his mental health but that prison officials denied him the materials; (3) and that the officials' actions resulted in the need to take anti-psychotic and anti-depression medications due to suffering from bouts of aggression, extreme depression, voices, paranoia, hallucinations, emotional breakdowns and distress, unreasonable fear, and systematic dehumanization.

The court found that the prisoner's allegations were factually sufficient to state a colorable § 1983 claim for a violation of his First Amendment right of access to courts, where the prisoner alleged that he was housed in segregation for several years and was repeatedly denied materials such as books, paper, pens and envelopes, as well as assistance from a law clerk.

The court held that the prisoner's allegations were sufficient to state a colorable § 1983 claim that he was deprived of personal hygienic items and sanitary conditions in violation of the Eighth Amendment, where the prisoner alleged he was regularly deprived of toilet paper and soap, that he was only allowed to shower twice a week, that he was made to strip in dirty showers full of filth and insects, that the unit in which he resided was littered with food and urine and contained open sewers, and that he suffered illness as a result.

The court found that the prisoner's allegations that he was subjected to a policy of a minimum of five hours of outside exercise per week but that administrative regulations provided for a minimum of seven hours and controlling consent decrees required eight hours, were sufficient to state a colorable § 1983 claim under the Eighth Amendment.

According to the court, the prisoner's allegations that officials deprived him of incoming mail without notice and without a post-deprivation remedy were factually sufficient to state a § 1983 claim under the First and Fourteenth Amendments.

The court ruled that the prisoner's allegations were sufficient to state a § 1983 claim for violations of the Eighth Amendment prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment where the prisoner alleged that he was locked down for 23 and 24 hours in a cell with a steel door, that prison officials disconnected the intake vent that pulled dust and allergens from the cell, that the prison heating system was not on in the winter, and that as a result of these conditions, he suffered cracked lips and nostrils which bled and refused to heal, as well as difficulty breathing and sleeping.

The court held that the prisoner's allegations were factually sufficient to state a colorable § 1983 claim for violations of his Fourth Amendment right to be free of unlawful searches and Eighth Amendment right to be free of cruel and unusual punishment. The prisoner alleged that whenever he was moved from his cell to any other location he was made to stand in a brightly lit shower in full view of female employees, made to strip naked, place his bare feet on a filthy floor covered in insects and scum, spread his buttocks, lift his penis, then put his fingers in his mouth without any opportunity to wash his hands, and that the process was unnecessary because inmates were in full restraints, escorted and solitary at all times.

The court found that the prisoner's allegations were sufficient to state a colorable § 1983 Eighth Amendment claim for violation of his right to be free of cruel and unusual punishment where the prisoner alleged the exercise provided to him was to stand in a completely enclosed cage alone, in extreme heat or cold without water, shade, exercise equipment or urinals, and that as a result he suffered sunburns, cracked and bleeding lips and a lack of desire to exercise, resulting in a loss of physical and mental health. (High Desert State Prison, Nevada)

U.S. District Court
TEMPERATURE
VENTILATION

Blackmon v. Kukuva, 758 F.Supp.2d 398 (S.D.Tex. 2010). A state prisoner brought a civil rights action against prison officials, alleging his exposure to excessive heat violated his Eighth Amendment rights. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The district court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether conditions during the state prisoner's incarceration in a prison unit, which included frequent temperatures into the 100's and insufficient ventilation, and which allegedly had a negative effect on the prisoner's personal health, constituted a denial of the minimal civilized measure of life's necessities. The court held that a prison maintenance supervisor did not act with deliberate indifference to the state prisoner's health or safety in responding to the prisoner's grievance about excessive heat, as required to support an Eighth Amendment claim, where he investigated the prisoner's complaint and gave an appropriate response. According to the court, the state prisoner's right not to be subjected to excessive heat was clearly established at the time he was continually exposed to temperatures into the 90s and 100s, in determining whether prison officials who failed to respond to his complaints about the heat were entitled to qualified immunity in his civil rights action. (Garza East Unit, Beeville, Texas Department of Criminal Justice)

U.S. District Court
MEDICAL CARE
RESTRAINTS

Brawley v. Washington, 712 F.Supp.2d 1208 (W.D.Wash. 2010). A female former inmate brought a § 1983 action against the Washington State Department of Corrections and various officials, seeking relief from violations of her constitutional rights that she alleged occurred during the birth of her first child. The Department filed a motion for summary judgment, which the district court granted in part and denied in part. The court held that the female inmate, who was shackled to a hospital bed while giving birth, showed, from an objective standpoint, that she had a serious medical need and was exposed to an unnecessary risk of harm for the purposes of her § 1983 Eighth Amendment claim. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by material issues of fact as to whether officers were deliberately indifferent to the risks of harm to the inmate and her serious medical needs when they shackled her to a hospital bed. According to the court, the inmate showed that shackling inmates while they were in labor was clearly established as a violation of the Eighth Amendment's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment, thereby barring the Department of Corrections' qualified immunity defense. (Washington State Corrections Center for Women)

U.S. District Court
DISCIPLINE
FOOD

Greene v. Esgrow, 686 F.Supp.2d 240 (W.D.N.Y. 2010). A state inmate filed a § 1983 action alleging that prison officials improperly executed a restricted-diet disciplinary sentence. The district court granted the officials' motion to dismiss. The court held that imposition of a forty-two meal restricted-diet disciplinary sentence did not amount to cruel and unusual punishment, in violation of the Eighth Amendment, absent a showing that the food that inmate was given was nutritionally inadequate, or that his health was adversely affected or jeopardized by his being placed on the restricted diet. (New York State Department of Correctional Services, Southport Correctional Facility)

U.S. District Court
MEDICAL CARE

Konitzer v. Frank, 711 F.Supp.2d 874 (E.D.Wis. 2010). A prisoner, a biological male suffering from Gender Identity Disorder (GID), brought an action against prison officials alleging violation of Eighth Amendment's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment by denying him certain medical services related to his disorder. The district court granted summary judgment for the prison officials in part and denied in part. The court held that the prisoner's Gender Identity Disorder (GID) was a "serious medical need," as required to establish the prisoner's § 1983 claim alleging that denial of his request for the opportunity to live as a female, as part of his treatment for GID, violated his Eighth Amendment rights. According to the court, although the prisoner had received some hormonal therapy to provide relief from GID symptoms, denial of the opportunity to live as a female allegedly caused the prisoner to be depressed, resulting in self-mutilation of his genitals and suicide attempts.

The court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether triadic therapy for Gender Identity Disorder (GID), which consisted of hormone therapy, real-life experience living as the preferred gender, and sex reassignment surgery, was the appropriate treatment for the prisoner. The court also found that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact regarding whether prison officials' denial of a request by the male prisoner to live as a female by, for example, wearing makeup and female undergarments and removing facial hair, constituted deliberate indifference to the prisoner's serious medical needs, and whether security concerns justified such denial. (Wisconsin Department of Corrections)

U.S. District Court
FAILURE TO PROTECT
LIGHTING
USE OF FORCE

Tafari v. McCarthy, 714 F.Supp.2d 317 (N.D.N.Y. 2010). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against employees of the New York State Department of Correctional Services (DOCS), alleging, among other things, that the employees violated his constitutional rights by subjecting him to excessive force, destroying his personal property, denying him medical care, and subjecting him to inhumane conditions of confinement. The employees moved for summary judgment, and the prisoner moved to file a second amended complaint and to appoint counsel. The court held that a state prison correctional officer's alleged throwing of urine and feces on the prisoner to wake him up, while certainly repulsive, was de minimis use of force, and was not sufficiently severe to be considered repugnant to the conscience of mankind, and thus the officer's conduct did not violate the Eighth Amendment. The court found that officers who were present in the prisoner's cell when another officer allegedly threw urine and feces on the prisoner lacked a reasonable opportunity to stop the alleged violation, given the brief and unexpected nature of the incident, and thus the officers present in the cell could not be held liable for failing to intervene. According to the court, one incident in which state correctional officers allegedly interfered with the prisoner's outgoing legal mail did not create a cognizable claim under § 1983 for violation of the prisoner's First and Fourteenth Amendment rights, absent a showing that the prisoner suffered any actual injury, that his access to courts was chilled, or that his ability to legally represent himself was impaired. The court held that there was no evidence that the state prisoner suffered any physical injury as result of an alleged incident in which a correctional officer spit chewing tobacco in his face, as required to maintain an Eighth Amendment claim based on denial of medical care. The court held that state prison officials' alleged retaliatory act of leaving the lights on in the prisoner's cell in a special housing unit (SHU) 24 hours per day did not amount to cruel and unusual treatment, in violation of the Eighth Amendment. According to the court, the prisoner failed to demonstrate a causal connection between his conduct and the adverse action of leaving the lights on 24 hours per day, since the illumination policy applied to all inmates in SHU, not just the prisoner, and constant illumination was related to a legitimate penological interest in protecting both guards and inmates in SHU. (New York State Department of Correctional Services, Eastern New York Correctional Facility)

U.S. Appeals Court
USE OF FORCE

Thomas v. Bryant, 614 F.3d 1288 (11th Cir. 2010). Inmates incarcerated at the Florida State Prison (FSP) brought a § 1983 action against various officers and employees of the Florida Department of Corrections (DOC), alleging that the use of chemical agents on inmates with mental illness and other vulnerabilities violated the Eighth Amendment's prohibition on cruel and unusual punishment. The claims against individual correctional officers responsible for administering the agents were settled. After a five-day bench trial on the remaining claims against the DOC Secretary and the FSP warden for declaratory judgment and injunctive relief, the district court entered findings of fact and conclusions of law. The court ended final judgment and a final permanent injunction in the inmates' favor. The Secretary and warden appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court found that in reaching its conclusion the district court did not clearly err in finding that an inmate was sprayed with chemical agents at times when he had no capacity to comply with officers' orders because of his mental illness, or in finding that those sprayings caused the inmate lasting psychological injuries. According to the court, the repeated non-spontaneous use of chemical agents on an inmate with a serious mental illness constituted an extreme deprivation sufficient to satisfy the objective prong of the test for an Eighth Amendment violation. The court noted that the inmate's well-documented history of mental illness and psychotic episodes rendered him unable to comply at the times he was sprayed, such that the policy was unnecessary and without penological justification in his specific case. The court found that the DOC's policy and practice of spraying inmates with chemical agents, as applied to an inmate who was fully secured in his seven-by-nine-foot steel cell, was not presenting a threat of immediate harm to himself or others, and was unable to understand and comply with officers' orders due to his mental illness, were extreme deprivations violating the broad and idealistic concepts of dignity, civilized standards, humanity and decency embodied in the Eighth Amendment.

The court held that the district court did not clearly err in finding that the record demonstrated that DOC officials acted with deliberate indifference to the severe risk of harm an inmate faced when officers repeatedly sprayed him with chemical agents for behaviors caused by his mental illness. The appeals court held that the district court did not abuse its discretion in concluding that injunctive relief was warranted and necessary, despite contentions that an inmate was currently incarcerated at a facility where he was not subject to DOC's chemical agents policy. The court noted that the permanent injunction against violations of the mentally ill inmate's Eighth Amendment rights from sprayings with chemical agents did not extend further than necessary to correct a constitutional violation and was not overly intrusive. According to the court, in addition to being closely tethered to the identified harm, the district court's permanent injunctive relief was narrowly drawn and plainly adhered to the requirements of Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA). (Florida State Prison)

U.S. District Court
MEDICAL CARE

Young v. Adams, 693 F.Supp.2d 635 (W.D.Tex. 2010). An inmate suffering from a gender identity disorder brought a pro se, in forma pauperis § 1983 suit against prison officials, claiming that they collectively denied him hormone treatment, in violation of the Eighth Amendment's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment. The district court dismissed the action for failing to comply with time limitations. The court noted that, even if the case had met the time limitations, medical staff at the correctional facility were not deliberately indifferent to the serious medical needs of an inmate, where the inmate did not meet the requirements to receive hormone treatment under the correctional facility's policy for treatment of gender disorder, which included a confirmed parole or discharge date of 180 days. The court noted the inmate was referred to a mental health unit for evaluation, and he was an intact male who was still manufacturing testosterone. (Alfred D. Hughes Unit, Texas Department of Criminal Justice, Institutional Division)

2011

U.S. District Court
CELLS
SEARCHES
USE OF FORCE

Bailey v. Hughes, 815 F.Supp.2d 1246 (M.D.Ala. 2011). A state prisoner brought an action against a county sheriff's department, a sheriff, corrections officers, and others, alleging unconstitutional deprivations of his rights while in custody in a county jail. The defendants moved to dismiss and for an award of attorney fees. The district court granted the motions. The district court held that: (1) neither the Fourteenth Amendment nor the Fourth Amendment's excessive force prohibition applied to the sentenced offender; (2) the sheriff and supervisory officials were entitled to qualified immunity; (3) allegations did not state an Eighth Amendment claim based on jail overcrowding; (4) the officers' alleged conduct in tasing the prisoner did not violate the Eighth Amendment; (5) allegations did not state a § 1983 claim for an unconstitutional strip search; (6) placement of the prisoner alone in closet-sized cell for eight hours after the alleged incident did not amount to unconstitutional confinement; and (7) the officers' alleged conduct in searching the prisoner's cell did not amount to retaliation for prisoner's prior lawsuit. The court noted that the prisoner admitted that he repeatedly refused the officers' verbal commands and fled his cell, he was repeatedly warned that he would be shocked if he did not comply with the officers' commands, and he was shocked by a taser only once before he fled his cell and then two to three times after he did so. (Houston County Jail, Alabama)

U.S. District Court
SEPARATION
SECURITY

Baker v. Kernan, 795 F.Supp.2d 992 (E.D.Cal. 2011). A state inmate filed a § 1983 action against a prison official alleging that a policy of separating members of rival prison gangs denied him equal protection, due process, and the right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment. The official moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The court held that the state's policy of separating members of rival prison gangs did not deny the inmate due process or violate his right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment, where the program was a rational response to a legitimate security concern, and it preserved the inmate's ability to exercise regularly outside, be considered for a job, use the facilities off the main yard, meet with a prison chaplain, and see visitors. The court also found that the state's classification of prisoners by their gang affiliation did not violate the inmate's equal protection rights, even if members of a larger gang fared slightly better in some aspects of confinement, where the classification was not based on race. The court noted that there was a long history of gang members immediately attacking members of rival gangs, and the policy of identifying and separating members of rival gangs advanced safety and order by preventing them from violently attacking each other. (California State Prison, Sacramento)

U.S. District Court TORTURE
FAILURE TO PROTECT HARASSMENT

Green v. Floyd County, Ky., 803 F.Supp.2d 652 (E.D.Ky. 2011). The guardian for an inmate, who was severely beaten by fellow inmates during his incarceration, brought a § 1983 action against prison guards for injuries arising from the beatings. The defendants moved for judgment on the pleadings. The district court denied the motion. The court held that the § 1983 one-year statute of limitations was tolled (postponed) by a Kentucky statute since the inmate was "of unsound mind." According to the court, allegations that prison guards stood by while prison inmates led another inmate around by a leash and forced him to act like a dog were sufficient for the inmate's guardian to state a claim of the tort of outrage, under Kentucky law, against the prison guards. The guardian alleged that jail employees improperly classified the inmate, assigning him to a communal cell, and told his cellmates that he had pled guilty to abusing a minor. The guardian alleged that for several days, three of the defendant prison guards turned a blind eye as the cellmates brutally tortured the inmate. According to the guardian, one guard saw the cellmates lead the inmate around by a leash and merely asked them to remove it, and later "egged the prisoners on" by asking them "where's your dog tonight?" After prolonged beatings, the cellmates finally alerted the guards when it appeared the inmate might be dying. The guardian alleged that the inmate suffered a number of broken bones and was in a near-vegetative state, and that, as a result of his injuries, he was incapable of making decisions for himself. (Floyd County, Kentucky)

U.S. District Court
CLOTHING DRUG TESTING
HARASSMENT
LIGHTING
MEDICAL CARE
SANITATION
SEPARATION

Holmes v. Fischer, 764 F.Supp.2d 523 (W.D.N.Y. 2011). A state inmate filed a § 1983 action alleging that prison officials violated his constitutional rights by subjecting him to non-random urinalysis drug testing, confining him in a special housing unit (SHU), and denying medical care. The defendants moved for a more definite statement, to strike the complaint, and to dismiss. The district court denied the motion. The inmate alleged that, while incarcerated in a special housing unit (SHU): (1) he was routinely cuffed from behind, aggravating left shoulder and leg conditions resulting from previous injuries, (2) he was subjected to continuous illumination in his cell, rendering it impossible to sleep; (3) officials interfered with the inmate grievance he attempted to file regarding constant SHU cell illumination; (4) he was denied dental floss; (5) he was denied, during winter months, proper boots, gloves, hat, and thermos; (6) he was exposed to feces thrown by mentally-ill inmates confined to SHU; (7) he was denied proper medical treatment and tests; and (8) he was subjected to urinalysis testing which so traumatized him as to cause physical harm. The court held that these allegations were sufficient to state claims under the Eighth Amendment for cruel and unusual punishment and deliberate indifference to necessary medical care. According to the court, the inmate's allegations that he was subjected to urinalysis based on reports from confidential informants whose credibility and reliability had not been confirmed, despite the complete absence of any history of drug use, and that two random urinalysis tests to which he was subjected were done to retaliate against him for filing inmate grievances regarding non-random urinalysis testing, were sufficient to state an unreasonable search claim under the Fourth Amendment. The court found that the inmate's allegation that, as a result of repeated non-random urinalysis drug testing to which he was subjected, he suffered physical harm, including insomnia, nausea, headaches, burning eyes, aggravation of an old gunshot wound, inability to exercise, and appetite loss, was sufficient to state a cruel and unusual punishment claim under the Eighth Amendment. (Elmira Correctional Facility, and Southport Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

Link v. Luebbers, 830 F.Supp.2d 729 (E.D.Mo. 2011). After federal habeas proceedings were terminated, federally-appointed counsel filed vouchers seeking payment under the Criminal Justice Act (CJA), for work performed on a prisoner's executive clemency proceedings and civil cases challenging Missouri's execution protocol. The district court held that counsel were entitled to compensation for pursuing the prisoner's § 1983 action for declaratory and injunctive relief alleging denial of due process in his clemency proceedings, but that counsel were not entitled to compensation for work performed in the § 1983 action challenging Missouri's execution protocol. The court noted that the prisoner's § 1983 action challenging Missouri's execution protocol was not integral to the prisoner's executive clemency proceedings. (Missouri)

U.S. District Court
SANITATION
TOILETS

Rodriguez-Sanchez v. Acevedo-Vila, 763 F.Supp.2d 294 (D.Puerto Rico 2011). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against a prison warden and a director of corrections for alleged violation of his Eighth Amendment right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment. The district court held that the prison warden was liable for an Eighth Amendment violation but the inmate was not entitled to a judgment against the director of corrections. The court found that the inmate was entitled to $1,000 per day for pain and suffering and to a punitive damages award of $10,000 from the warden. According to the court, the warden was liable to the inmate for violating the inmate's Eighth Amendment right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment because the inhumane conditions to which the inmate was subjected in his cell included the lack of an adequate place to sit, no working toilet, shower runoff water channeled through the cell, and foul odors. The court held that these conditions were the result of design and not of accident or happenstance, and were known to the prison officials in charge and in control, including the warden. (Correctional Institution Annex 296, Guayama, Puerto Rico)

U.S. Appeals Court
CONDITIONS
SAFETY
WORK

Smith v. Peters, 631 F.3d 418 (7th Cir, 2011). A state prisoner brought an action against prison employees, alleging that the employees violated the Eighth Amendment by forcing him to work at hard labor in dangerous conditions, and violated the First Amendment by penalizing him for questioning the propriety of the work assignment and preparing to sue. The district court dismissed the complaint. The prisoner appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The court held that the prisoner stated a claim against prison employees for violating his Eighth Amendment right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment by forcing him to work at hard labor in dangerous conditions. The prisoner alleged that he was assigned to uproot tree stumps in cold weather, without being given any protective gear, that he developed blisters from handling heavy tools in the cold without gloves, and that he was subjected to the risk of getting hit by the blades of the tools because they slipped from their handles as prisoners hacked away without proper training. The court found that the prisoner stated a claim against prison employees for violating his First Amendment right to free speech, by alleging that the employees penalized him for questioning the propriety of his work assignment and preparing to sue. (Branchville Correctional Facility, Indiana)

U.S. District Court
MEDICAL CARE

Wesolowski v. Harvey, 784 F.Supp.2d 231 (W.D.N.Y. 2011). A former prisoner brought a pro se civil rights action against the Superintendent of, and a dentist at, a correctional facility, alleging that he was subjected to cruel and unusual punishment in violation of his Eighth Amendment rights, due to a lack of dental care. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion and dismissed the case. The court held that the allegation that the prisoner was subjected to a delay of seven months between his first request for dental treatment and his first examination by a dentist failed to state a claim for deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs. The court found that the allegation that the prisoner was only offered painkillers, with the option of immediate extraction of the three affected teeth, or fillings, was insufficient to state a claim for inadequate medical care. According to the court, the allegation that the prisoner was deprived of adequate dental care was insufficient to state a claim against the facility superintendent where no underlying constitutional deprivation occurred that the superintendent ignored, was informed of, created, permitted, or toward which he could have been deliberately indifferent. The court noted that the prisoner's prior requests for treatment were made at a different institution, to different persons, who were not parties to his lawsuit. (Southport Correctional Facility, New York)

2012

U.S. District Court
EXERCISE
MEDICAL CARE

Anderson v. Colorado, 887 F.Supp.2d 1133 (D.Colo. 2012). A mentally ill inmate sued a state, its Department of Corrections (DOC), the DOC's director, and a warden, asserting claims for alleged violations of due process, the Eighth Amendment bar against cruel and unusual punishment, the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), and the Rehabilitation Act. Following a bench trial, the district court held that: (1) denying the inmate in administrative segregation any opportunity to be outdoors and to engage in some form of outdoor exercise for period of 12 years was a serious deprivation of a human need; (2) the defendants were deliberately indifferent to the inmate's mental and physical health; (3) the inmate failed to establish that he was denied a necessary and appropriate medication in violation of ADA and the Rehabilitation Act; (4) the defendants had to assign a department psychiatrist to reevaluate the inmate's current mental health treatment needs and take steps concluded to be appropriate in the psychiatrist's medical judgment; (5) the inmate failed to establish a violation of his rights under the Eighth Amendment, ADA, and the Rehabilitation Act due to the alleged denial of treatment provided by a multidisciplinary treatment team; (6) the inmate had a due process-protected liberty interest in progressing out of administrative segregation; and (7) the new stratified incentive system that was being implemented with respect to inmates in administrative segregation, if used fairly, was consistent with due process. (Colorado Department of Corrections, Colorado State Penitentiary)

U.S. District Court BEDDING MEDICAL CARE	Bell v. Luna, 856 F.Supp.2d 388 (D.Conn. 2012). A state inmate brought a § 1983 action against prison officials and a prison doctor, alleging that the defendants subjected him to unconstitutional conditions of confinement and showed deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs, in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The defendants moved to dismiss for failure to state claim. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the state prison doctor was not deliberately indifferent to the inmate's health in failing to take sufficient measures to treat the inmate's joint and back pain, or in failing to prescribe the inmate with an analgesic cream, as would violate the inmate's Eighth Amendment rights. The court found that forcing the inmate to go nearly seven months with a torn, partially unstuffed, unhygienic mattress was a condition of confinement sufficiently serious to implicate the Eighth Amendment. According to the court, the inmate's allegations that a unit manager "willfully, wantonly, and maliciously disregarded" the inmate's repeated requests for an adequate and hygienic mattress stated a claim under § 1983 against the manager for cruel and unusual punishment in violation of his Eighth Amendment rights. The court held that the unit manager was not entitled to qualified immunity from the inmate's § 1983 claim where the law of the Second Circuit would have put the manager on notice at the time of the alleged violation that failing to provide the inmate with an hygienic, working mattress for over half a year ran afoul of the Eighth Amendment. (MacDougall-Walker Correctional Institution, Connecticut)
U.S. District Court CELLS FAILURE TO PROTECT INJURY	Facey v. Dickhaut, 892 F.Supp.2d 347 (D.Mass. 2012). A prisoner at a state correctional institution filed a pro se § 1983 action against the prison and officials alleging his Eighth Amendment right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment was violated when officials knowingly placed him in danger by assigning him to a housing unit where he was violently attacked by members of a rival gang. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the complaint stated a claim against the deputy superintendent and an assistant for violation of the Eighth Amendment, by alleging that officials were aware of the feud between two rival prison gangs, that the prisoner was a known member of one of the gangs, that despite this knowledge officials had assigned the prisoner to a section of the prison where a rival gang was housed, and as a result he was violently attacked and sustained permanent injuries. The court found that the official who had instituted the gang housing policy could not be held personally liable, since he did not implement the policy, nor was he deliberately indifferent in supervising or training those who did. According to the court, state prison officials who had placed the prisoner known to be a gang member in danger by assigning him to a housing unit where he was violently attacked by members of a rival gang, were not entitled to qualified immunity in the prisoner's § 1983 suit. The court noted that clearly established law provided that the Eighth Amendment was violated if officials disregarded a known, substantial risk to an inmate's health or safety, and the officials had disregarded this risk, as well as violated a prison policy, by placing rival gang members in same housing unit. (Souza Baranowski Correctional Center, Massachusetts)
U.S. District Court LETHAL INJECTION	In re Ohio Execution Protocol Litigation, 906 F.Supp.2d 759 (S.D. Ohio 2012). Following consolidation of several § 1983 actions brought by state death row inmates to challenge the constitutionality of various facets of a state's execution protocol, one inmate moved for a stay of execution, a temporary restraining order (TRO), and a preliminary injunction. The district court denied the motion, finding that the inmate was not likely to succeed on the merits of his equal protection claim. The inmate alleged that the state's execution policy, including its allegedly discretionary approach to written execution protocol and informal policies, violated his right to equal protection by codifying the disparate treatment of similarly situated individuals without sufficient justification, entitling him to a stay of execution. (Ohio Department of Rehabilitation and Correction)
U.S. Appeals Court DISCIPLINE SAFETY	Jabbar v. Fischer, 683 F.3d 54 (2nd Cir. 2012). A state prison inmate brought an action against prison officials alleging that his constitutional rights under the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments were violated when he was transported on a bus without a seatbelt and was injured when thrown from his seat. The defendants moved to dismiss for failure to state a claim. The district court granted the motion and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the failure of prison officials to provide inmates in transport with seatbelts does not, without more, violate the Eighth Amendment's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment or the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The court noted that a bus seatbelt for a prison inmate in transport is not a life necessity, the deprivation of which constitutes cruel and unusual punishment under the Eighth Amendment. According to the court, a correctional facility's use of vehicles without seatbelts to transport prison inmates, when based on legitimate penological concerns rather than an intent to punish, is reasonable under the Eighth Amendment. (Woodbourne Correctional Facility, Ulster Correctional Facility, New York)
U.S. District Court FAILURE TO PROTECT	Jackson v. Gandy, 877 F.Supp.2d 159 (D.N.J. 2012). A state prisoner brought a § 1983 action against a department of corrections, corrections officers, and prison officials, alleging violations of his Eighth Amendment right against cruel and unusual punishment. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that there was no evidence that prison officials were personally involved in a corrections officers' alleged assault on the state prisoner, as required to establish supervisory liability against the officials under § 1983, despite defense counsel's bare assertions of deliberate indifference and notice of assaultive history. The court ruled that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether the force used by corrections officers to subdue the prisoner was excessive and in violation of Eighth Amendment, and whether a corrections officer participated in the alleged assault on the prisoner. The court held that the corrections officers were not entitled to qualified immunity where the prisoner's complaint alleged a violation of the constitutional right to be free from unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain, and the right was clearly established at the time of the officers' alleged misconduct. (N.J. Dept. of Corr., Bayside State Prison)
U.S. District Court FAILURE TO PROTECT ISOLATION PRETRIAL DETAINEES	Johnston v. Maha, 845 F.Supp.2d 535 (W.D.N.Y. 2012). A pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against a county sheriff, employees of a county jail, and others, alleging, among other things, violations of his Eighth Amendment right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment and his Fourteenth Amendment right to due process. The district court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment, and the detainee appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, vacated in part, and remanded for further proceedings. On remand, the district court

held that: (1) a fact issue as to whether a correctional officer assaulted the detainee precluded summary judgment on the detainee's Eighth Amendment claim; (2) summary judgment was precluded by fact issue as to whether the detainee was twice placed in isolation as a form of punishment without being given advance notice or opportunity to be heard; and (3) summary judgment was precluded by a fact issue as to whether the detainee exhausted administrative remedies as to the claim that a correctional officer placed him in an isolation cell without prior notice. (Genesee County Jail, New York)

U.S. Supreme Court
MEDICAL CARE

Minnecci v. Pollard, 132 S.Ct. 617, (2012). A prisoner at a federal facility operated by a private company filed a pro se complaint against several employees of the facility, alleging the employees deprived him of adequate medical care, in violation of the Eighth Amendment's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment, and caused him injury. The district court dismissed the complaint and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded, and, subsequently, amended its opinion. The U.S. Supreme court reversed, finding that the prisoner could not assert an Eighth Amendment Bivens claim for damages against private prison employees. (Wackenhut Correctional Corporation- Federal Correctional Institution at Taft, California)

U.S. District Court
SEPARATION
DISCIPLINE

Peoples v. Fischer, 898 F.Supp.2d 618 (S.D.N.Y. 2012). A state prisoner who was housed in segregation for over two years brought an action against prison officials, alleging the defendants violated his right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment. After the district court dismissed the prisoner's complaint in part, the defendants moved for reconsideration. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the prison officials were arguably put on sufficient notice that a sentence of three years of special housing unit (SHU) confinement for a non-violent infraction of prison rules could well be found to be grossly disproportionate and, therefore, in violation of the Eighth Amendment, such that the conduct of the prison officials in sentencing the prisoner to such a sentence could be found to have violated the prisoner's clearly established right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment. The court denied qualified immunity for the prison officials, noting that numerous courts had found that long stretches of segregation could constitute cruel and unusual punishment, and courts had repeatedly determined that the conditions of segregated confinement were unconstitutional if they did not meet certain minimum standards. The court noted that the prisoner was housed in segregation for over two years even though there was never any finding that he posed a threat to the safety of others or the security of the prison. (Upstate Correctional Facility, Green Haven Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. District Court
LETHAL INJECTION
PRIVACY

Philadelphia Inquirer v. Wetzel, 906 F.Supp.2d 362 (M.D.Pa. 2012). A newspaper brought an action against the secretary of a state department of corrections (DOC), alleging the First Amendment guaranteed the right to observe a prisoner's execution without obstructions. The newspaper moved for a preliminary injunction. The district court granted the motion. The court held that the historical practice in Pennsylvania indicated that the public and press traditionally enjoyed a right of access to executions and that permitting the press to view an entire execution without visual or auditory obstruction contributed to the proper functioning of the execution process. The court found that the state's significant interest in protecting the identities of employees taking part in lethal injections did not outweigh the newspaper's right of access to observe executions, and that the newspaper demonstrated that granting a preliminary injunction would not result in harm to the state. The court noted that "... allowing the press to report on the entire method of execution may promote a more informed discussion of the death penalty... and it may promote the public perception of fairness and transparency concerning the death penalty, which can only be achieved by permitting full public view of the execution.... Allowing the press to view the entire execution also provides significant community therapeutic value, as well as exposes the execution process to public scrutiny." (Pennsylvania Department of Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
DISCIPLINE
FOOD

Prude v. Clarke, 675 F.3d 732 (7th Cir. 2012). An inmate brought a § 1983 action against a sheriff and jail personnel, alleging that he was subjected to cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth Amendment as a result of his exclusive diet of nutrilof, a bad-tasting food given to prisoners as a form of punishment. The parties moved for summary judgment. The district court granted summary judgment to the defendants and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part and reversed in part. The appeals court held that summary judgment was precluded by a genuine issue of material fact as to whether jail officials were aware that the inmate was being sickened by his exclusive diet of nutrilof, yet did nothing about it. According to the court, deliberate withholding of nutritious food from a prison inmate, or substitution of a tainted or otherwise sickening food, with the effect of causing substantial weight loss, vomiting, stomach pains, and maybe an anal fissure, or other severe hardship, violates the 8th Amendment prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment. (Milwaukee Co. Jail, Wisconsin)

U.S. District Court
FAILURE TO PROTECT LIGHTS
PRETRIAL DETAINEES
SAFETY

Solivan v. Dart, 897 F.Supp.2d 694 (N.D.Ill. 2012). A pretrial detainee brought a § 1983 action against a county, corrections officers, and a sheriff, alleging deliberate indifference to undue punishment. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the detainee's § 1983 complaint stated a claim against a correctional officer for deliberate indifference to a serious need in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment, where the complaint alleged facts that indicated that the officer left inmates visually and audibly unsupervised for hours, knowing that a substantial risk of harm was present. The complaint further alleged that there were no light bulbs in the detainee's cell, no intercoms or emergency call buttons in cells, and no overhead cameras on his tier of the jail. According to the court, the complaint stated that the harm the detainee suffered at the hands of other inmates was significant, including severe injuries to his right eye and bleeding from his ear, and the complaint alleged that the detainee was the only person of Hispanic origin housed in the maximum security tier, while a significant majority of other inmates were African American, and that these circumstances put the detainee in an identifiable group of prisoners who were singled out for attack. (Division One, Cook County Department of Corrections, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
CONDITIONS
LIGHTING
RESTRAINTS TEMPERATURE

Chappell v. Mandeville, 706 F.3d 1052 (9th Cir. 2013). A state prison inmate brought a § 1983 action against prison officials, alleging violations of the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments. The defendants moved for summary judgment on the ground of qualified immunity and the district court granted summary judgment as to some, but not all, of the claims. The defendants appealed. The appeals court reversed. The appeals court held that: (1) it was not clearly established that subjecting the prison inmate to a contraband watch violated the Eighth Amendment prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment, and thus prison officials were entitled to qualified immunity on the Eighth Amendment claim; (2) the contraband watch was not such an extreme change in conditions of confinement as to trigger due-process protection; and (3) it was not clearly established whether a state-created liberty interest existed with regard to the contraband watch, and thus officials were entitled to qualified immunity on the claim that the inmate's right to due process was violated because he was not provided with an opportunity to be heard by the official who ordered contraband watch. The contraband watch conditions included 24-hour lighting, mattress deprivation, taping the inmate into two pairs of underwear and jumpsuits, placing him in a hot cell with no ventilation, chaining him to an iron bed, shackling him at the ankles and waist, and forcing him to eat "like a dog." (California State Prison, Sacramento)

U.S. District Court
CROWDING
MEDICAL CARE

Coleman v. Brown, 960 F.Supp.2d 1057 (E.D.Cal. 2013). California prisoners with serious mental disorders brought a class action against a Governor, alleging that due to prison overcrowding, they received inadequate mental health care, in violation of the Eighth Amendment prohibition of cruel and unusual punishment. Separately, California prisoners with serious medical conditions brought a class action asserting constitutional claims similar to those in the other action. In the case concerning mental health care, the district court found Eighth Amendment violations and appointed a special master to oversee the development and implementation of a remedial plan. In the case concerning medical care, the State stipulated to a remedial injunction, and, after the State failed to comply with that injunction, the district court appointed a receiver to oversee remedial efforts. A three judge district court panel consolidated the two cases and the panel entered a remedial order requiring the State to reduce its prison population to 137.5 percent of design capacity within two years. The Governor appealed. The United States Supreme Court affirmed the population reduction order. The district court subsequently denied the defendants' motion to vacate or modify the population reduction order, and directed the defendants to comply with the population reduction order. The defendants' moved to stay the order directing compliance pending appeal to the United States Supreme Court. The district court denied the motion, finding that: (1) the State was not likely to succeed on the merits of the prisoners' lawsuit challenging prison conditions; (2) the State would not be irreparably injured absent a stay; (3) issuance of a stay would substantially injure the prisoners; and (4) the public interest favored denying the stay. (California)

U.S. Appeals Court
HARASSMENT

Hogan v. Fischer, 738 F.3d 509 (2nd Cir. 2013). A pro se prisoner brought a § 1983 action against various correction officers alleging that three masked officers sprayed him with an unknown substance while he was in his cell. The substance was apparently a mixture of fecal matter, vinegar, and machine oil. The district court dismissed the complaint and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court vacated in part and remanded. The appeals court held that the prisoner stated a § 1983 claim against prison officials for cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth Amendment, by alleging the officials approached his cell wearing masks and proceeded to spray him with a mixture of feces, vinegar, and "some type [of] machine oil." The court found that the officials' alleged conduct was unequivocally contrary to contemporary standards of decency, and, given the context, the assault obviously was not a good faith effort to maintain or restore discipline, but rather was an attempt to maliciously and sadistically cause harm. (Attica Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
FAILURE TO PROTECT FAILURE TO PROVIDE CARE
MEDICAL CARE

Lemire v. California Dept. of Corrections and Rehabilitation, 726 F.3d 1062 (9th Cir. 2013). The estate, parents, and daughter of a mentally ill inmate who died in custody brought a § 1983 action against the California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation (CDCR), CDCR officials, and prison staff. The plaintiffs sought to recover damages for alleged violations of the Eighth Amendment, based on the inmate's right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment, and the Fourteenth Amendment, based on the family's substantive due process right of familial association. The district court granted summary judgment to the plaintiffs. The appeals court affirmed in part, vacated in part, and remanded. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to whether: (1) withdrawal of all floor staff from a prison building which housed mentally ill inmates, for up to three and a half hours, created an objectively substantial risk of harm to the unsupervised inmates in the building; (2) the captain who called staff meetings, and a warden, who purportedly authorized the meetings, were aware of risks posed by withdrawing all floor officers from the building for over three hours; (3) any risk of harm could have been prevented with adequate supervision; and (4) the actions of the warden and the captain shocked the conscience.

The court also found genuine issues of material fact existed as to whether (1) floor officers who were the first prison personnel to arrive in the cell of the mentally ill inmate who apparently committed suicide were deliberately indifferent to the inmate's serious medical needs when they failed to provide cardiopulmonary resuscitation (CPR), despite being trained to administer it; (2) the officers' failure to provide medical care caused the inmate's death; and (3) the officers' actions shocked the conscience, precluding summary judgment as to the § 1983 Eighth Amendment medical claim brought by the inmate's family against officers and family's substantive due process claim against the officers. (California State Prison at Solano)

U.S. District Court
BEDDING
FOOD

Lewis v. Zon, 920 F.Supp.2d 379 (W.D.N.Y. 2013). A Jewish inmate brought an action against a state's department of corrections and approximately 50 of its officials and employees pursuant to § 1983 and the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA), alleging denial of religious accommodations in violation of the First Amendment and RLUIPA. The inmate moved for summary judgment and the defendants cross moved to dismiss and/or for summary judgment. The district court denied the plaintiff's motion, and granted in part and denied in part the defendant's motion. The court held that: (1) there was no evidence that the prison's practice of inspecting the inmate's meals substantially burdened the prisoner's free exercise of his faith; (2) the prison's policy of inspecting the prisoners' meals for dangerous items was objectively reasonable; (3) the prison's offering of religious meal plans to inmates who demonstrated entitlement thereto preserved the inmates' free exercise freedoms; (4) the prison's failure to provide the inmate with food during Jewish holy day fast days was not cruel and unusual punishment; (5) there was no evidence that the defendants were deliberately indifferent to the inmate's medical needs during his hunger strike; (6) a material fact dispute regarding whether the inmate was denied medical treatment when he began experiencing pain after the culmination of his hunger strike precluded summary judgment on the claim for deliberate indifference to a serious medical need; and (7) the inmate's having to forego fresh bedding for a few hours after soiling his bedding was not a serious medical situation requiring treatment. (New York State Department of Correctional Services, Upstate Correctional Facility, Downstate Correctional Facility, Wende Correctional Facility, and Auburn Correctional Facility)

U.S. Appeals Court
LETHAL INJECTION

Mann v. Palmer, 713 F.3d 1306 (11th Cir. 2013). A death row inmate filed a civil rights action, challenging the method of execution in Florida as cruel and unusual under the Eighth Amendment. The district court dismissed the complaint for failure to state a claim. The inmate moved for a stay of execution and expedited consideration of his appeal of the dismissal of his complaint. The appeals court denied the motions. The court held that the inmate failed to establish the likelihood of success on the merits of his Eighth Amendment claim, and that the process which the inmate received in his clemency hearing satisfied due process. The court noted that Florida's substitution of pentobarbital for sodium pentothal in its method of execution did not constitute a significant alteration to the method of execution in Florida so as to commence running of a new period of limitations on the death row inmate's claim challenging the method of execution in Florida. (Florida State Prison)

U.S. District Court
CONDITIONS
MEDICAL CARE
SMOKE-FREE
ENVIRONMENT

Mearin v. Swartz, 951 F.Supp.2d 776 (W.D.Pa. 2013). State inmates, proceeding pro se, brought an action against prison officials and employees, alleging that exposure to environmental tobacco smoke (ETS) violated the Eighth Amendment, as well as asserting First Amendment retaliation claims. The defendants moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part and denied in part. The court held that the prisoners' allegations were sufficient to plead they were exposed to unreasonably high levels of environmental tobacco smoke (ETS), as required to state a § 1983 claim for violations of the Eighth Amendment against various prison officials and employees. One prisoner alleged that he was exposed to constant smoking by cellmates, inmates in neighboring cells, and by corrections officers and staff, which resulted in his suffering from constant coughs, headaches, chest pains, shortness of breath, vomiting, and fatigue. A second prisoner alleged that he was constantly exposed to second hand smoke by other inmates and employees while in certain housing, which resulted in his suffering from constant headaches, coughs, dizziness, breathing difficulties, and burning sensations in his chest. The prisoners alleged that officials and employees had actual knowledge of their exposure to ETS and of the risks of harm to the prisoners' health, but failed to rectify conditions and to enforce the prison's zero tolerance smoking policy. The court found that the prisoners' allegations that they had made requests to unit managers to be housed with non-smoking cellmates, that the managers had knowledge of the prisoners' need to be housed with non-smokers, that the managers denied the requests, that the prisoners suffered various health conditions from exposure to smoke, and that the prisoners submitted grievances about smoke exposure, were sufficient to state a § 1983 claim against case managers for violations of the Eighth Amendment. (State Correctional Institution at Greene, Pennsylvania)

U.S. District Court
CONDITIONS
FAILURE TO PROTECT
MEDICAL CARE

Pratt v. City of New York, 929 F.Supp.2d 314 (S.D.N.Y. 2013). A prisoner brought a § 1983 action against a city, its Commissioner of Corrections, and other prison officials, alleging cruel and unusual punishment in violation of Eighth Amendment based on the prison's failure to address and mitigate asbestos exposure in prison dormitories. The district court denied the defendants' motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim. The court held that the prisoner stated a § 1983 claim that the prison's failure to address and mitigate friable asbestos exposure constituted cruel and unusual punishment under the Eighth Amendment, by alleging that the prison dormitory was contaminated with asbestos and that prison maintenance deliberately avoided testing potentially contaminated pipes and older floor tiles for asbestos exposure. According to the court, exposure to friable asbestos poses a sufficiently serious risk to a prisoner's health as to constitute a serious deprivation, as an element of a claim of cruel and unusual punishment under the Eighth Amendment. The prisoner alleged that most of the facility pipes and the ceiling heating system were deteriorating due to roof leaks, and that leaking water captured small asbestos particles ("friable asbestos") from the deteriorated pipes and heating system and brought the friable asbestos into the dormitory. According to the prisoner, the friable asbestos is also blown throughout the dormitory by the ceiling heating system. The prisoner was a licensed asbestos remover. (Anna M. Koss Center, Rikers Island, New York City, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
MEDICAL CARE

Ray v. Wexford Health Sources, Inc., 706 F.3d 864 (7th Cir. 2013). A state prison inmate brought a § 1983 action against a prison physician and physician's employer, alleging violation of the Eighth Amendment prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment as a result of the physician's failure to treat the inmate's shoulder pain. The district court granted summary judgment to the defendants and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the prison physician did not display deliberate indifference to the inmate's serious medical condition of shoulder pain, as required to support a § 1983 claim against the physician for cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The court noted that, although the inmate did not receive an MRI (magnetic resonance imaging) scan that he wanted because the physician diagnosed the inmate with arthritis and did not believe an MRI scan would help in treatment, the inmate received medical treatment for his shoulder pain, including frequent examinations, x-rays, and painkillers, and he was assigned to a lower bunk so he could avoid arm motions that he found painful. (Western Illinois Correctional Center)

U.S. Appeals Court EXECUTION
DEATH PENALTY

Sepulvado v. Jindal, 729 F.3d 413 (5th Cir. 2013). A state death-row prisoner filed an action against the Governor of Louisiana, the Louisiana Department of Public Safety and Corrections, and various state officials under § 1983, alleging, among other claims, that the state's refusal to disclose details of its execution protocol violated the Due Process Clause of Fourteenth Amendment. Another death-row prisoner intervened. The district court entered a preliminary injunction and a stay of execution. The state appealed. The appeals court reversed. The appeals court held that the prisoner failed to establish the likelihood of success on the merits of his claim that substitution of a one drug lethal injection protocol for a three drug protocol violated his procedural due process rights. The appeals court held that the district court abused its discretion by granting an untimely motion for a stay. (Louisiana Department of Public Safety and Corrections)

U.S. Appeals Court
MEDICAL CARE

Spavone v. New York State Dept. of Correctional Services, 719 F.3d 127 (2nd Cir. 2013). A state prisoner brought a suit against corrections officials under § 1983 and the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), alleging, among other things, that the defendants' denial of his request for a medical leave to obtain additional treatment for his post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD) violated his Fourteenth Amendment right to equal protection of the law and his Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment right to be free of cruel and unusual punishment. The prisoner had traveled to Nicaragua in the 1980s to join the Contra rebel forces and saw combat while fighting with them in that country's civil war. He also was working on the scaffolding of a building across the street from the World Trade Center on September 11, 2001, and was credited with risking his life to rescue several of his coworkers. He witnessed victims of the attack jump from the towers. The district court denied the defendants' motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity, and the defendants appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The appeals court held that the corrections officials were entitled to qualified immunity on prisoner's equal protection claim, and on the prisoner's Eighth Amendment claim. According to the court, even if the prisoner was in need of absolutely necessary medical care, neither official had reason to conclude that such care was not available to him in the prison, and thus there was a rational basis for distinguishing between leaves of absence for the treatment of mental illness as opposed to other sorts of illness for which leave was available. The court noted that there no evidence that either official thought that denying the prisoner's request for a leave of absence would cause him harm, much less harm so serious that it would be objectively unreasonable for them to believe that the policy of restricting leaves of absence for mental health treatment was consistent with prisoner's right to be free of cruel and unusual punishment. (New York State Department of Correctional Services)

U.S. District Court
ISOLATION

Tavares v. Amato, 954 F.Supp.2d 79 (N.D.N.Y. 2013). An inmate who had recently been released from the custody of a county jail filed a pro se suit against a sheriff and jail administrator, claiming his First Amendment rights were violated by his inability to access a law library and to engage in religious worship while confined in involuntary protective custody (IPC). The inmate also alleged that he was discriminated against and placed in IPC because he was a sex offender, in contravention of the Equal Protection Clause, and that his conditions of confinement violated the Eighth Amendment. Both sides moved for summary judgment. The district court denied the plaintiff's motion, and granted the defendants' motion in part and denied in part. The court held that: (1) there was no evidence of injury, as required to support a claim for violation of the First Amendment's right of access to the courts; (2) there was no evidence that the inmate had firmly held religious beliefs, as required to support a claim for violation of his First Amendment's right to free exercise of religion; (3) confinement of the inmate in administrative segregation for 132 days was not cruel or unusual punishment, in violation of the Eighth Amendment; and (4) the inmate's initial five-day segregation, for purposes of a determining a housing classification, was insufficient to establish a liberty interest. But the court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact: (1) as to whether the county jail had a rational basis for housing inmates with sex offender criminal histories in administrative segregation, rather than with the general prison population; (2) whether there was a violation of the Equal Protection Clause; and (3) on the officials' claim for qualified immunity. According to the court, there was no evidence that the inmate suffered any type of actual injury as a result of receiving only one trip to the facility's law library during his 132-day confinement in involuntary protective custody (IPC). The court found that the inmate's claims, even if proven, that jail officials confined him in administrative segregation for 132 days, for 23 hours each day, only allowing him to shower during his one hour long recreation period, prohibiting him from wandering around outside of his cell, and forcing him to pick and choose which amenities he wanted to avail himself to given his limited amount of time outside of his cell, did not amount to cruel or unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth Amendment, since the officials' actions involved no specific deprivation of any human need. (Montgomery County Jail, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
BEDDING
CROWDING NOISE
SAFETY
SANITATION
TEMPERATURE
VENTILATION

Walker v. Schult, 717 F.3d 119 (2nd Cir. 2013). An inmate, proceeding pro se and in forma pauperis, brought a § 1983 action against a warden and various other prison officials and employees, alleging violations of the Eighth Amendment. The district court granted the defendants' motion to dismiss. The inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, vacated in part, and remanded. The court held that the prisoner's allegations were sufficient to plead that he was deprived of the minimal civilized measure of life's necessities and was subjected to unreasonable health and safety risks, as required to state a § 1983 claims against prison officials for violations of the Eighth Amendment. The prisoner alleged that: (1) for approximately 28 months he was confined in a cell with five other men with inadequate space and ventilation; (2) the heat was stifling in the summer and it was freezing in the winter; (3) urine and feces splattered the floor; (4) there were insufficient cleaning supplies; (5) the mattress was too narrow for him to lie on flat; and (6) noisy and crowded conditions made sleep difficult and created a constant risk of violence. The court also found that the prisoner's allegations were sufficient to plead that prison officials knew of and disregarded excessive risks to his health and safety, as required to find that the officials were deliberately indifferent. The prisoner alleged that officials knew of overcrowding in his cell, that he spoke with some officials about the conditions, that officials were aware noise was loud and constant, that they were aware of temperature issues, that the prisoner informed officials that his bed was too narrow, that one official failed to issue cleaning supplies, and that conditions did not change despite his complaints. (Federal Correctional Institution, Ray Brook, New York)

U.S. District Court
FAILURE TO PROTECT HARASSMENT
PRIVACY

Williams v. Community Solutions, Inc., 932 F.Supp.2d 323 (D.Conn. 2013). State prison inmates brought an action against state department of corrections (DOC) officials and others, alleging that they were subjected to sexual abuse, harassment, and threatening conduct at a residential reentry work-release program, and asserting both federal constitutional claims and state law tort claims. The state officials moved to dismiss. The district court granted the motion in part, and denied in part. The court held that the alleged sexual abuse, harassment, and threats perpetrated against the state prison inmates by staff did not rise to the level of a deprivation of the inmates' Eighth Amendment rights. According to the court, although staff allegedly stayed in the bathroom with inmates and watched them give urine samples, touched inmates on their buttocks and genitals on a few occasions, and made inappropriate comments toward inmates, such alleged conduct involved isolated incidents and was not sufficiently serious or severe to amount to cruel and unusual punishment. The court found that the inmates failed to state a Fourth Amendment claim for violation of their constitutional right to bodily privacy, absent an allegation of an invalid search or seizure. (Connecticut Department of Corrections, Residential Re-entry Work-Release Program, Community Solutions, Inc., Bloomfield Connecticut)

2014

U.S. District Court
FAILURE TO PROTECT
MEDICAL CARE

Endl v. New Jersey, 5 F.Supp.3d 689 (D.N.J. 2014). The parents of an inmate who died in a state prison brought a § 1983 action, individually and the mother as administrator of the inmate's estate, against the state, the department of corrections (DOC), a prison, corrections officers, a medical care provider, and physicians and nurses, alleging the inmate had been deprived of necessary medical care. The defendants filed motions to dismiss. The district court granted the motions in part and denied in part. The court held that corrections officers, who were sued in their official capacities, were not immune from liability under the New Jersey Tort Claims Act (TCA) where there were not just errors in medical judgment, but claims of deliberate or reckless indifference, and the survivors' clearly alleged conduct that may have been outside the scope of the officers' employment or that may have constituted willful misconduct. The court found that allegations that individual medical providers responsible for the inmate misdiagnosed the inmate's congestive heart failure as bronchitis, failed to provide a medical workup following the inmate's complaint of chest cavity pain, and failed to properly medicate him, were sufficient to support an Eighth Amendment claim for cruel and unusual punishment in the § 1983 action against the providers. (Northern State Prison, New Jersey)

U.S. Appeals Court
LIGHTING

Greening v. Miller-Stout, 739 F.3d 1235 (9th Cir. 2014). A state prisoner brought an action against prison officials, claiming that exposing him to constant lighting for 13 days violated the Eighth Amendment's bar against cruel and unusual punishment. The district court granted summary judgment for the officials and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The court found that summary judgment was precluded by factual issues as to: (1) the brightness of the continuous lighting in the prisoner's special management unit cell; (2) the effect on the prisoner of the continuous lighting; and (3) whether prison officials were deliberately indifferent. The inmate was housed in the Special Management Unit (SMU), an administrative segregation unit with single-cells that are continuously illuminated for twenty-four hours a day. Each cell in the SMU has three, four-foot-long fluorescent lighting tubes in a mounted light fixture. A cell occupant can use a switch inside the cell to turn off two of the tubes, but the center tube is always on. The tube is covered by a blue light-diffusing sleeve. Institution policy requires welfare checks in the SMU to be conducted every thirty minutes, which is more frequent than checks for the general prison population. Officials asserted that continuous illumination allows officers to "assess the baseline behavior of offenders to ensure they are not at risk of harming themselves or making an attempt to harm staff, cause property damage or incite problem behavior from other offenders." The officials stated that turning the cell lights on and off every thirty minutes would be disruptive to the cell occupants. The prisoner alleged that the light was so bright he could not sleep, even with "four layers of towel wrapped around his eyes." He alleged that the lighting gave him "recurring migraine headaches" and that he could not distinguish between night and day in the cell. (Airway Heights Corrections Center, Washington)

U.S. District Court
LETHAL INJECTION

In re Ohio Execution Protocol Litigation, 994 F.Supp.2d 906 (S.D. Ohio 2014). An inmate, who was scheduled to be executed, brought a challenge to Ohio's two drug execution protocol of midazolam and hydromorphone, claiming that the protocol would subject him to a substantial risk of severe pain that would constitute cruel and unusual punishment, in violation of the Eighth Amendment. The inmate moved for a stay of execution. The district court denied the motion. The court held that the inmate's physical and medical characteristics which placed the inmate at risk for obstructive sleep apnea did not preclude the use of Ohio's two drug execution protocol on the grounds that the protocol would subject the inmate to a substantial risk of severe pain, in violation of the Eighth Amendment. According to the court, expert testimony that the inmate would experience air hunger, or a terrifying inability to obtain a breath to satisfy the ventilatory drive, failed to consider the execution protocol's use of a massive dose of hydromorphone, an analgesic. (State of Ohio)

U.S. District Court
MEDICAL CARE

Martinson v. Leason, 22 F.Supp.3d 952 (D.Minn. 2014). A prisoner brought an action under § 1983 against three county jail nurses in their individual capacities alleging deliberate indifference to the prisoner's health in violation of the Eighth Amendment prohibition of cruel and unusual punishment, as well as a negligence claim against the county, following amputation of nine fingers after an infection progressed to sepsis. The defendants moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The court held that: (1) the nurse who responded to a medication request was not reckless; (2) the nurse who knew the prisoner to be ill was not reckless; (3) failure to act reasonably in following a jail policy was not deliberate indifference; (4) a nurse was not aware of serious medical need; and (5) the prisoner's diarrhea and bloody cough was not a serious medical need. (Dakota County Jail, Minnesota)

U.S. District Court
FAILURE TO PROTECT
MEDICAL CARE

Mori v. Allegheny County, 51 F.Supp.3d 558 (W.D.Pa. 2014). An inmate who was seven and one-half months into a “high risk” pregnancy brought an action under § 1983 against a county for deliberate indifference to her health in violation of the Eighth Amendment prohibition of cruel and unusual punishment, and survival and wrongful death claims for violations of the Fourteenth Amendment, after the loss of the child following a placental abruption. The county moved to dismiss. The district court denied the motion. The court held that the prisoner: (1) stated an Eighth Amendment claim based on failure to monitor the unborn child after the prisoner complained of vaginal bleeding; (2) stated a claim against the county based on custom and practice; (3) sufficiently alleged a causal link between the policies and the loss of the child; (4) stated a claim against county officials for individual liability; and (5) stated wrongful death and survivor claims for the death of the child. The inmate alleged that individual policy makers, including the chief operating officer of the county jail’s health services, and the jail’s nursing supervisor, were responsible for the policies that led to failure to provide adequate medical treatment. The prisoner also alleged that she was made to wait over 24 hours before being sent to a hospital after her vaginal bleeding started, that she was transported by a police cruiser rather than ambulance, that it was well known that bleeding late in pregnancy often indicated serious medical issues, that the child was alive during birth, and that the delay in medical treatment contributed to the injuries during birth and the death of the child shortly after birth. (Allegheny County Jail, Pennsylvania)

U.S. District Court
INJURY
PLUMBING
TEMPERATURE

Morris v. Corrections Corporation of America, 75 F.Supp.3d 457 (D.D.C. 2014) A former District of Columbia inmate brought a state-court negligence action against a private prison operator, seeking damages for a scrotal burn injury he allegedly sustained when the water temperature in a prison shower spiked unexpectedly. The operator moved the action to federal court, and moved for summary judgment. The district court granted the motion. The court held that there was no evidence that the operator had notice of allegedly dangerously high water temperatures in the prison showers, and the operator’s alleged breach of its duty to properly maintain the shower facilities was not the proximate cause of the scrotal burn. (Correctional Treatment Facility, operated by Corrections Corporation of America, Washington, D.C.)

2015

U.S. Appeals Court
TEMPERATURE

Ball v. LeBlanc, 792 F.3d 584 (5th Cir. 2015). Death row inmates brought a § 1983 action against a state department of corrections and state officials, seeking declaratory and injunctive relief based on allegations that heat in the prison violated the Eighth Amendment, the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), and the Rehabilitation Act (RA). Following a bench trial, the district court sustained the Eighth Amendment claims, rejected the disability claims, and issued a permanent injunction requiring the state to install air conditioning throughout death row. The department and officials appealed and the inmates cross-appealed. The appeals court affirmed in part, vacated and remanded in part. The court held that: (1) the district court did not abuse its discretion by admitting evidence of, or relying on heat index measurements of death-row facilities; (2) the district court did not clearly err in finding that heat in death-row cells posed a substantial risk of serious harm to inmates and that prison officials were deliberately indifferent to the risk posed to death-row inmates by the heat in prison cells; (3) housing of death-row inmates in very hot prison cells without sufficient access to heat-relief measures violated the Eighth Amendment; (4) inmates were not disabled under ADA or RA; and (5) permanent injunctive relief requiring the state to install air conditioning throughout death-row housing violated the Prison Litigation Reform Act (PLRA), where acceptable remedies short of facility-wide air conditioning were available. (Department of Public Safety and Corrections, Louisiana State Penitentiary)

U.S. Appeals Court
SEARCHES
FAILURE TO PROTECT

Crawford v. Cuomo, 796 F.3d 252 (2nd Cir. 2015). A current state prisoner and a former state prisoner brought an action against a corrections officer, the officer’s supervisor, and state officials, alleging that the corrections officer sexually abused them in violation of their Eighth Amendment protection against cruel and unusual punishment, and seeking damages and injunctive relief. The district court dismissed the action for failure to state a claim. The current and former prisoners appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The court held that one prisoner’s allegation that the corrections officer, in frisking the prisoner during the prisoner’s visit with his wife, fondled and squeezed the prisoner’s penis in order to make sure that prisoner did not have an erection, stated a claim for sexual abuse in violation of his Eighth Amendment protection against cruel and unusual punishment. The court found that a prisoner’s allegation that the corrections officer, in searching the prisoner after the prisoner left a mess hall, squeezed and fondled the prisoner’s penis and roamed his hands down the prisoner’s thigh, while making demeaning comments such as “[t]hat doesn’t feel like a penis to me” and “I’ll run my hands up the crack of your ass if I want to,” stated a claim for sexual abuse in violation of the Eighth Amendment protection against cruel and unusual punishment. (Eastern Correctional Facility, New York)

U.S. Appeals Court
EXERCISE
CLOTHING
TEMPERATURE

Diaz v. Davidson, 799 F.3d 722 (7th Cir. 2015). A former state inmate filed an action alleging that prison officials’ denial of adequate exercise violated the Eighth Amendment’s prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment. The district court entered judgment in the officials’ favor and the inmate appealed. The appeals court affirmed. The court held that the officials’ failure to provide the inmate with a hat and gloves to wear when he exercised in his outdoor cell did not violate the Eighth Amendment. The court held that state prison officials’ failure to provide the inmate a with hat and gloves to wear when he exercised in his outdoor cell in a prison yard in very cold winter weather did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment, in violation of the Eighth Amendment, even though the inmate was unable to do the chin-ups he needed to prevent the muscles in his back from atrophying because of arthritis, and the indoor cell was not large enough. The court noted that guards gave him what they were required to give him according to the prison’s policy without realizing, or being irresponsible in failing to realize, that he needed gloves and a hat to do specific exercises. According to the court, the warden received only one pertinent grievance, which complained that on one occasion the inmate had been left outdoors without a hat and gloves for two hours. (Pontiac State Prison, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
LIGHTING

Grenning v. Stout, 144 F.Supp.3d 1241 (E.D. Wash. 2015). A state prisoner commenced a § 1983 action against prison officials, claiming that exposing him to constant lighting for 13 days in segregation management unit (SMU) violated the Eighth Amendment's bar against cruel and unusual punishment. The district court granted summary judgment to the officials and the prisoner appealed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The district denied summary judgment, in part. The court held that summary judgment was precluded by genuine issues of material fact as to: (1) whether the state prisoner suffered harm resulting from his exposure to continuous light for 13 days; (2) whether state prison officials acted with deliberate indifference in exposing the prisoner to continuous light for 13 days; (3) whether the prisoner had suffered an immediate injury from being exposed to continuous light in the prison's segregation management unit; (4) whether legal damages would be inadequate to compensate the prisoner for his alleged suffering or to restore his health, as to the costs of changing the lighting; and (5) whether penological purposes would be undermined if the lighting was changed. The court noted that the prisoner had offered evidence of the harm he already had suffered due to the lighting conditions, including testimony of a board certified sleep medicine expert. (Airway Heights Corrections Center, Washington)

U.S. Appeals Court
TEMPERATURE
VENTILATION
MEDICAL CARE

Hinojosa v. Livingston, 807 F.3d 657 (5th Cir. 2015). The mother of an inmate who died of complications from heatstroke while incarcerated brought an action against prison officials and employees, the Texas Department of Criminal Justice (TDCJ), the University of Texas Medical Branch (UTMB), and an official of UTMB, alleging that they were responsible for her son's death. Prison officials moved to dismiss on the basis of qualified immunity. The district court deferred ruling and the officials appealed. The appeals court dismissed the action, finding that it did not have jurisdiction over the appeal. The court held that the inmate's factual allegations, if true, would be sufficient to establish prison officials' liability for an Eighth Amendment violation and to overcome a qualified immunity defense, and that further clarification of the facts was necessary for the district court to rule on the prison officials' qualified immunity defense. The mother of the inmate alleged that officials subjected the inmate to dangerous heat conditions in conscious disregard of the serious risk that the heat posed for prisoners who, like the inmate, suffered from certain medical conditions, took certain medications, and had recently been transferred from air-conditioned jails to non-climate-controlled facilities. The mother alleged that the officials had promulgated and had power to change policies that allegedly caused the inmate's death, and the Eighth Amendment right not to be subjected to extremely dangerous temperatures without adequate ameliorative measures had been clearly established at the time of inmate's death. (Garza West Unit, Texas Department of Criminal Justice)

U.S. Appeals Court
MEDICAL CARE

Perez v. Fenoglio, 792 F.3d 768 (7th Cir. 2015). An inmate brought a pro se § 1983 action against prison officials alleging cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth Amendment, in particular, that the officials were deliberately indifferent to his severe hand injury, delaying his receipt of medically necessary surgery for ten months. After twice denying the inmate's request for pro bono counsel, the district court dismissed the action with prejudice, for failure to state a claim. The inmate appealed and appellate counsel was appointed. The appeals court reversed and remanded. The court held that: (1) the inmate stated a claim against a prison physician for such serious delays in the provision of adequate treatment that the Eighth Amendment may have been violated; (2) the inmate stated a claim against a prison nurse for deliberate indifference; (3) the inmate sufficiently identified an unconstitutional policy or practice to state a claim under § 1983 against the private corporation that served as the prison's health care provider; (4) the inmate stated a claim for deliberate indifference against the prison's health care administrator; (5) the inmate stated a claim for deliberate indifference against prison grievance officials; (6) the inmate stated a valid First Amendment retaliation claim; and (7) the district court's denial of the inmate's request for pro bono counsel was not unreasonable. (Lawrence Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. Appeals Court
EXERCISE
CELLS
DEATH PENALTY

Prieto v. Clarke, 780 F.3d 245 (4th Cir. 2015). A state prisoner convicted of capital murder and sentenced to death brought a pro se § 1983 action, alleging that his confinement on death row, pursuant to a state policy which required him to be in a single cell with minimal visitation and recreation opportunities, violated his procedural due process and Eighth Amendment rights. The district court dismissed the Eighth Amendment claim, and subsequently granted summary judgment in favor of the prisoner on the due process claim. Prison officials appealed. The appeals court reversed, finding that the prisoner had no due process liberty interest in avoiding confinement on death row. (Sussex I State Prison, Virginia)

U.S. District Court
SANITATION
CLOTHING
FOOD
USE OF FORCE
CONDITIONS

Smith v. Eovaldi, 112 F.Supp.3d 779 (S.D. Ill. 2015). A state inmate, proceeding in forma pauperis, brought a § 1983 action against several prison officers, alleging use of excessive force and exposure to inhumane conditions in his cell. The prisoner alleged that after he had a "negative outburst" and was "maced" by a lieutenant and removed from his cell by a corrections officer, he was taken to an infirmary bullpen, where he was forced to lie on the floor. While he was on the floor, the prisoner alleged that officers kicked and punched him for ten minutes, causing him to defecate upon himself. He alleged that after the incident, he was stripped of his prison clothes and "inadequately seen" by "medical" personnel. At the screening stage of the case, the district court dismissed the complaint in part against some defendants, but declined to dismiss with regard to the others. The court held that the inmate sufficiently alleged § 1983 claims against several prison officers for use of excessive force by alleging that the officers engaged in prolonged attacks against him and that one officer subsequently attacked him again.

The court allowed the prisoner's claims against several prison officers regarding conditions of his confinement to proceed. The prisoner alleged that two officers did not feed him for several days after the alleged attack against him, that two other officers did not allow the inmate to shower or otherwise clean off fecal matter for several months, and that two other officers denied him hygiene products and warm clothing during winter months. (Menard Correctional Center, Illinois)

2016

U.S. District Court
ISOLATION
MEDICAL CARE
EXERCISE
CONDITIONS

Szubielski v. Pierce, 152 F.Supp.3d 227 (D. Del. 2016). A state prisoner, acting pro se and in forma pauperis (IFP), brought a § 1983 action against prison officials, relating to his continuing classification for solitary confinement. At the screening stage of the case, the district court held that the prisoner stated a First Amendment retaliation claim against a prison warden and an Eighth Amendment claim regarding conditions of confinement. The prisoner complained of 24-hour cell confinement, limited recreation, extreme social isolation, environmental deprivation, limited telephone calls, and limited visits. The prisoner suffered from schizophrenia, severe manic depression, and an anxiety disorder. The court found that the prisoner's allegations that the prison warden retaliated against him after a civil rights advocacy organization filed a lawsuit challenging solitary confinement of prisoners, by keeping the prisoner in solitary confinement despite a classification committee's reclassification of the prisoner for medium-security housing, stated a First Amendment retaliation claim. According to the court, the prisoner's allegations that his continued solitary confinement, which had already lasted nine years, involved extreme social isolation, inadequate medical care, limited recreation, and environmental deprivation, stated a claim the under the Eighth Amendment regarding conditions of confinement. (James T. Vaughn Correctional Center, Delaware)

SECTION 11: DISCIPLINE

Detention and Corrections Caselaw Catalog All Rights Reserved
CRS, Inc. 925 Johnson Drive, Gettysburg PA 17325 (717) 338-9100 www.correction.org/

The following pages present summaries of court decisions which address this topic area. These summaries provide readers with highlights of each case, but are not intended to be a substitute for the review of the full case. The cases do not represent all court decisions which address this topic area, but rather offer a sampling of relevant holdings.

The decisions summarized below were current as of the date indicated on the title page of this edition of the Catalog. Prior to publication, the citation for each case was verified, and the case was researched in Shepard's Citations to determine if it had been altered upon appeal (reversed or modified). The Catalog is updated annually. An annual supplement provides replacement pages for cases in the prior edition which have changed, and adds new cases. Readers are encouraged to consult the Topic Index to identify related topics of interest. The text in the section entitled "How to Use The Catalog" at the beginning of the Catalog provides an overview which may also be helpful to some readers.

The case summaries which follow are organized by year, with the earliest case presented first. Within each year, cases are organized alphabetically by the name of the plaintiff. The left margin offers a quick reference, highlighting the type of court involved and identifying appropriate subtopics addressed by each case.

1962

U.S. District Court
LENGTH OF
SEGREGATION

Fulwood v. Clemmer, 206 F.Supp. 370 (D. D.C. 1962). Isolation in solitary confinement for two years constitutes cruel and unusual punishment because the only violation of prison rules was relatively minor. (Dist. of Columbia Jail)

1969

U.S. Appeals Court
SEGREGATION
RELIGIOUS SERVICES

Sharp v. Siegler, 408 F.2d 966 (8th Cir. 1969). Segregated prisoners may be refused the opportunity to attend regular Sunday religious services. (Nebraska Penal Complex)

1970

U.S. District Court
REGULATIONS

Carothers v. Follette, 314 F.Supp. 1014 (S.D. N.Y. 1970). "Any prison regulation or practice which restricts the right of free expression that a prisoner would have enjoyed if he had not been imprisoned must be related both reasonably...and necessarily... to the advancement of some justifiable purpose of imprisonment...A prisoner could be punished only if he acted or threatened to act in a way that breached or constituted a clear and present danger of breaching the justifiable regulation." (Green Haven Prison, New York)

1971

U.S. District Court
ISOLATION

Jones v. Wittenberg, 330 F.Supp. 707 (N.D. Oh. 1971), aff'd, 456 F.2d 854 (6th Cir. 1972). Isolation may not be used for extended periods of time. (Lucas County Jail, Ohio)

U.S. Supreme Court
CONDITIONS OF SEGREGATION DISCIPLINARY PROCEDURES

Wilwording v. Swenson, 404 U.S. 249 (1971) (Per Curiam). A state habeas corpus petition by inmates confined in maximum security at Missouri State Penitentiary challenging conditions and disciplinary measures, but not seeking release, is dismissed. The inmates then brought a federal habeas corpus action. While state habeas corpus proceedings were exhausted, the District Court for the Western District of Missouri dismissed the complaint on the grounds that 28 U.S.C. Section 2254 had not been satisfied as the inmates had not invoked any of a number of possible state remedies. The Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed and the inmates petitioned the Supreme Court for a writ of certiorari. (Reversed and Remanded.)

HELD: The exhaustion requirement of 28 U.S.C. Section 2254 is merely an accommodation of the federal system designed to give the state an initial opportunity to pass upon and correct alleged violations of its prisoners' federal rights; and regardless of the remedy involved, Missouri courts have not granted a single hearing on conditions of confinement in state prisons. 404 U.S. at 250.

HELD: The inmates pleading challenging conditions of confinement may also be used to plead cases of action under 42 U.S.C. Section 1983 to which exhaustion of remedies does not apply. 404 U.S. at 251. (State Penitentiary, Missouri)

1972

U.S. District Court RULES

Collins v. Schoonfield, 344 F.Supp. 257 (D. Md. 1972). Inmates may not be punished for conduct of innocuous or trivial nature under vague and uncertain standards and regulations because such conduct may offend the sensibilities of individual corrections officers where such conduct poses no threat to the security and order of the institution. "Lack of facilitation on an unreasonable basis" of attorney visits rises to a level of constitutional denial. Non-suicidal inmates and inmates not presenting an immediate threat to life, safety, or property may not be denied attorney visits as a means of discipline. (Baltimore City Jail, Maryland)

U.S. Supreme Court
SOLITARY CONFINEMENT

Cruz v. Beto, 405 U.S. 319 (1972). Claiming a cause of action under 42 U.S.C. Section 1983, Cruz, an alleged Buddhist, incarcerated in a Texas prison, complained that he was not allowed to use the prison chapel, that he was prohibited from corresponding with his religious advisor, and that he was placed in solitary confinement for sharing his religious materials with other inmates. The U.S. District Court dismissed the complaint on the grounds that it was in an area that should be left "to the sound discretion of prison administration." The Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed, and the U.S. Supreme Court granted certiorari.

HELD: "[A] complaint should not be dismissed for failure to state a claim unless it appears beyond doubt that the plaintiff can prove no set of facts in support of his claim which would entitle him to relief." 405 U.S. at 322 Citing Conley v. Gibson, 355 U.S. at 45-46. (Texas Department of Corrections, Ellis Unit)

U.S. Supreme Court
DUE PROCESS
SEGREGATION

Haines v. Kerner, 404 U.S. 519 (1972) (Per Curiam), reh'g. denied, 405 U.S. 948 (1972). Haines, an inmate at the Illinois Penitentiary commenced this 42 U.S.C. Section 1983, 28 U.S.C. Section 1343 (3) action against the governor, state officials, and prison officials. Haines' pro se complaint included allegations of physical injuries suffered while in disciplinary confinement and denial of due process in the process leading to that confinement.

The U.S. District Court for the eastern district of Illinois dismissed the complaint for failure to state a claim upon which relief could be granted, suggesting that only in exceptional circumstances should courts venture into the operation of the state penitentiary and concluding Haines failed to show a deprivation of federally protected rights. The Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed, and Haines petitioned the U.S. Supreme Court for a writ of certiorari, contending the district court erred in dismissing his pro se complaint without allowing him to present evidence. (Reversed and Remanded.)

HELD: "Whatever may be the limits in the scope of inquiry of writs into the internal administration of prisons, allegations such as these asserted by [Haines], however inartfully pleaded, are sufficient to call for the opportunity to offer supporting evidence." 404 U.S. at 520. (Illinois Penitentiary)

U.S. District Court
SEGREGATION
LENGTH OF SEGREGATION
DUE PROCESS

Taylor v. Sterrett, 344 F.Supp. 411 (N.D. Tex. 1972), reh'g denied, 420 U.S. 983 (1974). The use of substandard facilities for punitive segregation, and the practice of placing inmates in segregation cells without clothing are unconstitutional. Court ordered that solitary cells be provided with a bunk, water closet, drinking fountain and lavatory, and be of not less than forty square feet in dimension. An inmate who is confined in a solitary cell for more than three days shall have a hearing, before an impartial board, and no inmate shall be confined in solitary for over fifteen days. (Dallas County Jail, Texas)

1973

U.S. District Court
LENGTH OF SEGREGATION
CONDITION OF SEGREGATION

Goldsby v. Carnes, 365 F.Supp. 395 (W.D. Mo. 1973). Inmates in isolation shall be permitted to exercise outside their cells daily. Inmates in isolation shall receive showers as frequently as other inmates. Isolation may not extend beyond fourteen days, unless voluntary or certified in writing by a medical doctor as medically necessary. (Jackson County Jail, Kansas City, Missouri)

U.S. District Court
CORPORAL
PUNISHMENT

Johnson v. Lark, 365 F.Supp. 289 (E.D. Mo. 1973). Corporal punishment of any federal prisoner is prohibited. No federal prisoner may be placed in a segregation cell unless the rule or regulation allegedly violated has been clearly communicated in advance. (St. Louis County Jail, Missouri)

U.S. District Court
LENGTH OF SEGREGATION
CONDITION OF SEGREGATION

Osborn v. Mason, 359 F.Supp. 1107 (D. Conn. 1973). Both length and conditions of confinement must be considered in eighth amendment analysis of conditions in punitive segregation. (New Haven Correctional Center, Connecticut)

U.S. Supreme Court
GOOD-TIME

Preiser v. Rodriguez, 411 U.S. 475 (1973). Rodriguez and two other New York state prisoners bring a 42 U.S.C. Section 1983 action, in conjunction with a habeas corpus action against Preiser, Correction Commissioner, seeking restoration of good-time credits allegedly unconstitutionally cancelled. The three inmates participated in a conditional release program by which an inmate serving an indeterminate sentence could earn up to ten days per month good behavior credit toward reduction of his maximum sentence.

The credits earned were cancelled as a result of disciplinary proceedings. The requested relief, restoration of the good time credits, would have resulted in the immediate release from confinement of each of the inmates. Viewing the habeas corpus claim as an adjunct to the Section 1983 action, thereby removing the need for exhaustion of state remedies, the U.S. District Court ruled for each of the inmates entitling each to immediate release on parole. Following the Second Circuit Court of Appeal's decision affirming, Preiser sought certiorari from the United States Supreme Court. (Reversed.)

HELD: "[W]hen a state prisoner is challenging the very fact of duration of his physical imprisonment, and the relief he seeks is a determination that he is entitled to immediate release or a speedier release from that imprisonment, his sole federal remedy is a writ of habeas corpus." 411 U.S. at 500.

NOTE: A 42 U.S.C. Section 1983 action does not require that the plaintiff first seek redress in state courts. Where habeas corpus is the exclusive remedy allowed by federal laws, the plaintiff cannot seek the intervention of a federal court until he has first sought and been denied relief in the state courts, if a state remedy is available and adequate. 411 U.S. at 477, See, 28 U.S.C. Section 2254. (New York Department of Corrections)

1974

U.S. District Court
ACCESS TO COURTS
CORRESPONDENCE RECORDS
CLOTHING

Berch v. Stahl, 373 F.Supp. 412 (W.D. N.C. 1974). Inmates may not be deprived of visits from attorneys, mail from courts and attorneys, telephone calls to attorneys, writing materials or legal papers, nor may they be deprived of correspondence with friends or relatives for disciplinary reasons.

Jail officials shall preserve for at least two years from the date of decisions all notices, charges, reports, used, made or procured, and all findings and decisions made in connection with any disciplinary proceedings.

Known homosexuals may be placed nonpunitively in solitary confinement but may not be denied regular prison privileges and amenities. Mentally disturbed inmates may be placed nonpunitively in solitary confinement but may not be denied regular prison privileges and amenities. Solitary confinement is not per se cruel and unusual, but it becomes so if the inmate is denied clothing. (Mecklenburg County Jail, North Carolina)

U.S. District Court
READING MATERIAL

Johnson v. Anderson, 370 F.Supp. 1373 (D. Del. 1974). Cutting off access to reading material while under disciplinary sentence serves a legitimate state interest in the discipline of an inmate. (Delaware Correctional Center, Smyrna, Delaware)

U.S. District Court

Rhem v. Malcolm, 371 F.Supp. 594 (S.D. N.Y. 1974). The sole aim of jail discipline is preserving order; no considerations of rehabilitation exist. (Manhattan House of Detention, New York)

U.S. Supreme Court
DUE PROCESS

Wolff v. McDonnell, 418 U.S. 539 (1974). McDonnell, an inmate in a Nebraska state prison, brought this 42 U.S.C. Section 1983 action on behalf of himself and other inmates, alleging that disciplinary proceedings did not comply with the due process clause of the fourteenth amendment; that the inmate legal assistance program did not meet constitutional standards, and that regulations governing the inspection of mail to and from attorneys were unconstitutionally restrictive. Wolff, warden of the prison was named as the defendant. McDonnell sought injunctive relief and damages.

The U.S. District Court rejected the procedural due process claim; held the prison's policy of inspecting all incoming and outgoing mail to and from attorneys violated prisoners' access to the courts; and that restrictions on inmate legal assistance were not in violation of the Constitution.

The Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals reversed with respect to the due process claim, holding disciplinary proceedings in prisons must comply with the procedural requirements of parole revocation and probation revocation proceedings. On the basis of Preiser v. Rodriguez, 422 U.S. 475 (1973) the court held good-time credits could not be restored on this action but ordered that any disciplinary actions taken as a result of proceedings that failed to comply with procedures as outlined by the court be expunged from prison records. The court affirmed the district court's decision on the attorney-inmate correspondence issue but ordered further proceedings to determine if the state was complying with the directives of Johnson v. Avery, 393 U.S. 483 (1969), in providing legal assistance to inmates. From this decision Wolff petitioned for a writ of certiorari.

HELD: "We think it entirely appropriate that the state require any [letters from attorneys to inmates] to be specifically marked as originating from an attorney, with his name and address being given if they are to receive special treatment." 418 U.S. at 576.

HELD: "It would also certainly be permissible that prison authorities require that a lawyer desiring to correspond with a prisoner, first identify himself and his client to the prison officials, to assure that the letters marked privileged are actually from members of the bar." 418 U.S. at 576-577.

HELD: "As to the ability to open the mail in the presence of inmates, this could in no way constitute censorship, since the mail would not be read. Neither could it chill such communications, since the inmate's presence ensures that prison officials will not read the mail. The possibility that contraband will be enclosed in letters, even those from apparent attorneys, surely warrants prison officials opening the letters." 418 U.S. at 577.

HELD: "Prison disciplinary proceedings are not part of a criminal prosecution, and the full panoply of rights due a defendant in such proceedings does not apply....[T]here must be mutual accommodation between institutional needs and objectives and the provisions of the constitution that are of general application." 418 U.S. at 556.

The particular disciplinary procedure challenged in this case involved a Nebraska statute allowing loss of good time credits for serious misconduct. The court ruled that minimum requirements of procedural due process must be observed, taking into account the institutional environment, and specifically,

HELD: a. "[W]ritten notice of the charges must be given to the disciplinary action defendant in order to inform him of the charges and to enable him to marshal the facts and prepare a defense. At least a brief period of time after the notice, no less than twenty-four hours, should be allowed to the inmate to prepare for the appearance before the Adjustment Committee." 418 U.S. at 564.

b. "[T]here must be a 'written statement by the fact finders as to the evidence relied on and the reasons' for the disciplinary action." 418 U.S. at 564, (quoting Morrissey v. Brewer) 408 U.S. at 489.

c. "[T]he inmate facing disciplinary proceedings should be allowed to call witnesses and present documentary evidence in his defense when permitting him to do so will not be unduly hazardous to institutional safety or correctional goals." 418 U.S. at 566.

d. "We think that the Constitution should not be read to impose the [cross-examination] procedure at the present time, and that adequate basis for decision in prison disciplinary cases can be arrived at without cross-examination." 418 U.S. at 568.

e. "At this stage of the development of these procedures, we are not prepared to hold that inmates have a right to either retained or appointed counsel in disciplinary proceedings." 418 U.S. at 570.

HELD: An Adjustment Committee made up of the associate warden custody as chairman, the correctional industries superintendent, and the reception center director is not insufficiently impartial to satisfy the due process clause. 418 U.S. at 570, 571.

HELD: Due process requirements in prison disciplinary proceedings are not to be applied retroactively by requiring the expunging of prison records of improper disciplinary determinations. 418 U.S. at 573. (Nebraska State Prison)

1975

U.S. District Court
DUE PROCESS
CONDITION OF SEGREGATION

Craig v. Hocker, 405 F.Supp 656 (D. Nev., 1975). Prisoners brought action against the warden and others challenging various aspects of prison administration and the discipline of prisoners. The district court held: (1) that prisoners who were subject to disciplinary proceedings were entitled to certain due process rights; (2) that the classification process could not be equated with disciplinary proceedings for the purposes of due process; (3) that prisoners were entitled to access to courts and to the availability of certain legal material; (4) that prisoners were not being denied medical care and treatment; (5) that certain aspects of punitive segregation cells constituted cruel and unusual punishment; (6) that statutes providing for prison confinement of mentally ill persons for security reasons were unconstitutional; and (7) that the prisoners were not entitled to damages. (Nevada State Prison)

U.S. District Court RECORDS

Fitzgerald v. Procunier, 393 F.Supp. 335 (N.D. Calif. 1975). Written record with explanation is ordered for disciplinary decision. Right to counsel for disciplinary proceedings is limited. (San Quentin State Prison, California)

U.S. Appeals Court
CONDITION OF SEGREGATION

Kimbrough v. O'Neil, 523 F.2d 1057 (7th Cir. 1975), aff'd, 545 F.2d 1059 (7th Cir. 1976). It is unconstitutional to deprive an inmate in solitary confinement of the rudimentary implements of personal hygiene, such as toilet paper, soap, towels, and washing water. It is unconstitutional to deny an inmate in solitary confinement the right to communicate with his attorney, family and friends by mail or visits. (St. Clair County Jail, Illinois)

U.S. District Court VISITS

Rhem v. Malcolm, 396 F.Supp. 1195 (S.D. N.Y. 1975), aff'd, 527 F.2d 1041 (2nd Cir. 1975). No detainee in a segregation unit can be denied a visit solely on the grounds of his presence there. (Manhattan House of Detention, New York)

1976

U.S. Supreme Court
DUE PROCESS
EQUAL PROTECTION

Baxter v. Palmigiano, Enomoto v. Clutchette, 425 U.S. 308 (1976). Palmigiano and Clutchette, inmates in Rhode Island and California prisons respectively, alleged in separate 42 U.S.C. Section 1983 actions that they had been denied their rights to due process and equal protection of the laws under the fourteenth amendment. Both inmates claimed that they were entitled to the aid of legal counsel during disciplinary proceedings. Additionally, Palmigiano claimed he had a right to cross-examine witnesses, and Clutchette claimed that his decision to remain silent during disciplinary proceedings should not have been given evidentiary significance. The U.S. district court granted Clutchette relief, a decision affirmed by the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals. Palmigiano was denied relief in U.S. District Court, but the First Circuit Court of Appeals reversed. The U.S. Supreme Court granted certiorari and heard the two cases together. Decisions were then reversed.

HELD: "We see no reason to alter our conclusion so recently made in Wolff [v. McDonnell] that inmates do not have a right to either retained or appointed counsel in disciplinary hearings." 425 U.S. at 315.

HELD: "[P]ermitting an adverse inference to be drawn from an inmate's silence at his disciplinary proceedings is not, on its face, an invalid practice...." 425 U.S. at 320.

HELD: Mandatory confrontation and cross examination, except where prison officials can justify their denial on one or more grounds that appeal to judges, effectively pre-empts the area that Wolff left to the sound discretion of prison officials." 425 U.S. at 322.

HELD: In reversing the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals' ruling that minimum due process--such as notice, opportunity for response, and statement of reasons for action by prison officials--was necessary where inmates were deprived of privileges, the court found the disciplinary proceedings involved here to concern allegations of serious misconduct; thus, the Wolff standards apply. Without a fact pattern involving loss of privileges: "we are unable to consider the degree of 'liberty' at stake in loss of privileges and thus whether some sort of procedural safeguards are due when lesser penalties are at stake." 425 U.S. at 323.

NOTE: "Due to the peculiar environment of the prison setting, it may be that certain facts relevant to the disciplinary determination do not come to light until after the formal hearing. It would be unduly restrictive to require that such facts be excluded from consideration; in as much as they may provide valuable information with respect to the incident on questioning and may arrest prison officials in tailoring penalties to enhance correctional goals. In so stating, however, we in no way diminish our holding in Wolff that 'there must be a written statement by the factfinders as to the evidence relied on and reasons for the disciplinary action.'" [Cite omitted]. 425 U.S. at 322-323 N.5.

GENERAL NOTES: Baxter and Wolff, involving three prison systems (West Coast, Midwest, and East Coast) appear to present the definitive U.S. Supreme Court position on prison disciplinary procedures. It is clear that the standards of Baxter and Wolff apply to instances of serious misconduct. While no extensive definition of serious misconduct was offered by the Court, from the two decisions loss of good time and punitive segregation appear to "loss of privileges" situations. (Rhode Island and California prisons)

U.S. District Court REVIEW OF SEGREGATION

Tate v. Kassulke, 409 F.Supp. 651 (W.D. Ky. 1976). When inmates are placed in indefinite isolation, the decision must be reviewed every ten days by officials other than the ones who made the original decision. (Jefferson County Jail, Kentucky)

1977

U.S. District Court
GROUPS

Goldsby v. Carnes, 429 F.Supp. 370 (W.D. Mo. 1977). There shall be no discipline of a group of inmates unless all of them participated in the wrongful act. (Jackson County Jail, Kansas City, Missouri)

1978

U.S. Appeals Court
DUE PROCESS

Arsberry v. Seilaff, 586 F.2d 37 (7th Cir. 1978). Transfer of a prisoner to segregation does not require due process unless segregation is authorized solely because of prisoner's misbehavior. (Illinois State Prison)

U.S. District Court
CONDITION OF SEGREGATION
DUE PROCESS

Bono v. Saxbe, 450 F.Supp. 934 (E.D. Ill., 1978). Prisoners confined in the control unit of the Marion Federal Penitentiary brought an action challenging the conditions of their confinement. The district court held that: (1) prisoners did not have a fundamental liberty interest in remaining in the general prison population but did have an interest protected by due process as a result of the prison's own rules; (2) placement of prisoners in the control unit, which was done for preventative and not punitive reasons, could not be based on the crime for which the prisoner was convicted or on the possibility of escape since every inmate in the Marion institution was a potential candidate for escape; (3) prisoners placed in the control unit were entitled to written notice of hearing, written reason, impartial decision making, and immediate and later periodic review; (4) prisoners were entitled to be told what affirmative actions they could take to expedite their release from the control unit, and (5) conditions of confinement in the control unit were not cruel and unusual punishment except for the use of closed-front cells. (Federal Penitentiary, Marion, Illinois)

U.S. Supreme Court
LENGTH OF
SEGREGATION

Hutto v. Finney, 437 U.S. 678 (1978), reh'g. denied, 439 U.S. 1122. Finding that conditions in the Arkansas prison system constitute cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the eighth and fourteenth amendments, a U.S. District Court issued a series of detailed remedial orders. Two aspects of that relief were challenged on appeal to the Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals: 1) an order placing a maximum limit of thirty days on punitive isolation and 2) an award of attorney's fees to be paid out of the Department of Corrections' funds, based on the lower court's finding that officials had acted in bad faith in failing to remedy identified problems. The Eighth Circuit affirmed and certiorari from the U.S. Supreme Court was sought by state officials. (Affirmed.)

HELD: "[W]e find no error in the inclusion of a thirty day limitation on sentences to punitive isolation as a part of the district court's comprehensive remedy." 437 U.S. at 688.

NOTE: This holding was unquestionably based on the particular facts presented by this case, and it would be error to interpret this as the U.S. Supreme Court's position on length of punitive isolation. (Arkansas Prison System)

U.S. District Court
DUE PROCESS

McAlister v. Robinson, 488 F.Supp. 545 (D. Conn. 1978), aff'd, 607 F.2d 1058 (2nd Cir. 1979). A transfer from general population to segregation which works a substantial deprivation on the activities of the individual and where the state regulations limit the use of segregation to post discipline or for protection, requires due process. The process may be provided after the transfer to avoid institutional problems. (Connecticut Correctional Institute, Somers, Connecticut)

U.S. District Court
RESTRAINTS

Owens-El v. Robinson, 442 F.Supp. 1368 (W.D. Penn. 1978). Use of restraints as a disciplinary measure violates the eighth amendment. (Allegheny County Jail, Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania)

1979

U.S. Supreme Court
PRETRIAL
DETAINEES
PUNISHMENT

Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520 (1979). Pretrial detainees confined in the Metropolitan Correction Center (MCC) in New York City challenged virtually every facet of the institution's conditions and practices in a writ of habeas corpus, alleging such conditions and practices violate their constitutional rights. MCC is a federally operated, short-term detention facility constructed in 1975; Eighty-five percent of all inmates are released within sixty days of admission. MCC was intended to include the most advanced and innovative features of modern design in detention facilities. The key design element of the facility is the "modular" or "unit" concept, whereby each floor housing inmates has one or two self-contained residential units, as opposed to the traditional cellblock jail construction. Within four months of the opening of the twelve-story, 450 inmate capacity facility, this action was initiated. The U.S. District Court for the Southern District of N.Y. enjoined no less than twenty practices at the MCC on constitutional and statutory grounds, many of which were not appealed. See, United States Ex Rel Wolfish v. Levi, 439 F.Supp. 114 (S.D.N.Y.). The Second Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed the district court decision, See, Wolfish v. Levi, 573 F.2d 118 (2d Cir. 1978), and reasserted the "compelling-necessity" test as the standard for determining limitations on a detainee's freedom.

The U.S. Supreme Court granted certiorari "to consider the important constitutional questions raised by [recent prison decisions] and to resolve an apparent conflict among the circuits." 441 U.S. at 524: Do the publisher-only rule, the prohibition on receiving packages from outside sources, the search of living quarters, and the visual inspection of body cavities after contact visits constitute punishment in violation of the rights of pretrial detainees under the due process clause of the fifth amendment?

HELD: "Nor do we think that the four MCC security restrictions and practices...constitute 'punishment' in violation of the rights of pretrial detainees under the due process clause of the fifth amendment." 441 U.S. at 560, 561.

REASONING: a. [T]he determination whether these restrictions and practices constitute punishment in the constitutional sense depends on whether they are rationally related to a legitimate nonpunitive governmental purpose and whether they appear excessive in relation to that purpose. 441 U.S. at 561.

b. Ensuring security and order at the institution is a permissible nonpunitive objective, whether the facility houses pretrial detainees, convicted inmates, or both...[W]e think that these particular restrictions and practices were reasonable responses by MCC officials to legitimate security concerns. [Detainees] simply have not met their heavy burden of showing that these officials have exaggerated their response to the genuine security considerations that activated these restrictions and practices. CLOSING

COMMENTS OF MAJORITY OPINION: "[T]he inquiry of federal courts into prison management must be limited to the issue of whether a particular system violates any prohibition of the constitution, or in the case of a federal prison, a statute. The wide range of 'judgment calls' that meet constitutional and statutory requirements are confided to officials outside of the judicial branch of government." 441 U.S. at 562.

GENERAL NOTES: The Court saw this case, a challenge to virtually every aspect of the operation of a state of the art detention facility, as an opportunity to clarify the judiciary's role in the operation of prisons. The five-four decision indicates there was no general consensus as to what that role is, or how it should be applied. No less than three possible standards of review are contained in the majority and dissenting opinions: 1) A "rational basis", subjective test; 2) A balancing of interests test; 3) An objective standard of review. (Metropolitan Correction Center (MCC), New York)

U.S. District Court

Hanvey v. Blakenship, 474 F.Supp. 1349 (W.D. Vir. 1979), aff'd, 631 F.2d 296 (4th Cir. 1980). Where the authorities found cash, and the prisoner was disciplined for the unauthorized possession, the state could place the funds in the prisoner benefit fund and was under no obligation to hold the money for the prisoner and return it upon his release. (Bland Correctional Center, Virginia)

1980

U.S. District Court
DUE PROCESS

Brown v. Hilton, 492 F.Supp. 771 (D. N.J. 1980). The amendment of a disciplinary charge by the hearing officer does not violate due process where the inmate is offered a continuance to prepare a defense. (New Jersey State Prison, Trenton)

U.S. District Court
DUE PROCESS
PLACEMENT IN SEGREGATION

Bukhari v. Hutto, 487 F.Supp. 1162 (E.D. Vir. 1980). While placement in segregation based upon the political beliefs of an individual would violate the first amendment, placement in segregation of an individual who is a member of an organization advocating escape, who although a model prisoner, has already escaped once, and whose closest associates have recently escaped from other institutions is a reasonable security measure. Such placement in segregation does not require a Wolff type hearing, either before or after, but the individual does have a due process base right to have any erroneous information in the file which is considered in making the decision. (Virginia Correctional Center for Women, Goodland)

U.S. District Court
LENGTH OF
SEGREGATION

Chapman v. Pickett, 491 F.Supp. 967 (C.D. Ill. 1980). The district court determined that the length of confinement does not have any effect on the question whether confinement in segregation violates the eighth amendment; reversed on appeal. (Federal Penitentiary, Leavenworth, Kansas)

U.S. Appeals Court
DUE PROCESS

Gibson v. McEvers, 631 F.2d 95 (7th Cir. 1980). Where the penalty imposed was slight, such as the denial of movie privileges, refusal to call witnesses at the disciplinary hearing did not violate due process. (Logan Correctional Center, Illinois)

U.S. District Court
DUE PROCESS

